''Go Jimmie general ivians places you in kindernines command and over him and I advise you to order him on the march and see if he will listen to you. If he does not then you or we can do nothing and will have to tell general Vivian.''

Jimmie reached general kindernines command and gave the order sent by general vivian through violet.

''All right I'm glad to hear it.''Said general Kindernine.''Grombra but those vivian girls are brave.''He said to himself. Jimale continued onward in full gallop and came upon Costellioes command under general Bongisen Calmannia.

''our boy scout commanders are given command of these divisions also.''She said riding up.''General vivian wishes us to wait.''

''I'm waiting for those very ones for general Vivian told me about it.''Said general Calmann.''And I'm glad to have superiors who know how to lead an army. He was going to put general Baldwin in command here, but I told him that I wain wanted no one but your best boy scout leaders and he granted my request, thank God.''

That very evening the whole christian army was on the march tward Flad flanders and many children of distant Orphan Asylums were frightened at the first appearance of these soldiers whose van being Calverinians were the Calverinian gray, but their attendants tried to cheer them, telling them they were the g good soldiers, chasing the bad soldiers and trying to catch them. So the little children watched the tremendous pe parade quite cheerfully looking at the pretty flags and listening to the loud and beautiful bands. Violet and her sisters found themselves riding easily with the gigantic columns which marched on in grand array, and cold blasts of wind smote their fair faces. This march lasted a good part of the night but at last they were in sight of Aurandicallic and flanders and within sight of the enemys lines. Three days preparations were made for the coming battle then news came that a battle had raged bete between Shoemannia and Picknell at Illinia n and another occured also at Illinell the losses in both battles so close to flanders being about three hundred thousand on both sides but each had turned out sad to say as flandelinian victories the christians indeed meeting fierce opposition. Illinia raged on Feburary 27th. Illinell on March 27 nh.

After the battle of flanders had raged all morning with grand and varying successes on the part of the flandelinians who attacked fiercely the enemy were soon forced to withdraw and the first grand divisions of the christians were then sent forward to storm general Picknells batteries and as the assault was made hell seemed to vreak out once more. Yet his infantry were attacked with devilish fury seven brigades of Jennings first grand division numbering one million three hundred thousand in all making the second assault in four columns. The generals found it hard to get orders to so many officers but though at first it made a great strain on them they did not falter but in a few hours the first and second assaulting columns came back mangled and bleading having lost in an hours assault onver two hundred nineteen thousand two hundred men but the fight had been most desperate and Jennings first assaulting columns lost seventy thousand on the first hour, four thousand nine hundred and twenty three on the second, and eighty thousand nine hundred and fifty two at the third. But general Jennings tried it again, the fresh christian columns sweeping on while death and destruction whinned and sang in their ranks bringing down large setsections. Despite this havoc they steadily pressed on tward picknells lines, and ten regiments of infantry slightly in advance of the main flandelinian army poured an annihilating fire upon the attacking christian columns, one of the columns swerving a little to its left and exposing its flank which broke and fled wildly, anywhere to get away from that murderous fire.

Three Angelinian commanders not named were killed and poor Calmurinin shouting onew encouragement to his command dropped dead. The othe three were Jesse Sanders Henry Costellio and johnston J.B Calmen. General Henry Bennin Stanck also fell severely wounded. Great sections of the Angelinians were mowed down but the survivors reached the line of works and after battling for two hours like fiends carried all before them, and swept on tward the batteries where they met a withering fire of two hundred and fifty guns. At first the new christian generals who watched the struggle through their glasses did not know what to do as the enemys batteries stormed with an annihilating fire and their men were going down in thousands. One of the Angelinian b generals called Herdrude Hongelinin had retreated with his force tward the new generals who had moved closer to the field of action and with a wave of his sabre bid his men to follow him again, and then he went down with a bullet in his head.

One of the Angelinian colonel disregarding thedanger that threatened went in the land unfurling a flag but the troops seeing his rashness forbade him to go too near and the officer realizing that the firing was getting more terrific and murderous became alarmed.

''This is awful''Said one of the new generals.''See yonder batteries.They are tearing my divisions to pieces. Is not their firing terrible! How I wish I had not sent them to such slaughter. Oh why was I a fool to do so.''!

Horrible shrieks and plaintive outcries and pleads of the wounded was incessant, and the more nearer to the batteries the survivors got the more horrible became the decimijation of their ranks. Four more generals falls these being general Hennin Logan Shoemmucker Jensin, Hanson Donaldson, and Glamdin Heubertomin. All were severely wounded. General Meldinin coming to the support of the new generals threw his forces into the action but they seemed to be bathed in blood and now several flandelinian forces were struggling like demons to get their guns out of danger and the faces of the christian generals were white in the fear of losing them.

Quickly general Meldinin dashed to his reserve and shouted;

''Charge those guns.Oh plea e do not let the get away with those guns.''

With desperate fury these Angelinians swept forward and in the melee captured those guns though whole lines of men for a few moments went down all of picknells line in the front fairly storming with fire and oh the shrieks, screams and pleads of the wounded became heartrending.

''This is awful''Said general Jennings to general Joice Handon. ''I did not believe that picknells batteries were so terrible or I would not have assaulted them.''

An hour passed now since the new attack had began and the christian officers now found that the flandelinian batteries were well manned, and on account of their severe losses the progress of the christian assailants was slow but they were determined to carry those main batteries but now the survivors appalled halted, but their officers urged them on. On pressed Henry Aronburgs columns, but soon his line was withered, and he himself had all he could do to rally the survivors all his staff officers being killed wounded, or dismounted the enemys line along his front extending as far as eye could se e being one long streak of flame and smoke and the uniform of general Jennings was torn in shreds by bullets, that even reached to where he was standing and his own torn and bleeding columns recieved the full force of this fire and so were staggered, and demorilized, and broke into confusion.

The new christian officers were excited and frenzied when Jennings line became panic stricken and yet he would have been able to rally them had not their commander general Arob Aronburg recieved a bad wound in the arm and leg.

Yet after the mangled columns were withdrawn there was a lull for an hour and then other columns fresh and more overwhelming were thrown forward more undaunted than those gone on before and general Aronburg wounded as he was had tried to rally his own decimated division which had been mowed down in sections but he was wounded a third time in the chest at that, and his columns broke into a panic. General Shoemmucker on the christian side decided now to spare these divisions of the terrible ordeal and so withdrawing them a second time he prepared to rush his own main columns to the assault. The new christian officers were maned at the recent slaughter among their own men, but now the slaughter along Shoemmuckers men was more terrible.

Of danger to themselves the christian generals had no fear but of this horrible decimination among their own ranks they were alarmed and vowed they would sooner command boyscouts than go into such a slaughter like this again and not win.

All of Hansonins officers ordered their own men within another hour to make a desperate rush up the battry crowned ridge. General Hansonin dismounted and ascended swiftly but was wounded in the forehead. The enemys main line of infantry which shown darkly against the sky became disolved into smoke and sheets of flame and during each successive charge whole ranks of christians disappeared the sides of the ridge being paved with the dead and wounded and the shrieks of the wounded was deafening. General Gunnons christian troops having charged to the right a little later were now despite their frightful losses ahead of Hansonin who followed hard. It seemed like a race, of who should meet destination first.

''Can't there be any other way to capture the batteries without such butch butchery!!''Asked general Jennings with a look that would make the toughest hearted man faint from pity.

''They Can't do it any other way.''Answered general Joice as they watched the Angelinians draw nearer to the batteries.''Their batteries cannot be flanked, and as there are five hundred ca nnon in number and as they are protected on all sides by infantry the only means is to ask God to hel help us win.''

''I know but I don't like to see such a slaughter over those old batteries.'' Said Jennings ploadingly.''The christian columns are suffering terribly.''

''Well they cannot do anything else.''said general joice.''Anyway they have got to capture those batteries at all costs. And that is what Hansonin wants. When the Angelinians got very near their guns however, it won' to be so dangerous any more.''

One large section of the christian line had already reached the ve summit and the purple lines after fierce battling wavered and retired in confusion leaving windrows upon windrows of dead and wounded behind them as they retreated.

The flandelinians with fixed bayonets pressed down after them but did not persue very far. In fifteen minutes all was quiet temporiarly in which the wounded were picked up and sent to the main line in ambulances. The assaults on the batteries had failed at considerable loss the combined losses in these assaults being one million nine hundred ninty th nine thousand seven hundred and fourty two, while the enemy lost three million one hundred and fifty two thousand three hundred and thirty six.

All the flandelinian officers had the guns cleaned and then general picknells deciding to fo low the advantage of having crushed the christian attack on his batteries ordered general Stanislaw to try and carry the chr stian lines once more with his whole command. One column under general Vincens Jone was ordered to storm general costellio's line, while Stanislaw was ordered to lead the rest in person against Hansonins lines, and with the purpose of turning the right flank of the christian lines and cutting off the retreat of the forces under general Jennings in a redoubt.

After an hours lull the flandelinians advanced in the most splended style upon the rising ground but the christian fire tore great avenues in the enemys lines mowing down three whole columns.

I436.

Yet the survivors of the enemy came on with fierce yells a raking fire of Manleys artillery driving Jennings forces out of the redoubt but the rest of the christian line held the ridge and the battle again became general the struggle becoming fearful. For two hours the heavy christian artillery and musketry fire drove the enemy again and again down the sides of the ridges the Angelinians holding their positions like demons. One hundred and eighty five guns were trained upon Stanislaws first and second corps who charged again and again in heavy masses only to be repulsed with the most tremendous losses. More terrific became the slaughter. Generals Jones was killed and though the christian line was enclouded in smoke and the air filled with flying snow driven by explosions Stanislaw decided decided to throw his whole division simultaneously upon the christian lines and at eleven thirty that morning after another fifteen minutes lull stanislaws men had gathered up their main strength for a fierce and final effort and soon three million grayclats yelling like demons came rushing up the hill with indescribable fury but hundreds of men were dreadfully cut up, and when the survivors came within easy musket range whole lines of christian infantry many miles long fairly blazed with fire, and then Hansonias whole force of men springing to their feet poured upon stanislaws divisions a deliberate annihilating fire tearing whole divisions to fragments. Stanislaw was severe,ly wounded, and the Glandelinians became disconfited, and drew back down the hills their lines torn and bleeding with their dead and wounded piled in ridges where they fell.

The Angelinians swept down in persuit, the enemy retiring through the woods fighting still and with such stubborn fury and with a courage as to fill the Angelinians with admiration. The sides of the snow covered hills was thickly red with gore and thickly covered with the bodies of the slain. After this all was silent for another hour and as quiet as if there had not been any battle. To say that general Bicknell was disgusted when his men was routed in a series of attempts to carry the christian positions is only putting it mildly.

For instead he was in a terrible rage. He was forced to order general Stanislaws broken and cut up forces to retire to a point one mile from the scene of carnage, having already lost over one million men on that freezing zero cold day over six hundred and ninty one thousand men having been wounded and now his losses were added by these great and bloody repulses and when he took count of the losses of Stanislaws army he found that their losses had been too severe to estimate and hardly knew what to think of next.

It was a terrible blow and bicknell could hardly believe that such a blow had been atruck by the divisions under general Hansonia and those directed by the new generals but he had proofs that their divisions could strike and hard right before him too. General Bicknell though a sensible Glandelinian was a stubborn fellow when sticking up for a cause he believed right, and he was all the more determined to capture the positions and carry all before him or know the reason why. He was bound to prevent the christian advance on Julo Callio and Madge Evnus.

''I will win this battle if I have to burn overt everything before me to do so or die trying.''He declared grimly.''And what is more I will never rest untill I have killed a sufficient number of those Vivian Girls to give me revenge for the brave boys that went down just an hour ago. As for that old general Meldonia Bicknell, if he know my intentions he would give it to me. I hate to do it to the little girls as I do like them but if they are causing these disasters on account of their boyscout commands as I have heard the only way to win a struggle is to down the leaders of the enemy, so I will have to down them even if I have not the heart to kill them.''

''We will have to have some more men then general.''Said one of his staff.' Those christian armies are demons in their fury and they have the Vivian Girls to tell them what to do you know.''

''Yes I know and I'm going to send a messenger to general Husbaun Manley at once as,i asking that three more million men be sent to me. And I will crush the lives out of the Vivian Girls as sure as my name is Bicknell.''

He at once dispatched a messenger who rode away at a good gallop. He had instructions to kill his horse if necessary but to get to his destination at the earliest possible moment anyway.

''When he comes back with the three million men we will assault the hills and shoot every man that gets within our range.''Bicknell said.

Just about twelve o-clock a scout came in and reported to the general that an immense division of troops was approuching from the main line and the news caused great excitement and joy among Bicknells Glandelinians.

''The reinforcements are coming. The reinforcements are coming.''Was the cry. And this was the case. Three quarters of an hour later the Glandelinian troops three million strong marched into the camp, being greeted by wild cheers.

''Now we will teach those vivian girls a thing or two.''Was the cry.

At three thirty the christian line was thrilled by such a yell of fury along the plains and through the arches of the woods as they never heard before. Violet and her sisters who were in the main generals headquarters listened with bloodcurdling horror at the heartrending sounds, little inferior to that which may be expected at the blasts of the final summons of the General Judgement. More than six long lines of grayccats broke from the forests and threw themselves with the most indescribble alacrity against the christian lines the christians endeavoring to awe the foe throwing themselves into solid masses and for three more hours death was everywhere and indeed in its most terrible and disgusting all aspects. It seemed to be a regular massacre, for the grayccats went down in tons of thousands avenues being ploughed once again in their lines and the officers turned their eyes from the revolting horrors that went on. In the midst of all this tumult the rush of foe assailants came nearer and while the din Gain initated the approach of the end of the world one of the officers noticed a large force trying to march around to Hansonias flank and called general Joices attention to it just as a sudden withering storm of musketry broke out.

''The enemy are trying to flank general Hansonia.''He cried.''We must warn him or all is lost.''

Joice galloped over to one of his observation edifices and saw that to notify general Hansonia by messenger would be late . The flan ers were however within range of his own batteries and though he hated to do it on account of the slaughter that would result to save Hansonia, he gave the order for ten batteries to be trained upon the flankers. In a few minutes the hostile flankers found a terrible tempest of canister mowing down their very columns and confusion of the worse kind ensued and all this noise ad confusion in the direction of his rear aroused Hansonia and he saw what a danger he had escaped.

But yet the columns attacking him in front were redoubling the attack against his overwhelming numbers the survivors coming on with such force that Hansonias line wavered and began to retreat despite his desperate attempts to rally them, especially Jennings lines. He managed to rally Jennings lines and as quick as the gray columns came within range they melted away and Bicknell losing so many men and officers was almost going crazy so enraged he was. He threatened to shoot the first man who retreated and taking the front he exposed himself to give the exapl exap exmaple to his men.

He was confronted by Jennings troops and then so fierce was the christian fire that soon there was no man near him excepting those who had fallen every one having been mowed down. Yet a few minutes later his main columns came rushing up and as the assault was renewed the christian line gave way because Jennings fell wounded. The enemy pressed over and the Angelinians retreated precipitately down the hills. Other christian divisions also gave way, but the enemy in vain tried to disoldge the lines under the new christian generals. Officers went down by the score and Hansonia below saw this stirring scene. He was resolved to retake the position and sent a messenger to general Hanson Vivian for reinforcements. After rallying his confused divisions Hansonia made a spirited attack and though tens of thousands went down during the three assaults he soon regained the summit even before the reinforcements arived and withered by the enemys firecas they were they nevertheless were encouraged by the bravery of the force under the new generals, and hurled the enemy back once more.

But the danger was not yet over. If general Bicknell had been angry before, he was doubly so now. He raged like a wild man and threatened the most terrible things when he should get a chance at the Vivian girls.

''It's on account of those boyscouts of the Vivian Girls holding out to the last.''Said one of the officers.''Those little girls are dangerous to fool with I guess and I don't think it will pay to try and go for them again for they are recieving reinforcements now.''

''I don't care a rap how many of them there are.''Was Bicknells sulkly reply.''The other two million were not engaged yet.I'll force the whole army to charge this time.I'll capture that position I swear it.I've been outnumbered anyway.''

''hat's true '' aid one of the officers''There must be fourteen or fifteen million of them against our ten.Another assault would probably bring the main line to the scene so I would not risk it if I were you general.''

''I don't blame the grayccats for thinking they were outnumbered for they had been put to flight after the repulse so quickly that they supposed that there must be a very large force of christians.''Said another officer.

The first assaulting columns now reduced to scarcely more than half their number were reformed and just then five million more arived and then another million was reported coming to Bicknells delight. While the reinforcements were ariving two other hills had been attacked with the same result and now Bicknell moved forward to the assault again.

Twent desperate assaults were made in succession then again all the divisions of christians gave way the line under the new generals being the last.

At this moment general Baldwin with a park of artillery opened a heavy fire upon the captured position and the enemy hammered back with eight hundred guns. Bicknell decided to try and silence these batteries and sent large numbers to attempt it then led his main division to assail Hansonins main line who stillretained his own position, and even recovered some of the lost positions after a furious counter charge.

onward up the hills came the Glandelinians and the christian generals waited untill the head of the columns were well within range and then gave the order to fire.

Again the christian line seemed to instantly blaze and more than a dozen of the enemys columns went down. It was like firing into the ranks sidewys or sidewise at close range such deadly execution had been done and most of the assailants broke into confusion and disorder. Oaths, and yells went up, and then the whole gray line rallied and made a tremendous rush up the ridge.

406 I430.

"Give them a volly volley and then the bayonet when you reach the men it."Yelled Picknell Picknell wild with rage."Fire."

The enemys lines seemed ablaze and up the hills they dashed with muskets ready to bayonet the Angelinians the instant they were within reach but thousands only rushed to their deaths but the survivors gave utterance to wild yells as they dashed upward at top speed eager to avenge their losses only to be down also in multitudes. Whil whl h le whole divisions of the enemy were mangled. This was maddening but the survivors rushed up still at the top of their speed general icknell urging them on with voice and waving sabre. Although now he had one arm in A sling he seemed to be able to get up the hill with the best of men and amid the crash and uproar of hell his men now went down li in lines.

"Ten thousand furies."Roared picknell as soon as he could make himself heard above the earthrending din.."Charge on men. Charge the scoundrelly Angelinians and do not stop untill you have every mothers son of them pinned to the ground with your bayonets."

General picknell was bound to carry those hills at all costs and the Slandelinians themselves were at such a pitch now that they were determined to carry the christian line if they had to mingle their own blood in the snow. General icknell was nearly insane so great was his rage. To be handled thus by mere Angelinians was almost too much for him to endure and he was forced to nurse his wrath and sore arm. Also his whole army was wild with rage and swarming over they dashed right into the midst of the Angelinians firing right and left and yelling and cheering like mad. The galling fire of the foe withering the christian line while two large divisions over lapping the right poured a galling annihilating fire into their midst and into the rear. Thus caught between two murderouscfirew fires the Angelinians were thrown into the wildest confusion and became a mere disorginized mob. It was ever every fellow for himself, and their one object in life seemingly became that of getting into the timber. The Angelinians had never encountered such fierce fighters as were this icknells men and did not know what to do to rally the panic stricken men. Yet Baldwins batteries were now trained upon the assailants and as reserves were thrown forward and met the enemy with redoubled fury the battle at once became general. General Hardrude managed to get his cannoneers to unlimber the inactive artillery and soon the artillery fire was intensiv intensified at short range and the reserve christ ian line not only held its position but made a counter charge in heay heavy columns and suffering tremendous losses the landelinians at last wavered and retired to icknells bitter rage and consternation Terrific was the slaughter among the men Assailing galdwins main line of batteries the battle r raging on with unabated fury. The landelinians attacking Baldwins batteries were blind with rage from their losses and again yelling like demons they came rushing forward once more tward the batteries with equal tremendous fury. Though their line was cut to fragments the survivors came on and were allowed to come so well forward that their flank was exposed to Jensins batteries. Then whole lines sprang to their feet and stormed with fire. For a few minutes the fire was returned then again the landelinian columns became disconfited and terror stricken and started to recoil. Their dead and wounded were piled up in heaps along the whole line of charge and for fire miles the ground was strewn with the graycoats.

The enemy with their line still ragged and torn drew back through a line of woods followed by the Angelinians the landelinians fighting again with the stubborn fury of cornered lions and with great courage several columns even amid the dreadful x carnage trying to rally but again they became demorilized and finally turn turned and fled at the top of their speed throwing away their weapons and yelling in fright as they ran. One whole division of landelinians threw down their arms and surrendered, begging for quarter. The general of the brigade was also captured and he was so disgusted and disheartened that he committed sucide. Yet the main divisions retreated in good style.The line of christians previously under general Jennings who was wounded strung u out at a seemingly endlesx endless distance upon the right of the retreating foe and the whole line fired almo almost as one and nearly a whole line of graycoats just as long seemed to melt away, while many poor horses were killed or wounded, and the yells, groans and shrieks that went up cannot be described. The horses kicked, reared and plunged. The purple and gray lay in common heaps and thousandso thousands of poor fellows suffering for hours were found writhing in mortal agony. The woods on the sidesof the hills where this terrible battle raged, was pierced with innumerable minnie balls and torn and rent by solid shot.

Night ended the scene of contest but during the night general ivian learned through the signal stations that general icknell intended to mAke a general attack on the n morrow. General ivian therefore reinforced Shoemaucker and concentrated his own lines knowing that his own army was well prepared to meet the main attack on the morrow. General Hanson ivian had also concentrated his line during the time Shoemaucker was in action and so with all his grand divisions were on the right supported by batteries, while costellioes main divisions being well advanced on a large plain on his own right formed a beautiful angle with the main lines.

General James Gannon with all his brigades of infantry was also to the right, supported by Senguine and indernine in front. General ivian commanded the center, and Hindernine and Aronburg the rest of the line. All of the enemys batteries were on a range of hills and one battery on a hill called lsies ridge on the morrow began to pour death and destruction as more and more batteries broke into action the loud thunder of glandelinian artillery becoming more reverbrating and more spasmodic and soon the whole ridge of hills seemed one long line of flame as the entire line of batteries became active pouring a storm of death and destruction among the christian line.

"Take every advantage of protection."Shouted the Angelinian commandors."Lie flat on the ground as close to the works as possible."

All of the infantry men did so but notwithstanding all their precautions the destruction of life and property was something terrible for the extent of a number of miles. Among Baldwins sheltered cannoneers themselves a rail of shells of every description fell with deadly and horrible effect. While men and horses were being dreadfully cut up Baldwin sent a messenger to general ivian then rode out in full view.Cassion after cassion near him filled with ammunition were struck by a chain shot and exploded gun carriages and other pieces of war material being shattered to pieces. In and around general ivians headquarters the deadly missels began to fall thick and fast and scores of horses and men were killed, the roof ripped up, and the pillars knocked from the building.

"Fire away with all your guns was the order of the artillery officers. In fifteen minutes all the guns on the christian side were in action and the hills seemed as if swept with forest fires. The din was frightful like another warfare of titans, whole parks of artillery seeming to be fired at once the thunder of scores of thousand of cannon rivalling in the most awful grandeur and now the full force of the cannonade broke loose which echoed through every cliff and cavern of the vast rocky ridges till itsseemed as if the sound would b never cease. The explosions of the thousands of shells could not be heard even when raised to the highest pitch amid that earth rending u r uproar the cannonading continueing for three hours that morning and then the roar of Baldwins batteries began to slacken and at Baldwins orders finally ceased.

Fifteen minutes later immense columns of landelinians about six million strong began forming on the edge of a line of woods which crowned the summit of the ridge on their own side. It was fully an hour before they were formed for the final charge and now at eleven thirty three more hours after the cannonade ceased, they emerged from the woods their front being over two miles long. A general thrill passed through the Angelinian soldiers as the landelinians mowed forward and steadily down the slopes.

It was indeed a spp splindid sight and large fresh divisions of brigades and veterans singled out by picknell to lead the van was under the command of general Deldonia. Also picknells main divisions were formed and arranged in two double lines ten yards wide. In this great charge the attacking forces had to first decomdca hill just as the Confederates at Gettysburg, cross an exposed plain and ascend a string of hills infiladed by the christians and the distance of advance was three miles. For a time they were not in r n range yet so the christian batteries were silent though the enemys again thundered with redoubled viocence violence and yet astonished at seeing that the christian batteries were not responding with a single no shot.

Within about fiftee minutes the enesay came within range of general Prander stancks long chain of cannon and these soon began hewmering away and myriads of the graycoats went down. picknells lines seemed to be rushing int othe very jaws of death. To increase the carnage general Bald Baldwins batteries broke into action a few minutes later but it did not for one moment effect the firm and steady step of picknells advancing coc columns which continued on.

The christian cannoneers under general Maurice Conten costene began to slacken their artillery fire on account of lack of ammunition. In the face of a withering tempest of artillery the immense divisions under general Deldonnia and picknell came on a new fire of christian artillery being now added which seemed to mow down whole multitudes at each successive step. On they came and so near that Stancks batteries could not be depressed to reach them and were forced to withdraw.. General Hanson galloped up to general Vivian his brother and said;

"I'm wondering with deep concern whether ourlines can resist the fierce onset."

"I don't know."Answered general vivian."The enemy are advancing in firm and compact battalions of demons, and our artillery does not check them."

"No they do not seem to fear no storm of artillery and neither no foe but we have got to hold."Said general Hanson.

The other artillery lines were now slackening their fire and the cannoneers as they could not effect the enemy as they were too near, remained to watch this great hostile charge. For several minutes it seemed from the direction which the wicked glandelinian columns were advancing that general Maurice costellio would recieve the first heavy blow of the general attack. Yet general Kennith Caseys artillery got the range and the cannon fire was so severe that the gray lines began to bend to their own left.general vivian with the vivian girls by his side watched this great advanc advance. Small infantry lines were already firing but were commanded to stop, and still came on the landelinian col columns yelling like demons and soon they were right in front of Maurice Costellioes divisions. They were Concenctinians.

"Now is the opportunity for Mauric3 Costellioes lines."Thought the great commander in chief general Hanson. "If they are not in any haste to waste their ammunition they will hold out."He added.

''They are not in any haste to waste their ammunition.''Said general joice.''See the goandolinians are already so near that their right and left flanks are exposed.''
General Hanson „ivian saw that this was true.The immense columns of „landelinians were coming so well forward that their right and left flank were well exposed. Then it seemed as if hell had broken loose along „ostellioss lines as his soldiers began pouring ! forth a well directied and destructive fire which increased to a deafening roar as the enemys lines answered. Each fearful volley of the christians succeeded each other in quick succession tearing the whole gray line each time and when the now trembling lines being already torn, tottered and bleeding came under the range of a fearful oblique fire of seven hundred cannon in charge of general Cannon Procie Proelis, and caught in flank by a Oblique fire of Deldons batteries they halted and tried to form a straighter line and then began for a few minutes to storm with a fiercer fire.
10,000 of Deldonnias men unable to endure such a terrific withering fire from general Yioldenias men were compelled to surrender. Then as Deldonnia fell wounded, the remainder of his line wavered and broke into wild confusion.. The main body however under general Adele-De-garbe and Purgatoriannan „icknell, and Leonia Neldonia „icknell pressed on in grand array still free from the christian fire, and seeing on account of inclinging still more to their own left, picknells men were moving straight on his and Hansons su similtaneously, general Hanson vivian galloped over and took command in person to direct the firing that would surely shake moving calmly and composedly among the ranks as he cried;
''Hold your fire boys. They are not near enough.''
Yet he could hear the tremendous firing along general „ostellioss lines and within fifteen minites more the hostile „landelinian columns in his own front were now within a hundred yards. Then general „ivian gave the men the signal to take aim. Instantly up came the muskets to the soldiers of the Angelinians and general vivian waiting just long enough for the men to take good aim cried in a loud n voice;
''Give them hell boys. Fire Away.....''
Instantly the whole christian line at this point seemed to dissolve into smoke and smoke and flame as theyopened upon the advancing columns an annihilating fire and down went multitudes of „landelinians. The battle now became general the enemy along this point also responding.
The left of the assaulting column almost melted away before this terrific storm of artillery and musketry, and now the remainder of the advancing columns having made a great swing to their right and left during the Herculean blow recieved from by them from general Hansons whole line began to have the effect of flinging general Adele-De-Garbes d visions well tward general vivians whole line, and as his columns opened fire several divisions of the enemys seventh corps melted away like a great snowbank,
General „ivians whole line was well advanced which opened a simultaneous fire on Bicknell's troops with many lines in his rear also. General Cannon had also placed many of his batteries into position and he aggravated a very tempest of bullets by storms a of grape and canister shot. „ll at once this tremendous fire was poured upon Adele-De-Garbes line tearing all his main divisions to pieces and Adele-De-garbe was badly wounded which caused his men to become terror stricken, and hundreds of thousands retreated in utter confusion and many who failed to get away flung down their arms and surrendered.
Bicknell strove vainly to ral y his divisions. Bicknells's surviving divisions in spite of the dreadful artillery and musketry fire which was moving down tens of thousands, rushed bravely on. They now came close to a big angle of works held by general Picksons Calvarinians and Abyssinkilians, and crawling forward under cover of the s oke smoke they rushed up to the very muzzles of the guns, and thousands by the score on both sides now went down. For two hours in that dreadful inferno the christians stuck stuck to the angle of works until it fairly ran with blood, and then they yeilded and fell back, just as a number of fresh artillery arived and opened fire at short range increasing the terrible carnage. „annon and his officers being at hand re rallied the retreating brigades and held them together despite the fierce storm of volleys which weremelting their lines away in a terrible manner. Cannon realised by the beautiful flags of the enemy that the enemy were pushing themselves over the works and as the struggle was becoming more terrific and fierce he sent for his divisions to come to general Pickson Mc-Candinians rescue. His lines were surely melting away before the enemys storm of fire and even the very clothes or uniforms of the soldiers were burjing from the exploding cartru cartridges and by other causes.
Cannon placed all the slightly wounded behind picksons lines with the strict order to shoot the first man who tried to red recoi .
''We must hold out because my divisions will be here directly.''He said.....
Many of the christian cannoneers facing their desperate assailants in a hand to hand fight stubbornly refusing to leave their guns, and so all the cannoneers were gradually annihilated. Picknell began to fear that the battle was lost. The large divisions which had attempted to cover his left had been defeated and driven from the field with woeful losses. Ten main divisions had been cut up and five others com pletely destroyed.

down their guns and raised their arms in token of surrender hundred of thousands of others threw themselves flat on the ground to escape the annihilating fire of the foe but in vain and the rest seeked safty in precipitate flight. In this great battle the total christian losses were not estimated though about nine hundred thousand dead were buried by the enemy some time later. The „landelinian loss was not estimated but nevertheless was found a good deal le loss than the christian losses to one quarter and the „landelinians had captured one million four hundred thousand prisoners and lost in killed about 1,596,223. Toward night the christians who were beaten reached their main line in the rear and their entry into the camp with so many of their wounded created considerable excitement, and when they told their story how they were so disasterously beaten sorrow filled all.
However the anger of all the „landelinian generals knew no bounds, and Picknell reported to general Manley who was making efforts to stop „landelinians advance and he also was very angry and raved like a demon.
''Why this beats anything I ever heard of.''He cried.''To be smitten with such heavy losses by those christian dogs.It is disgusting. It is a good thing that Picknell finally routed them at last for I can hope now to successfully oppose „landelinians advance on pale Calilo. And I will take some measures to have a revenge. That is what I want------revenge.''Almost hissed general Manley to himself.''
It was not long after when general Manley concentrated toward Rossinia began, and while he was concentrating some soldier an officer rode up to general Picknell who was preparing to make an advance on general Hanson and said;
''I have come to ask permission to take a party and go into Flanders and Adrandocallio and sack and burn the houses.''
''You have my permission to do so go, colonel.''Said Picknell.''But your aid. The would will prevent you from going; will it not?''
''No''Fiercely.''It is not dangerous and I should suffer worse if forced to remain behind, than if allowed to go.''
''I no doubtless you are right.''Colonel.''You may go. How many men will you need?''
''I don't suppose I shall need a thousand, but to make assurance doubly sure I think I shall make it two thousand.''
''Very good then. Two thousand it is.Go and make a good job of it, and you may take as many men as you wish colonel. Scourch those infernal christian dogs thoroughly.''
.''''I'll do that.''Answered colonel Darger e viciously.''I understand that those towns protected by the now retreating christian armies are full of women and children, but just the same I'll burn every house and the cities, and shoot down every armed person in the streets and exile the rest to get even for this day of mine.''
''That's the talk colonel.Well I shall expect a good report when you return.''
''You will hear a good report ever time.''
Colonel Darger went forth from general Picknells headquarters well pleased.
''I'll make those Angelinians wish they had not licked my regiment so many times before Picknell finally won.''He muttered.''How to get three thousand men and away. I want to begin this work by midnight.''
He had no trouble in securing the number of men he wished. It ten oclock three h thousand men were advancing to burn Adrandocallio. It was a terribly cold night, and the in their march the „landelinians suffered terribly in that awful cold. At mid night the city was fired but a party of Angelinians a part of general Hansons corps n command came to the rescue, and though the city could not be saved, colonel Darger was worsted in the fight that followed and which raged for seven hours that night both sides losing five hundred in killed and wounded.....

General „ivian had also seen general Picksons danger and massed his reserves on that point but despite the arival of christian reinforcements the enemy held to the angle and there was more severe and incessant fighting for several hours, the Angelinians suffering such woeful losses that general Cannon sent Mc-Candinian to call his shattered forces off to the rear. General Cannon was filled with consternation, and gloomy apprehension for the battle of Flanders was exacting an awful toll of human life lives over thirteen million already having fallen. Then all of a sudden, general Imisons divisions came and rushing to the aid tried in vain to turn resistance into victory, but soon the enemy was swe ing everything before them finally defeating the christians with fearful slaughter. It was the climax of the fierce battle. The brave Angelinians had done their best and their utmost, fighting like tre true spartians, but they were now utterly overpowered, and reduced to the last stages of desperation by the „landelinians they gave up the fight. Many fought fiting nicknail retreated being pursued by a new party of purple capes led by two Angelinian colonels. He quickly took refuge in a house he neared 'n upon will and going up into a tower he raised the curtain which hung over the tower window and peering out saw a big horde of men led by six little girls even approaching furiously a to the house:

"Good heavens what now! Those vivian girls again!" snapped Colonel Darger turning pale while two of his staff officers gave a startled cry:

His Colonel Darger jumped to the electric button and the light shone on the trees at from every window of the house.

"They are after us surely." thought Darger. 'a angry as they have made us and Jehnail we both forgive the vivian girls as what they have done is fair in war; but if they run into my trap with the Angelinians I'll have to precipitate them into deaths river beneath."

Colonel Darger continued to look out of the window until the horsemen had almost reached the house:

"Yes they are the vivian girls." he muttered grinding his teeth: "the little fools fools: It may be the last time I'll see them for they shall have a taste of death's river and all that are with them. I'll show my enemies no mercy when they are bound to capture me."

Soon there came a pounding at the door, and one of his fellow officers cried:

"and "hadn't something better be done: They will break the door in with their muskets: In spite of our secret passages we shall have them on our hands the first thing you know; for my part I don't want to see them up here:"

"Right and you never will." cried the colonel.

He hurried over to one corner of the room and opened a little door as in a partition: The next moment he was sailing down a spanking tube!!!!!!

"Jones, Jones." He shouted: "Let go your cannon fire:" Be quick:

In a few brutes tremendous firing was heard on the outside and a big body of Angelinians dashed forward with the fury of an avalanch and dropping the reigns of their horses back, they clubbed their muskets and carbines as they came in among the Angelinians and laid about them with terrible effect. The clubbed weapons were more effective than sabres, though perhaps not quite so deadly, and the purple coats were bowled over like ten pins: Yet the Angelinians outnumbered the poor Vivianlinians ten to one: The skirmish was a bloody one and the greycoats went down by fifties, and those who had not been shot down whirled and dashed back up the road: as if old Nick and his hordes were after them:

"That settles the Vivianlinians." one of the vivian girls called out. "Now for those inside the house: Follow me: We will have to break in the door:"

A torrent of fierce words burst from Colonel Darger. He stamped down the window and rushed out of the room leaving the door open behind him. A loud crash told him that the door had been broken down before he reached the foot of the tower stairs: Soon he was standing at the top of the flight.

"Gentlemen what do you want?" He shouted. "How dare you try and take me prisoner!"

"We want you Colonel:" the little girls voice answered: "Come down or we will come up and get you:!!!!

"I will not come down to you: I will not give myself up. You are all dead men for coming in:"

Flash he ran his hand along the wall. He seemed to be searching for something with his thumb. Instantly he found it for he pressed hard on the wall.

"Look out the floor is sinking." was one yelled.

This was followed by a wild cry from several others voices which seem to mingle themselves with a curious rattling sound, then where the floor had been yawned a large black pit: Not a one escaped. Violet and her sisters went down with the rest, going down into seemingly endless space. Down down went the little girls, then a mil ion stars seemed to dance before their eyes and they knew no more: Rush

Violet and her sisters came to they discovered that a lurid glow seemed to fill the small cavern and Violet who staggered to her feet looked down. Far perhaps downward perhaps a thousand feet she saw a stream of light and looking more closely they saw flowing water down below. Her sisters now sitting up also saw the strange light and crawled carefully to the edge of the abyss:

"My what a narrow escape!" said Jennie with a shudder.

"The others must have went down all the way alright." said Jules.

"I believe we are the only ones saved." said Violet with a feeling of horror:

"It was a struggle light behind. I wonder where it leads to."

"I hope it leads to safety." said Angeline, while her other sisters felt quite queer:

"Let's go and see." Hendried cautiously.

"That surely is a river of death down there." said Helga. "I must be an ancient river orifice or crevasse under the old house. And you know we are not far from the enemys positions either."

The little girls moved cautiously forward toward the light and entered a mountainous cave illumined by some strange ruddy glow. It seemed to be of endless end or length and the hardened rocks showed them that it was no doubt a passage or tunnel for the abode of some gigantic subterranean creatures, or one of the passages to that leads to their abode. On their left side an orebus darkness or opening was exposed as black that a wheel ran through them nevertheless proceeding up the courage they decided to explore it and so lighted a couple of matches which they had with them. They believed themselves lost in a cavern belonging to the creatures and the little girls did not know what to do. To get out the way they fell in was impossible for there was no means to climb. Within cavern on their front seemed more lighted than the others, and going into it they saw that the floor ascended very steeply:

"Let's climb up." said Jules: "It may lead to some exit:"

They started to do so and after ascending for several minutes found another dark opening.

"We must light a match and see where this leads to." said Violet. "We have got to be careful that we do not fall into some big hole:"

Jules struck three but it was not enough to penetrate that awful blackness.

"It's funny, let's try a rock." Declared Jennie: "If it doesnot fail then we know it's a passage:"

They found a big rock that was loose and they pushed it in but it did not descend, but rolled onward with a thunderous roar. They now went in and found that it descended abruptly. They had to be careful but soon they entered another cavern with a large crack in the ceiling. In making a careful investigation they found it was all the further they could go because across the whole floor was a seemingly bottomless abyss.

"Maybe we can get out by climbing those rocks." Advised Violet: "Let's try anyway. It's our only chance of escape:"

They discovered that the climbing was quite difficult difficult but at last they reached the crack and were soon outside again in the total darkness. Violet and her sisters became radiantly happy and a hand shake attested their mutual pleasure for they could see stars shining overhead. They decided to make a pilgrimage of the seemingly walled up plain:

"It seems to shape like some gruesome plum pudding." said Hettie:

"I thought it was a circle walled plain slightly inclined to the southwest." Declared Daisy:

"No it's like a plum pudding alright." said Jules: "It's hulling in the center, and falling away s/e along the south to northwest edges:"

"I believe that the greatest depth of this semicircular depression of whatever it is likewise has its lowest point:" exclaimed Jennie:

The little girls began to leap from one mass mass to another and descended to the lowest point of the annular valley eight hundred and fifty yards below its wall:

"What's all that smoke over yonder?" Asked Jennie:

"Let's go and see:" said Jules Jules:

They could not go near as they could hardly breathe as the air here was pungent: But they saw that a, along the whole of whirlwinds there were spouting jets of smoke rising in the air in long white plumes: These jets were all pungent of sulphurious and the ground around was strewn and carpeted with beautiful floral designs, and in yellow and red, which in being touched broke into pieces: It was impossible to bring away a specimen: The bottom was traversed in every direction by hundreds of small cracks concealed by sand: On striking the ground with their feet the sand fell away and the slits were exposed for a length of several yards: But to climb to safety they now started to do: The first stretch was that of something that looked by the dark like a old shandelids: During the climbing of this landscape the little girls experienced the tortures of fatigue and thirst, and then after a four and half hour of intolerable fatigue increased beyond measure by the insufferable cold and the sense of suffocation produced by the sulphurious and hydrochloric gases the little girls had to stop: Their breath came more and more in gasps owing to the efforts of climbing, the r deficiency of oxygen and the presence of deadly poisons in the air: In another half an hour which seemed an internity this torment came to an end: To climb up the hill of phoenix rocks became by comparison a winged one, and reaching the top they rested for a while: The air here was fresh and sweet, and they inhaled it as a starving man does bread: In another half hour they descended the rise of ground and went on their way soon to run into a thick wood: As Violet and her sisters proceeded on their way they noticed the sky was getting lighter up by a far distant forest fire set probably by some of the christian armies to prevent the enemy from renewing their attack until the christian forces could make a change of positions: Two or three wild wolves ran across their path causing a chill to run through the little girls and to save themselves they almost shot the dogs: Fired out and unmanly air slowly the vivian girls thinking that after all there was not much danger prepared to find a place to spend the night, and were still thinking when they were startled by a sound that faint as it was made them jump as if it had been a sudden thunder clap: It was only the snapping of a twig on the other side of the road, but they could not see what it was, because the red glare of the distant forest fire made the darkness more confusing:

It happened so slightly, but of course the little girls knew it did not move by itself: For several minutes they almost held their breath breath and listened but now everything was deadly still:

Presently they heard a soft foot fall and their hearts seemed to leap into their mouths. The little girls were worse frightened than they had been in all their lives. They were alone in a dark Calverinian jungle with somebody or something, or probably sneaking Glandelinian sharshooters or snipers. A terrible ghostly presence that filled them with dread. If they could only reach their pistols but they had dropped them at the first sound, over by a tree and that foot fall had sounded in that direction. They stood perfectly still drawn up against the wall of some house afraid to move a foot. The little girls had turned cold and were in the utter helpless condition that had ever come upon them in their lives. Listening intently as they were their senses were quickened untill they could hear sounds that would make no impression upon them under ordinary circumstances. In a little while they heard that stealthy step only a little distance away between them and the stone wall. Hurriedly they stole away involuntarily tip toeing and trying to be as stealthy as their unknown she enemy, and feeling their way about the wall, they suddenly stumbled over something, and Violet's hand fell upon an open match box full of matches.

It may be imagined how she gripped it, and with what care she struck one of the matches, and when it was once fiarly burning she raised it up and looked across the road to where---heaven---and---earth---the match fe/ fell from her hand and went out leaving Violet and her sisters in the dark with the fiercest Gargolian fiend they had ever seen. Goddod---and the woods was swarming with these worse of Glandelinians.

Their hearts beat so loudly that they could hear it distinctly and for a little while it was the only sound in the jungle at this spot. Then the stealthy gliding and the grimpers it began again, and here and there went the little girls trying to keep as far away as possible from the terrible Glandelinian who with his comrades were circling around them. Their condition was such a desperate one that at first they did not think of any hope of escaping. They had even forgotten about their pistols untill happening to touch one with their foot they remembered them. Hastily stooping they snatched the pistols of the ground. A deep long grown of rage greeted the movement and a sound followed that made the little girls think that the wicked Glandelinian was prepr preparing to spring. They braced themselves against the wall held the pistols read and waited. But the shock did not come. They were to endure the agony of suspense longer or still longer I mean. Again the gliding motion began signalled by soft foot falls or by here and there the loud snapping of a twig as the Glandelinin Glandelinian crushed it with his foot is in passing. This kept up i untill the little girls felt it utterly impossible to endure it no longer. They were good shots and what is better quick ones. They resolved to fire their pistols in the gloom, and having located the Glandelinian by the first flash to give him the benifit of the otther other barrels. It was a desperate chance but if ever a man was justified in taking desperate chances the little girls were at that time. Bracching themselves against the wall the little girls fired.

The flashes showed them the Glandelinian almost a yard away in front of them with body lowered and cruel hea hooded head t thrust forward. They never forgot the picture potographed before their eyes by those four and seven flashes of light. Before one could think almost they had followed those first seven shots with seven others directed at seven or eight terrible creatures who then made a spring in a body one of them bearing Violet to y the ground as though she had been a cat.

But even as she fell she had presence of mind enough to empty the pistol into the Glandelinian soldiers body as the fool ocure couched upon her preparing to seize her throat in his hands, and by some fortunae chance one of those shots struck a vital point, and with a savage roar and curse the Glande.linian rolled awny from her and lay stretched upon the ground in a pool of blood. In the meantime as quick as a flash another of the monsterous Glandelinians had fastened his teeth on Jennies wrist driving them clean to the bone. In an instant the woods was in an uproar of yells while the maddened Gargolian brute bit and tor tore at g the childs arm while her screams for help rang through the jungle!

''Joice, Joice take him offalle is killing me.''Screamed Jennie.

And Joice running to Jennie's assistance seized the big Gargolian by the throat with her little hands and tried with all her childish strength to shock the human beast in order to open his jaws, but she might as well have tried to strangle a tiger. She did then what weal few men would have done, thrust her hands into the brutes mouth, and by a superhuman effort wrenched the terrible jaws apat. It was just at this moment that another Gargolian sprang for Joice, and the next in tant the new comer had seized her by the throat with his hairy arms and while shocking her drove his savre across her arm. Jennie now free from the grasp of the first human monster when she shot rushed to Joices aid but she could render but little assistance as both her hands were seemingly torn to pieces, and then to make matters worse the brute threw one arm around her by the abdomen and hugged so tightly that from the pain she almost fainted. At this moment there was a sudden storm of shots, an then a dozen men appeared and rushing to the rescue beat the fierce brutes into insensibility with clubbed guns . The three victims were carried from the jungle persued by the foe all the way to the christian lines which however they reached in safty.

At the christian lines a doctor was in attendance and found that Jennie's thumb was almost torn from her hand. The tendons were completely severed and there was a dozen severe wounds reaching from the tip of the fingers far up on her shoulder her whole arm having been bitten. The wounds made by the teeth of the Glandelinian looked as if they had been inflicted by some dragon so badly was the flesh torn and lacerated, and the blood flowed in streams streams. Every one of the wounds had to be sewed up a very painful process and the arm placed in a sling. Violet and Joice was the next attended to and then they were taken to the main interior of the christian lines, as the wounds had to be properly attended to or blood poisoning would setin.

''We will have to hurry.''Remarked one of the men as dawn was breaking.''That distant fire is traveling twelve miles an hour and we will be caught sure!'

They hurried along as fast as they could but went with sweat despite the cold of that march season they had to rest every now and then.

''My such cold weather for the month of March.''Said the leader who was a captian after renting for several minutes.

They soon started on their way again and soon reached the christian lines. The wounds of the children were promptly attended to.

''How did it come to happen?''Asked general Hanson vivian of little Angeline who with Hettie, daisy and the rest escaped unharmed.

Angeline related all that happened from the beginning of the part where they persued Bicknell to the last.

''Good gracious so Bicknell precipitated you little girls into a death trap. It's lucky you escaped the watery abyss.''

Since a number of days had passed the vivian girls were able to be around again and forgot their experiences and not long after general Hanson who was now far seperated from general vivian on account of the defeat at Flanders and now with a stronger force than he had ever collected during his further advances, happened to hear of the advance of the other section of general Zimmermanns army who were going tward Madge Evans and Julo Callio and who had decided to strike against a big Glandelinian army of Bohbonites under general Plantery and Pugar Purgatorian Bicknell and so decided to warn him of his rashness and to also reinforce this army if possible. In a few days on March the 13th general Hanson learned that the army was encamped near Rossanna Hogan and so hurried his army to reinforce it before the fierce Zimmermanns came up. During the even Violet and her sisters even Jennie despite her bandaged arm and hand learned as they went out scouting that their brothers Germaine vivian and Jimmie with Gertrude Angeline and Jennie Zimmer had been persued by a large force of Glandelinians and by bringing up a large detatchment of christians had caused the capture of many of the Glandelinians While out scouting the little girls indeed came within reach of Bicknells army and hiding behind some queer looking plants listened to the conversation within the nearest tents.

''Well it's the only way to check the christian advance on Madge Evans and that is do the same as the other Bicknell and his army did at Flanders.''They heard a voice say.''General Hanson is now seperated from general vivian, the other Glandelinian army is moving back to make a junction with Johnston Manley, and if we can force general Wienstions army from Rossanna Hogan we will be able to move our armies in a body and scatter the vivians, and then if we are successful in this we will be able to cut off these christian armies from Zimmermann entirely and thrash him.''

This is all that the little girls wanted to hear. This alarmed them and quickly they dashed away, but one of the guards saw them, and after firing a shot yelled;

''Spies, spies.''

''General Bicknell happened to ride up at this moment and followed by some of his staff officers he inquired what the excitement was about and then he saw the little girls dashing away and yelled to some of the men standing gaping there;

''Get after them boys and don't go to sleep about it either.''

Instantly without taking time to saddle their horses the men led by a captian mounted and dashed away full speed making the snow fairly fly. In the meantime Bicknell fearing that the little girls were dangerous spies when persued, decided to arouse his whole line in his hopes to make the christians see his military front and he was not at all sprurpused that they escaped the death trap which he had heard the colonel in the other Bicknells army had precipitated them into, for he felt sure they would despite the seemingly impossibility of doing it.

Adele-De-Garbe who was in the other army was however blamed for their escape.

Some of the other officers went to their orderlies and said;

''Saddle the fastest horses you can find and bring them here. Also notify the signal stations and send whole squadrons in persuit. Those spies must be caught at all costs. They must not get away.''

Bicknell in the meantime r wo wrote a message and going into one of his private telegraph offices said to the operator;

''Telegraph this message al over the region in our possession. Several spies have escaped after hearing of my intentions mentioned by some foolish officers, and they must be caught at all hazards. I'll punish those officers for talking like that out loud.''

A ''All right your excellency.''Said the operator.''I'll do so right away.''

And so he started to work.

In the meantime the horsemen dashed down the road and seeing the fugitives halting, Captian Hooligan ordr ordered his best officers under cover and as they obeyed seven shots rang out simultaneously. Then the fugitives sped on but the Glandelinians desperate human fiends as they were had sped down the other roads expecting to capture the vivian girls by the ruse but suddenly ran into Gertrude Angeline, Jennie Turner and three Calvgrinian boyscouts. There was at once some shots exchanged between them and then the Glandelinians seeing a troop of more boyscouts coming beat it Gertrude Angeline and Jennie Turner alone shooting down sixymen.

In the meantime the persuid of the vivian girls was continued and realizing what was going on and of the appearance of the foes Gertrude Angeline and her companions scattered with the purpose of going to the aid of violet and her sisters.

''Go this way.''Said Happy Hooligan pointing to a road leading to a railroad track.''You others hide in ambush.We got to capture them or the battle will be lost.''

Several men remained in the road where the vivian Girls were last seen but several minutes passed and they did not appear.

''I guess they have discovered my intentions.''Said Happy Hooligan.''But by the name of heaven they have got to be captured.''

''And if they are are still at large I will shoot myself.''Said another.

''We may fail despite just what you said but the message will cause their capture sooner or later.''Said Captian Hooligan.

Just then the sound of galloping horses was heard and the men and officers rapidly drew out of sight hiding with the rest in ambush. The sound of horses rapidly drew nearer and a large force of Concentinian cavarly rapidly came in sight led by a colonel. Instantly the woods seemed ablazed and a regular infernno o inferno seemed to have broken out. Down went many hundreds of Angelinians in a few minutes and as they could not seetheir foes the survivors broke into a panic.

''Ten thousand furies ''Roared the colonel.''At them. Don't recoil.'I'll kill the first man who does.''

The men tried to rally, and as the main body came up they succeeded and though again they went down by hundreds they pressed onward, and the Glandelinians facing over-whirlming numbers were compelled to retire.

In the meantime violet and her sisters were crossing a cornfield having turned off from the road and one of the persuing regiments came into sight led by A Lieutenant Adele-De-Barbe and two generals Ebacnk and the old timer Estrabrook. Despite the height of the corn the little girls were discovered and captian Estrabrook Failen suddenly dashed forward yelling to them to stop.

''Never''Cried violet and she dropped him with one shot.

In a few minutes the little girls had disappeared in a dark pine forest.

''No stone shall be left un upturned to run these treacherious vipers down.''

Said Adele-De-Barbe fuming with rage and still ignorant of the real character of the fugitives.''I'll get them if I have to sack the whole woods, or even rake it with a fine comb.''

''I guess you won't though.''Said another.''See. They are firing the trees. See all that smoke!''

Another officer just then came riding up and saw the flames.

''We have been betrayed, bunco buncoed, hoodwick hoodwinked, tricked, duped, flimflammed bamboozled, connesed, kidded and sold.''Roared the colonel as the fire began to throw a bgi bright glare.''But keep up the persuit. Stanok you go on after them. I need you Garbe.I'm going back and prepare for the attack on the new christian army before those little devils reach the christian lines and give the christian dog of a general a warning.''

And off he and Adele-De-Barbe dashed at break neck speed. In the meantime all of the three Manleys had heard of the movements of the three great christian armies in his location but being far away from Bicknells columns and so he sent the Bicknell an order to attack right away and not allow Zimmermann to make a junction with Wienstien.

THE BATTLE OF ROSSANA HOGAN.
MARCH 16TH.

The Glandelinian troops mostly Hobbonites were advancing when some of the new generals with their forces arived and at Bicknells orders they quickly took command ordering general Adele-De-Barbe to advance his own forces to the attack on the first dawn of day on the morrow. The night was calm and quiet and then the attack was prepared for.

The city of Rossana Hogan is located about twelve miles away from Jennie Turner the latter being about ten miles away from Madge Evans and Julo Callio. Should Zimmermann be successful in his advance the besiegers at Julo Callio and Norma Catherine would be reinforced.And this is what Bicknell was ordered to prevent.

As soon as morning came Adele-De-Barbe prepared for the advance.

''Forward.''He shouted to his men.''We must attack before those spies warn general Wienstien.They could not have reached the christian lines ju jet after losing themselves in the jungle.''

What a yell the Glandelinians set up at this command. In a few hours they were all in motion and were by noon in reach of Wienstiens lines. But it was too late to attack on the fifteen of march and the attack was posponed for the next day. But the next day all was in radi readiness.

''Go slow at the first.''Warm warned general Bicknell to his officers.''I have learned that general Hanson has reinforced the army under Wienstien.''

''That is right''Said general Adele-De-Barvbe.''Those Angelinian dogs may be on the alert.''

Some of the generals went forward with a party to find out the lay of the situation.

''All is clear.''Said one of them coming back.

''All right.''Answered Bicknell.''Order the attack.''

The officers went back to their respective commands and sounded the word for attack, by giving a loud catcall.

Instantly the whole line rushed forward like a monsterous surge and in a few minutes a portion of general Wienstiens rear was in a panic. He saw the commotion from his headquarters and went forth to see what was the cause. Ariving to the scene he was amazed.

''Bayonets, men bayonets.''He cried.

But it was of no use as the enemys lines were too solid.Never before was Wienstien in such a rage. He stormed and stormed at the men and soon succeeded in rallying portions of the line and as the other divisions came up to the rescue on the double quick the attack of the foe was temporiarly checked, though the firing on both sides became terrific. In a few hours nearly the whole force of Bicknells army was on the attack and general Hansons whole right grand division was rolled up and displaced.

In the meantime general Luckwick Baldwin having brought up his divisions sent word for his main division to come on and after they arived, embushed a portion of the attackers, and drove them back pellmell and thus rescued the right grand division. There was a lull then for a time in the battle the enemy having retreated but at twelve thirty Baldwin who was moving his forces forward tward Rossana Hogan encountered general Adele-De-Barbes forces of Hobbonites. In a few hours the scene was again one of the most frightful carnage Baldwins divisions themselves assailing the Glandelinians with the fury of demons, and cutting the whole of Adele-De-Barbes force to pisces and scatter ing them in frightful panic. Baldwins divisions pushed on encountering another Glandelinian division and drove the right wing back torn to pieces also fairly paving the field and plains with dead and wounded graycoats. The fight was desperate in the extreme but the Glandelinians finally broke and fled.

''Forward boys.''Shouted Baldwin.''Give them hell boys.''

Yelling fiercely the Angelinians swept upon the retreating Glandelinian columns, but while they were progressing forward they drove themselves upon the enemys line which extended for the length of ten miles and which suddenly seemed to turn into a blasting furnace from their artillery and muskatry fire. The foremost purple coats went down in lines, and ten generals were wounded, butthe survivors rushed on too swiftly to be opposed successfully and drove in the Glandelinian wave under general Adeledogareb and another divisions under general Adolo-De-garbres sweeping them way across the plains of Webbs and soon the whole region was covered with dead and wounded of both sides though the christians captured two whole brigades of Glandelinians.

But unfortunately Baldwins success did not last. S Six million seven hundred thousand Glandelinians under Major general Richard Henry Logan came up to the rescue, and during the lull the forces that were routed were rallied and reformed, and then as the Angelinians resumed the assault the whole Glandelinian force raksd Baldwins lines with a searching fire. Baldwins men were desciminated in large legions, and then counter attacked simultaneously on the left flank the survivors fairly fled being cut down in myriads by their wily foes.

Baldwin was wounded and all his staff were down one third of them killed and the rest wounded there being twenty generals in all. General John. BFaisn of Baldwins command was also killed in trying to rally the men, and despite the severity of his wounds Baldwin retained his command and restored some order in his panic stricken lines. In the meantime general Hanson sent a portion of wienstiens force to the rescue of Baldwins divisions the whole christian line roaring and thundering in hellicose fury as the Glandelinians made a desperate sweeping attack, and poor Bicknell seeing his men go down in thousands had to withdraw again but during the lull once more, placed his artiolery which had arived into immediate atction.

Seeing this withdrawel of the foe general Jennings pushed his forces forward, but before his division got very far Jennings was borne off the field dangerously wounded, while general John joseph . Stanley of the same command was killed. The division therefore had to be withdrawn before it got galled. Several brigades of Glandelinians had at the same time been caught under a deadly infilade from Hansons guns at another quarter and were routed.

Bicknell now made preparations for another onset, and after an hour the foe came on in ever greater numbers seven hundred machine guns being trained upon the nearest columns and as they let loose whole multitudes of Glandelinians went down before thnat withering fire.
Yet general Hanson feared that his whole line would be broken because though he out numbered the enemy greatly the foe nevertheless attacked with the most impatient fericoty. Along general Hansons center the enemy made the fiercest attack and the plains along his front were covered anew with the dead and wounded of both sides.
"Hold the line at all hazards was his orders." The other forces of my command left behind may hear the battle and come to our rescue."
The divisions which had been displaced were now rallied after a short lull and as the battle was soon resumed once more it increased with redoubled fury as general Senguine, and Maurice Costellio and other generals with their divisions came to the aid. The din was dreadful and one large Glandelinian brigade sweeping through a portion of the woods encountered a deadly fussilade of three hundred cannon and were soon cut to fragments and were compelled to withdraw. Indeed general Hanson was making poor general Bicknell pay dearly in blood for attacking his really overwhelming numbers. With the arival of evening the battle after another lull was again in full sway. Even this great charge of the enemy was torn to pieces and the survivors routed and then night time coming out closed the battle for the day.....

On the morrow the battle was resumed again by theconemy making a general concentration in overwhelming numbers against Hansons lines and striking simultaneously upon the other christian wings under general Wienstien as well. In the meantime during the conflict a number of generals coming up with reinforcements was aroused by the heaviest firing they had ever heard but wounded as they were for their wounds in the days battle before had been severe they were bewildered but realized that if the battle must be won they must thrown their colu ns in at any cost. It was almost dawn before they succeeded in getting their commands into motion and then the firing had increased to a regular holl of sound and the enemys yells seemed to echoe like the scream of a million tora tornadoes raging at one time.
"I Believe that general Bicknell has resumed the attack before we could see what was best to be done." Said general Francis Schmidt.
"Yes but what is the matter with general Vivian as unopposed as he is he ought to be able to come up and reinforce general Hanson." Declared general Anfdeline..
"Why don't he come? What is holding him!" Said general Joice.
"I believe he is making a slow advance on account of tnothe deep snow." Said general Jennings. "We failed to warn general Hanson of the foes intention of hulring overwhelm ing numbers against him alone and attacking tne others so they could not come to his aid, but how about some of us sending a message to general Vivian and telling him and causing him to hurry."
"I guess we had beste batter do so." Said general Herring. "I know how to telegraph and I know his whereabouts."
The generals started some of their telegraph men tward the nearest telegraph stations but found it in flames.. They however managed to rush into the building and despite the danger of the flames sent it out just before the wires were destroyed.
In the meantime while the battle was raging several of the officers had been spotted by the graycoats and there was a heavy skirmish but the foe were worsted. Simultaneously Violet and her sisters who had been out scouting were spotted by the foe cavarly under Colonel Shott.
"Look out for those graycoats." Cried Catherine. "Don't let them see us."
"The Vivian girls..The vivian girls, they as spying on us again.The Vivian Girls. The vivian girls." Cried the Glandelinians and quickly the little girls dashed away, the Glandelinians precipitating themselves after them in a headlong rush yelling and furing in a confused volume of scund. Violet and her sisters saw that the Glandelinians were too near to be comfortable and they hastily turned and hid behind some trees. Violet opened fire first bring down two men. The other Glandelinians halted and began to return the fire and as violet and all her sisters now opened fire the shooting became a fussilade.
Every shot that the little girls fired, one of the Glandelinians dropped and the leader was amas m amazed. Violet and her sisters saw that the only means to escape was to set the tall grass on fire as the wind was blowing tward the enemy in a stiff gale and here the snow had disappeared as spring weather was on again. Drawing several matches from the box violet even under a hot fire secured some paper scattered about, and soon had started a little blaze which became a furnace in a few minutes and enveloped with black smoke the Glandelinians became bewildered.
"Drat those little imps." The leader cried. "They are tricky."
In the confusion the little girls again mounted their horses and dashed away in another direction within good hearing of the distant battle. For two hours they themselves tried to send word to their father by tepegraph but every telegraph officer they came to was on fire.

At last reaching their own lines violet said;
"One of us must ride for general Vivian our papa. It is a dangerous task for the enemy are swarming everywhere, and she who goes will have to pass through the enemys firing lines at that." Added violet sadly. Then after much debate Violet said finally as neither one of us would dare take the risk for fear of losing each other for good, we'll send one of the men and if no man will go I'll go myself. You my sisters take your boyscouts as many as possible and warn general Hanson."
"But it is exceedingly dangerous" Said Joice. "When you cross the enemys firing lines you will be riddled with bullets."
"I'll take care." Said Violet. "And I have doubts that it will happen as I'll xonfuse them by a wild dash. But I'll try to get a soldier to go first."
Two soldiers went, then three, then six each at a time but were brought back mortally wounded.
s Seeing this Violet said;
"James get me the fastest steed."
James not knowing what she was going to do obeyed and Violet astonished him and frightened him by dashing off where the wounded men had gone. He immediately got another horse a d raced after her with the intention of catching her and preventing her from doing the dangerous atunt. Violet's steed galloped like a race horse and many of the Angolinians seeing what her intention was stepped into the road with presented a bayonets ordering her sternly to go back and not attempt it but she shouted to them to get out of the way and seeing that they did not obey she drew her guns and ordered the men out of the way. The men had to obey Violet dashing on but soon she was persued by nearly fifty Angolinians. She soon reached the firing line of Costellioes divisions and riding through their lines and crossing the works rode at breakneck speed tward the enemys firing line before the christians knew what she waw about. Many yelled to her to stop and some tried to shoot her horse donw to save her from making the rash move but in vain. Fortunately for her so thick was the smoke of battle that she was not seen by the enemy ,ut untill she was almost upon them. Then seeing her come at such speed the Glandelinians at that point she was headed for thought it was an irrestible chag charge led by the little girl and several hundred Glandelinians broke into a panic and scattered. ,ut the others as she passed their line in a rush fired a rolling volley after her bringing down her horse, and several bullets hit her two glancing from her head and then as the enemy fired again as she rushed away on foot a bullet cut a gash in her wrist and a last hit her in the tigh. She was severely wounded but managed to get onward though now followed swiftly by half a dozen foes.
In the meantime general Costellioes lines recoiled as he heard general Hansons line was overwhelmed and falling back and retreating reached an unoccupied line of works which they decided to stand to the last. The roar of battle along Costellioes line was soon at its height and general Joice who was in command on the right could seevthat Bicknells divisions all Hobinites were rushing forward with irrestible fury yelling with an earsplitting din. There was one crash of volleys which tore the enemys whole line to shreds but on rushed the survivors and one large division a portion of general Logans was advancing past but within slight sight of Joices lines and alarming of the plight of general Baldwins divisions on the day before he first gave fierce resistance for two hours tearing thirteen waves of Glandelinians to mangled pieces, but was at last forced to withdraw his columns to the shelter of his main line of artillery which walled his position in smoke clouds from thevfierce and incessant discharge.
Adele-De-Barbe was also advancing his forces with terrific fury and general Joice realized that genral Costellio could not check them as general Logan was pressing in on his right flank.
"To save our line from being hurled back we must take desperate chances and that is counter charge those screaming human fiends." Thought general Joice.
So waving his sabre he gave the signal forward charge to his generals and in a moment the amazed Glandelinians saw a large surge of Angelinians rushed tward them at the most terrific pace supported by a dashing fleet of Concenntinian cavarly and dragoons.
"Those dare devil tigers under the generals connected with the vivian Girl beauties." Roared general Adele-De-Barbe in a fearfulerage. "Bayonets he screamed. I" Impale those purple and red coated demons. Those who have not bayonets load and fire as fast as hell will let you.."
On came the wave of christians but for a time they were slightly checked by that bristling wall of bayonets but general Ji joice seeing that they were rods apart ordered the men on and they crashed through the Glandelinian column like a tearing whirlwind Adele-De-Barbes line being fairly withered by this daring charge and general Logan was among the wounded. Following this deadly onrush came a fearful fire of muskets and other firearms of both sides at close range for a moment then the glandelinians wavered and recoiled. The Angelinian survivors pressed on despite the awful havoc among the line and Adele-De-Barbe d strove with the desperation of a demon to rally his line but seeing that it was useless as Costellioes line had joined in the bloody counter attack and had fairly ripped themselves through other portions of the Turmerannian line, and were also supported by cavarly which had rode clean through at every point Adele-De-Barbe decided to fall back out of the seething inferno and recede under cover.

Over this disaster to the enemy general Hanson had in the meantime hopes of restoring considerable order in his lines as Wienstien had held successfully against thirteen assaults by eight million foes, but his own line had been losing ground inch by inch. All the artillery all along the christian line were in spasomidic action and Bicknell also was suffering awful losses for his advantages, and seeing what had happened to Adele-De-Barbes and Logans columns Bicknell had to withdraw his forces from the attack on Wienstien and concentrate more heavily upon general Hanson and Joice. It was already noon and still general Vivian did not come though already he had been long advancing with his armies and in the deadly calm of the warm spring day he heard queer rumbling sounds far away. Halting he waited untill Kindernine and Senguine came up and then he said;

"I've heard queer mysterious sounds for several hours already. I wonder what it is? Besides it sounds very uncanny."

"Listen." Said general Kindernine.

General Vivian listened but heard no other sound but that which he mentioned before."

"I hear the galloping of a horse." Said Kindernine. "Something is up."

The troops were passing general Vivian and as he started on again a horse burst into view with a little girl riding it. The horse was coming on at a terrific rate and at first general Vivian had thought that the little girl who ever she was had lost control of the horse and ordered several officers to race to her aid.

"I'm alright except for a few wounds." Shouted the little girl whom they had discovered was Violet Horseof. "But general Ha---o ha--------Hanson. He----he-----he-----is overwhelmed." She gasped.

"Hanson my own brother overwhelmed!" Cried general Vivian. "Where at?"

"A-a-a-a-----a----at----r----r----r----r----r-ssana Hogan." Gasped Violet all out of wind. B-b-b-b--nell is overwhelmed by the foe also and the foe Bicknell is attacking him in all his force and might and xoncentrating against Wienstien so no aid can be sent him."

"Goodness gracious." Exclaimed general Vivian. "General Kindernine. Order all my cavarly forces to Rossanna Hogan right away and at all speed." "I'll quickly follow with the infantry."

General Kindernine rushed off to obey and in a quarter of an hour all of the cavarly were racing each other for Rossanna Hogan.

"Crambra go to it." Shouted general Kindernine. "Give them hell boys when you get there."

In the meantime general Bicknell fearing reinforcements put in all his energy to oust general Hanson but general Hanson was just as determined to hold his own and he continued his resistance. Adele-De-Barbes divisions had retreated tward the east bank of the Viviania creek which was held by general Daimenena with a large force and which was reinforced by general Purgatorian Bicknell who threw all things to the winds, and soon the Glandelinians by din t of courage and energy s checked the onward rush of Joices and Costellioes forces whose lines however in halting withering the foe with a deafening uproar of musketry.

"Stand your ground boys." Shouted general Joice. "General Vivian will come to our rescue yet."

The men filed themxolves behind the captured works and began thinning the enemys lines in a most terrible manner. Yet Adele-De-Barbe swore to be avenged and ordered his men to rally and recapture that line of works at all costs. Filled with more determination the Glandelinians made a tremendous charge and swept over the works the full length and b back were thrown the Angelinians. General Hansons columns were also wavering and general Hanson began to believe that general Vivian was too far to come to the rescue or to hear the firing. The carnage was also becoming overpowering and every moment there seemed danger of general Hansons army being rolled up from the field.

"This is terrible" Said general Hanson. "General vivian my brother is too slow. I'll have to notify h him by wireless to come quick or suffer the consequences if I lose the battle."

As several lines of works were carried he sped to the scene of great confusion and tried with the help of his officers to rally them but to no purpose. It was already twelve o-clock and now general Hansons whole line was giving way. Yet Bicknell was meeting with more serious resistance and had a hard time in forcing the Angelinians back. At twelve thirty over three million seven hundred and thirty seven thousand horsemen suddenly arived and as they crashed through the enemys line the Glandelinians began to become disheartened but general Bicknell was determined, and this determination made the Glandelinians win the battle despite the threatening arival of general Vivian which of course did not happen for he was immediately opposed and his army blocked at the stream called Norma's Run though no fighting actually occured there as yet.

Bicknell ordered his divisions to stand firm and they did raking down ranks of the newcomers. Then as more and more of the cavarly arived the fire of the christians became extremly deadly, and the first of the christian cavarly made a desperate charge rolling up Bicknells right wing and cutting it to pieces and drove it across the Viviania creek and back for two miles clear from their own works and upon Rossanna Hogan with a field of their dead and wounded behind. My what a rage Bicknell was in. Adele-De-Barbe had been wounded twice with his aid general Adele-De-Garbe also and both were borne from the field. General Ea Estrabrook Carter had was killed in trying to check the onward rush of the cava cavarly forces and scores of others whose names were not mentioned were killed and wounded. Bicknells other two wings however held and one of these was extended to flank the attackers who were routing the other wing, and now as general Hanson began to rally and reform his lines the battle which had again lulled during this scene of confusion and change in formation of lines now grew worse again/ and soon the uproar was redoubled to that of before.

"Charge those black hatted devils." Shouted Hanson "forward don't waver under any condition."

The Angelinians pressed forward columns of more cavarly chargeing through and through the enemys line and Bicknells herculean attack was temporiarly checked and thrown back again with the most frightful slaughter. Again for four hours without respite literal hell seemed to have continued between the two lines and from the enemy an indescribable chaoes of yells broke out with a deafening din, and a million thunderstorms, an extra number of cloudbursts, tornadoes, cyclones, typhoons and hurricanes mingled in one mad whirl of unchained contending forces would not match the fury of such a wild storm of Glandelinian yells.

Yet nevertheless the gray columns were again giving way, and then up came more of general Kindernines divisions and what a consterba consternation broke out among the Glandelinians. In fifteen minutes at several points though the Angelinians were carrying all before them, general Kindernine giving advises for a general persuit wishing to crush general Bicknell before his main forces would arive. But now Bicknells main line of batteries put in their say with great violence and down went the Angelinians down in score of masses. Shot and shell burst among their long ranks with frightful bewildering rapidity killing hundreds and wounding thousands in a minutes time and the canister which was added caused deadful losses in officers in all rank.

"Charge that g battery." Roared Kindernine. "We will need those guns to charge on general Manleys army when we fight him again."

With loud shots the survivors rushed tward the batteries and by a spirited assault soon captured the guns and turned them upon the fleeing b Glandelinians. One portion of the line of batteries still held and they volleyed and thundered in a deafening grandeur as if the planets were being dashed to pieces into hell. Large and overwhelming divisions also stormed these and soon one quarter of Bicknells armies were in flight, the Angelinians in full persuit yelling like demons themselves in a universal uproar.

Soon large columns were seen wavering at other points and two wounded generals James Micheal Bellion and Henry Senguine came riding up from the direction of the swiftly a retiring columns and reported that the main line was advancing to general Bicknells rescue, and that general Kindernines army had been reduced to fragments and that he was retiring before overwhelming numbers. Then general Hanson ordered a halt and sent large squads to lay waiste to the farms and fields and woods and grassy plains and to set them on fire to delay Bicknells columns untill most of the captured artillery could be withdrawn. Also general Hansons intention was to cause general Bicknells advancing reinforcements to run into an ambuscade but this was a failure though the guns about three quarters of them were withdrawn. The main columns coming up had checked a part of Bicknells columns that was in confusion amid a horrible March Thunderstorm that suddenly came up the rain setting in and increased like a cloud burst proceeded by bright flashes of lightning and horrible outbursts of thunder which added to the frightful uproar of the battle.

General Hanson was a wise man however and did not intend to let the two Bicknells continue the attack that day but decided to assume the offensive himself and capture another line of works and the rest of the batteries if he could. Bicknell was not prepared to meet the attack but his new divisions were well formed, and the first line of attack which extended for ten miles was almost cut to pieces before the survivors drew off with three generals Standard Stanley, Evannia Stanley, and James Stanley all brothers severely wounded. Yet the main forces soon swept to the attack again and again the battle was again in full sway and division upon division was cut up and rolled back time and again only to go at it once more despite their awful losses. Twice Kindernine who brought his main forces forward suffered his main commands to be rolled back crushed and mingled with a quarter of their number down two times but general Hanson sent all the available forces he could spare and now the fury of the wild battle increased minute by minute. Costellioe was killed, Cosellion was also killed, general Slater was wounded, and Senguine though he was b badly wounded only revenged his injuries who ordered his men to carry the enemys position even at the risk of annihilation. Bicknells center amid the storming carnage along a front twenty miles long was rolled up twice within four hours, but it was replaced and the conflict now assumed such frightful fury that every tree was rent and torn by the bullets and the shells. The sky was kind of whitesh in hue from the smoke of battle and at last the Glandelinian columns gave way once more, only to rally and drive back the assailants. Night again closed the hot contest and both sides prepared for the renewal of the struggle.

I453.

The christian positions had now been changed during the night. Great columns took possession of the works that had been captured, batteries added by numbers of the guns captured changed their respective positions and the christian lines were well preared prepared for the attack on the morrow. The next day came bright and clear and cool.

That morning general Hanson Vivian learned through scouts that suspicious signs were witnessed in the enemys lines and general Vivian house f rode to one of the telegraph stations at this moment and some of the other general who was in one which had not been burned b by the enemy quickly learned from general Vivian who was still twenty miles away that he barred by general Buebuum Manley could not advance as yet, and that it was best to retreat as all would not be well to resume the contest. But Hanson saw a mistake in this and decided to battle the enemy again heading that right wing of his tward Rossanna Hogan and preparing for the resumanation of the big battle storm. General Hanson was quite alarmed for indeed general Hanson knew that the Glandelinian Hobonites were a serious class of glandelinians to come immediately into a long and desperate battle with.

The Glandelinians were assuming the full force of their attack having already pushed on in great numbers once more against general Hansons right rand divisions and reports came that it was already rolled up in such confusion that the Angelinians stampeded like millions of wild steers. General Hanson then withdrew the wing, and then after hurling back the assault put his divisions in the path of the roaring typhoon of attack on his center and also crushed it. There was now a lull for two hours.

In the meantime little Evangeline Vivian out scouting as usual noticed something that appeared like a prairie fire moving forward in the distant fields and notified her sisters.

"It's the enemy attacking again that what it is."Said Joice."We are going to have a twister of a battle too, and the enemy are coming on fast too."

"I believe it's best to sound a halt."said Violet."We can send a warning to general Wienstien which the attack is headed for by means of telegraph or wireless."

"I believe you are right."Said Jennie."Violet you sound the warning, and you or I and my other sisters will send my boyscouts to watch proceedings under cover."

"All right!"Answered Violet."I'll do so, so be quick."If it was a plain petty attack I would not worry but when its a general attack of such violence coming, then it's good night."

Violet dashed off to telegraph the warning to general wienstien but general wienstiens lines were being already swept by the attack and the little girls could not get no response whatever. General Wienstien had however noticed the peculiar progresive change of the attack the explosions of shells appearing to him like clouds of smoke from burning haystacks of yellowish color, the flashes of the shells being red, green, and blue and had given orders for all his commands whi which had not yet intrenched themselves at the approach of the mornings earliest attack to rush under cover of their works as soon as possible. For those far in advance of the trenches it was a long distance to the lines and general wienstien apprehending that the storm of attack would st strike them before they were bei behind their works massed three hundred cannon and tore avenues in the foe lines thus covering the retreat of the christians. But however the storm of attack did not strike at this point as yet, but swe rved upon his right and the firing made the appearance of a co forest fire.

Violet and her sisters watching the battle of hell believed that general Kindernine noticed the firing when they saw his whole colo column in motion, and went back to her sisters who had once rode to general Kindernine declaring that they thought the storming attack was freakish and many of the foe flags were not usually the bright red yellow and blue stripes but of prussian colo blue color call over.

Indeed the whole battle line in action had the appearance of a forest fire but the smoke also appeared more denser and all the boyscouts wishing to view the scene more closer at first did not want to rush for cover fearing it was aswiftly advancing forest fire instead of a battle but many of their officers who knew better forced them to obey and to go to any point of shelter from the approaching danger.

This had continued all morning without anything unusual happing along general Hansons lines though now the great racket in that location of wienstiens command seemed to be at its worse. Indeed this great attack upon wienstien was only the advanced part of the battle horror which had thrown a terrific sweep of hells thunder and demon uproar at this quarter. But now great forces of the foe were soon soon coming forward at a rush for Hansons lines and the little girls saw them.

"Hurry up"Cried the little girls to their boyscouts."The storm of assault will soon be upon Hansons lines now."

The wall of Glandelinians was now very near and large masses broke from the main surge and rushed forward at great speed seeming to chase each other instead of making a great charge. Then the first most appalling circumstances of the scene was of a large pilliar of cloud which suddenly rose among the ene enemys main line of charge, which extended from the surface of the ground full of black and white sponge shaped convulitions. The pillinr seemed to be about one quarter as large as the main canopy that overspread the main section and following came a earsplitting and earthrending crash that stunned all that heard it. Some Angelinians had exploded a gigantic mine under the charging for but unfortunately it did not check the survivors.

The boy scouts had just succeeded in reaching the shelter pointed out to them when queer sounds like the cone coughing of many children broke the din of other noises heard so far off near Wienstiens line. Some of the christian generals at first did not pay any attention to the scene believing it to be a new forest fire instead also, but they then saw what was coming and quickly sprang to their commands and there was a scurrying of officers here and there in a lively mixup while the coughing sound had changed in a few minutes to a morning so sound which quickly swelled to a mighty roar that seemed to extend travel like, and the Vivinn girls could see that general Kindernines position was already enveloped in a smoke screen and the roar came from that direction.

A dreadful smoke haze was settling over general Hansons christian line driven by the wind from the firing line of the two other commen commands in action, and then as all watched the foe line passed over to the right section of Kindernines position, then gradually but swiftly all became quiet again in that direction. Then general Hansons line seemed to be shivered in front as if by a river of lightning which revealed the firing line going into action and the wooded country beyond and then the christian line seemed to be suddenly enveloped what seemed to be a swiftly advancing objects through a haze of smoke and there came a roar that sounded like if hell had again changed places with the earth and atmosphere and was rending the stillness with its deafening twaults of sounds that became most appalling worse than any tempest. Trees in a whole line that moment were prostrated by a great volley of exploding shells thar roared like titanic thunderolls. The Glandelinians coming had struck Hansons lines without the slightest warning and the uproar of the elements could never be as preternatural as the enemys devil yells and every where within sight of the little girls hundreds of thousands of purple coated soldiers were intermingled in a con gloveration of confusion and all around for an hour was a deafening chaoes of cannon volleys, shouts, cries, musketry and bayont bayonets, but the resistance of the christians had been so dreadful that the foe became demorilized. Every shell in the sky crashed like thunder, the roar of many parks of artillery seemed to split the earthand general Wienstiens headquarters a strong brick building was shattered to fragments and he was himself sevse severely wounded in front of his position but also Purgatorian picknell of the foe was also severely wounded and he was the only one who came out alive through that charnel hell many other officers being killed or wounded. Thus along this point the desperate attack was repulsed.

Along general Kindernines front all the officers had shouted to their men to hold firm and they also repulsed the assailants. Violet and her sisters and the boyscouts who were watching this storm of battle from their place of safty found out indeed that the attack in appearing to be a freak was only decieving. The force of the attack along other portions of the christian line had been terrific and the losses however was awful for the poor graycoats their uniforms being torn to shreds in their close hand to hand encounter with the fierce Angelinians and after being repulsed and driven back the survivors and their officers even did not know what to do.

Hundreds of thousands of the terrified Glandelinians who had been routed by that unspeakable horror they men met at the christian front had taken refuge in the ravines and glens to rally just before the christian return storm struck them, and shell fire of the greatest intensity added to the peril of the Glandelinians and later on after a two hours lull when the enemy resumed the attack a whole line of the foe twenty miles long was torn into a plain of dead and wounded for the whole width of their assault the path of assault varing at times to seven miles before they reached the works only to go back torn and mangled and adding to the peril of the Glandelinians who survived the storm of slaughter was the great counter attack of 6,555,000 Consentinian cavarly that rode the Glandelinian hordes clear backvto their own position. Other parts of the gray line in the path of the counter christian storm fared better for a time but made no actual progress and so hea y was the shell fire from the christian batteries upon their positions that their trenches for the whole length of seven miles was strewn with the wreckage of shattered trees, barns, houses, and bodies of men and horses, and ten of the headquarters belonging to the foe generals were blown to pieces from their strong foundations and two batteries were disabled. However the storm of battle had struck all these points simultaneously, and picknell was crippled for this great assault and for a long time was unable to fight another battle.

..... THE DESTRUCTION OF ROSSANNA HOGAN.....

Three days after the battle storm at Rossanna Hogan general Purgatorian picknell enraged over the wounds he had recieved bombarded Rossanna Hogan with his biggest guns and the explosions of the fourty two Centemeter shells piled hundreds upon hundreds of thousands of tons of wreckage into the streets. Even the biggest buildings considered hurricane proof and typhoon proof were the first to be shattered into total ruins, and smaller ones were piled into wreckage in a few hours. I00,000 houses were wrecked by the hurricane of shells but then some occasions the battle had been resumed with lots of fighting in the streets and among the wrecked houses which lasted all day but for the enemy success was on of no avail and Bicknell later on in the night prepared to retreat.

''This is terrible.''Said Jennie when she and her sisters viewd the wreckage several days later, when general Hanson had after caring for the wounded and either burning or burying the dead had marched his armies around Rossanna Hogan and prepared to give aid to the injured after the enemy had retreated northward.

''The glandelinians are getting worse than the very devils themselves.''Said Violet.''I never saw a worse storm of shell fire than this.''

''I don't belie e there is hardly a tree left standing in this vinicity.''Declared Angeline.''My how the shells did scream and how wren I listened to the explosions I hoped they did not drop any where I was standing watching the destruction going on that dreadful day.''

''It's worse than the bombardment of Pullaway.''Said Jennie.''And shorter.''

''Yes this bombardment was too fierce too last long.''Said Catherine.''I bet the whole citybof Rossanna is ripped inside out.''

None of the survivors who had during the bombardment been rescued by the Angelinians could sleep for the din from the continuous drum drum roar of thousands of explosions and from the roar of the big guns and now the sky was dark from the smoke of the burning windrows of wreckage but the sky was not so dark as to make the scene intolerable.

Whole fields were under wreckage from the splintered trees, and hundreds of craters were seen. In Rossanna Hogan every building was wrecked to a total loss and her streets on both sides were steeped in seventy feet of wreckage and wahter from streams that had burst their banks on account of the herculean shell fire. Smoke from burning substance of all kinds kid objects among the christian lines for the distance of two hundred feet and the flood was still streaming down the roads from the rivers over flowing and was w filled with floating wreckage and prostrated trees, and many dead bodies were among them, the bombardment having killed over thirty thousand soldiers including ten thousand noncombatants and children also and it was the heaviest rain of shell fire that had ever poured upon a single city proper and even the worse of most extensive tornadoes could not do all the shells did.

From the effects of the recent battle storm the Angelinian forces had been rendered desperate, and picknells retreating army helpless, but the christian advance was delayed on account of the flood to render immediate aid to the stricken city and much of their own ammunition and wagon trains of provisions had been destroyed by the shells which fell among the christian lines during the battle and were even obscured by shattered and broken trees. Violet and her sisters indeed see all the havoc caused by both the storming attack and bombardment commined and were horrified and amaied. It was not untill five days after when picknells troops finally left the region altogether and left a way open for zimmermanns advance, and then Hanson took a great swarm of soldiers in boats to aid the surviving inhibatants of the stricken city, and when they entered the city they saw a worse sight than ever. Not even at Jennie-Wren- own were houses wrecked so badly.The streets were buried under high windrows of fiercely smouldering wreckage, the houses were burning by hundreds, and in some streets where the wreckage could not burn on account of the flood, they floated in indescribable chaoes. Many thousands of mangled bodies were soon lying among the floating wreckage the scene being even worse than that done by the awful earthquakes that destroyed so many Calverinian towns as seen in chapter one.

The number of dead was about I33,000 mostly from exposure to the weather so long, 37,422 of which had really died on account of the bombardment, and I00,000 of which had been wounded. It took a few days for the many scores of thousands to be recovered from the wreckage, scores of thousands of soldiers working at it, and indeed it took two weeks to render aid to the hundreds of thousands of those rendered without homes They had to be sheltered within the christian lines. The poor refugree refugees indeed realized that they had indeed a terrible and ruthless enemy in theo their country and many of the surviving men in the refugee camps who were not too old and feeble for their desires of revenge as many of them had lost loved ones in the ruthless bombardment inlisted in the christian armies. General Hannon decided to wait untill he recieved fresh armies from Angelinia before beginning a new cap cmmap cama campaign against Manley desiring that zimmermann should take care of him for a while. Thus general Hanson apd his brother general Robert vivian rested their armies, while generals jimmie vivian and his brother Germaine Vivian increased their own armies and made preparations to held zimmermann in his advance on Madge Evanx and Julo Callic if possible.

Shortly after the battle of Albertinia which of course raged elsewhere, general Izner Myletze soon to be the best fighting general and most famious of all the Glandelinian leaders in the world according to this story, orderes a reconnaissance up the Aronburg gun River which he intended to use as his transportation for his advance against Angelinia Agathia and to get a few of the Abbieanian forces which were sent by General or mperor Vivian to oppose his advance. His main army lay onthe shore side of the river, but on the river he had four hundred and fifty big river war craft of immense size, and the shole fleet was dispatched for this duty; while the main army was to move forward and follow the fleet. Upon the leading gun boat called the Gormman Marie was embarked the company which we e was Izner Myletzes most famious scouts, while a companion company of Glandelinian Gargoylian Kurds from the same regiment took passage on another gun boat.

Indeed it was a great pleasure for these men who had been so long accustomed to the irksome routing routine of ie regid camp duties and wearesome marchings, through all kinds of w e weather which the christians alone could endure and which the glandelinians were not at all used to. The skies were bright,the atmp atmosphere clear cold and invigorating, and about a foot of fresh snow was on the ground. The shore on either side shos the snow colored and snow covered beauty of forest and field, and the fresh spring breezes were laden with the odors of pine forests, and was not one third ascold as the last month. It was the last days of March and the surroundings were excellent to those to those accustomed to the fierce winters of a Calverinian State , so that in spite of their loyalty to their n ow homes and their determination to see nothing admirable in Calverinia their spirits nevertheless broke at with joyious exuberance, while their patriotism to a wicked cause was stimulated by the cheers and benedictions of those, native to the soil but for the cause of glandelinia, who flocked to the rivers edge to look upon the Glandelinian flag, and watch the immense gray army go by.

And among many of those who swarmed to the n banks of the river to greet the Glance linian flag and army, were many young Calverinians but born in Glandelinia who were seeking to escape the practical National conscription which sought to drive them by force into the service of the Abbieannian Cause., Many of these inlisted in Con Company A.B.C.and F. and in many instances many p- patriotic young glandelinian born Calverinians, clad in their native garb, and armed with their own sporting shot guns rifles and other weapons, came in large bodies, and were mustered into Myletzes main army.

The days however passed merrilly away and where all of the Glandelinians hoping for an early success in the war were in the happiest mood, but general Seppo Evans who was Myletzes lieutenant was the happiest an and merriest of them all. A compactly built man of about thirty five years, with a full round face, and an eye which twinkled with humor, or if necessary flashed in command,, he was as whom his army not only respected but loved. But his career was just only beginning.

While the main army marched on the shore the long line of vessels steamed up the Aronburgs Run at times slowing their speed in order to examine the shores at points where a strong National enemy might lurk. At Headrick Point he stopped or they stopped to load a few transports with wheat and flour from a mill operated recently for the Abbieannian army but which had been captured, and at Chickadees gluffs a midnight sally was made upon a large force of Abbieannian sladers who were making merry at a turn houses of considerable size near the river, and those who did not ale resisting were brought out, as prisoners.

Having passed San Salvador the knights just north of Aronburgs Junction came into view about eight o clock on the morning of April the First. The troops on board the fleet were not aware that the enemy on the fleet had been already informed by well disposed Glandelinian signal corps that a large body of the Abbieannians under some unknown commander was engaged in fortifying this position, with a f view to closing the stream, and as field glasses were not included just then, in the supply of private soldiers or lieutenants, they detected nothing suspicious. But a few hours later they had cause to wonder, when the egines of every one of the armed ships began t to slow down, the whistle revolving just properly to hold each vessel nearly motionless against against the current. At the same moment the main commander of the gunboat in the lead, Comodore Curnia in complete uniform(dressed enough to kill) with his sword by his side, appeared upon the bridge. He fixed his glasses and boked intently upon the heights, for indeed he expected trouble, and every eye followed in the direction of his gaze but without being any the wiser just then.

Presently a long extending line of big rolling puffs of smoke rose from all points of the heights, there was a long undulating thundering sound, more like that of the rolling of drums all of a sudden, and a shower of heavy balls flew over several of the ships, and spa splashed the water astern. Every gunboat at once opened with their heaviest guns, all sixty nine pounders, which were in their bows, firing shell and high explosives at first, then shrapnel, and grapeshot, steaming meanwhile nearer the hidden Abbieannian battery. The front of the fleet somewhat further down the stream opened a heavy fire a few minutes later, but two of them got disabled and one was blown up.

The Abbieannians were answering briskly and with considerable affect effect, and refused to abandon their guns. San Salvador which had been concealed behind a heavily wooded snow covered bluff, soon came into view, a mere villiage on the river front, wit with a number of bigger houses upon the summit of the long and rather steep hills which at this point rose abruptly from the waters edge...A long line of Abbieannian infantry and Calverinian cavarly were in sight. The latter were almost instantly routed by a few well directly directed volleys from the guns of the ships, but the long line of infantry continued to deliver a an efective fire, crippling sixty gunners on one ship alone, a hundred on each of the others singly, and leaving upon the sides of each vessel pilot houses and chumneys marks which could never be erased.

The gunboats were well abrest of the long landing near the town maintaining only sufficient headway headway to resist the current, and crush the small ice flces. Meanwhile Captian Galco counted off thirty se esse n files from the le left of Company D and they were ordered into the boats, which by this time had been quickly lowered to the water.

Under cover of the heavy fire from the gun boats, and of the muskets of the soldi ers left on board, the boats pushed off to the h shore. The first of the Glandelinians to spring to land was Galco. A portion from company L from another boat joined the party, while elsewhere half of each company and regiment from other ships landed untill about twenty thousand had spread in a long line and started advancing up the hill, the gunboats meanwhile being necessarily silent.

Then the line of r troops reached the summit all at one time, and the Abbieannians occupying the timber which fringed the clearing on all but the side near the river, opened a fierce rifle and cannon fire, which was handsomely returned. The Glandelinians dropped like flies but continued on.

Load as quick as you can, and give them a dose of lead" ,yelled the captian of every company, and the boys dashed past the town tward the smoky timber which hid th enemy firing as they went. However it was soon doscovered the Abbieannians were marksmne and many of the Glandelinians fell, the captian of one company was partially disabled by a bullet in his leg, but continued in command. Seeing the folly of rushing gun a superior force, in the face of such fire, and of an abbieannian force so well posted, each captian ordered what remained of their men to fall back to the small town, and enter each house, from whose windows and the spaces between the doors and walls a fire could be maintained without great exposure. Galco was some paces in advance of the first of the houses and he and ten others about him presently most conse conspicious marks. Thes captian was seen to load his piece, take deliberate aim and fire, and then turn partially about t to reload, when two balls struck him, on onein the breast and the other in the head, and he fell at full length dead, while over, one of those ten men about him also were simultaneously shot down,

An effort was made by twenty men to reach the bod, of the captian and drag it behind one of the houses but the enemy's fire was too fierce and accurate to permit i.. At this moment it was discovered that a body of the Abbieannian cavarly taking ad advantage of the silence of the Glandelinian gunboats were endeavoring to interpose between the detatchment and the little town, and a general retreat was ordered, while the batteries above began to hurl shells among the houses and into the streets untill the roort reports was as frequent as the noise of fire crackers on the fourth of July, but beat the worse thunder you ever heard..

One of the landelinians while on the way to the boats,, an managed to pick up a long Winchester Abbieannriancrifle;, lot by the Abbieannian soldier who had been captured, a a rare weapon in those days, when the Glandelinian troops could boast nothing better[illegible] than a common rifle known as an old flint lock or "buck and bull". Another another b came into possession of a large drum inscribed with the words in printed form in large black letters" I sent the christian dog who owned this drum to" Heaven".

A third descending the hill in great haste unfortunately thrust the point of his gun in to the a hard frozen gun ground, and found himself propelled into the icy cold wser water of the river,, with no other injury than a complete chilling off and a good ducking, and then drew himself out, saying words, that I would not dare to write before the worse swearing man in the world.

First before pulling off in their boats, the soldiers set fire to every house in the town and tried to start a blaze in the tops of the pine forest and would have succeeded, but the Abbieannians while keeping up a hot fire followed them to the very banks of the river and poured down a fierce fire, to which the gun boats and troops aboard made hot reply, and then some of the Glandelinians of the main army on the opposite side deployed in long lines and gave the Abbieannians a searching fire of musketry and drove them back so that those on the boats reached the ships in safty. The gunboats remained in the same vinlity during the days of April second and third with the troops yet on board, and the main army encamped on the other side passed and repassed the landing of gun Salvador repeatedly, never ceasing the terrible rain of shells, while Izner Mylstze placed all his artillery along the banks and kept up a terrific cannonading night and day, and on the evening of the 3th the reply of the nationals ceased. On the 4th an r officer and several soldiers landed on the main wharf under a flag of truce. But they found the Abbieannians during the night had withdrawn the guns from the earthworks, commanding the river, and had retreated to Corinthia.

This was the first chapter of the Angelinia Agathia Campaign made by Izner Mylstze which first culminated with the fall of Corinthia. The first expedition had been somewhat successful. It had prevented the Abbieannians from fortifying the bluffs at San Salvardor, the most formidable defensive point on the river, and whic which if completed would have frustrated Mylstzes plans altogether.

Ten days later the main portion of General Beppo Evans army arived and made an unmolested landing! On April the 18Th fifteenth, the many companies found six thousand graves to certify to the bloody six hours fighting at San Salvador fought two weeks earlier. The burials had been made so hastily that the toes of many of the dead protruded from the ground. About four thousand of the bodies were to those of the Abbieannians, the others werethose of the Glandelinians. A sorrowful moment it was for the surviving Glandelinians, mostly young men without beards as they stood around the graves of their beloved dead, those whom they had loved so well, and for whose future they had cherished such lofty anticipations. They were all gallent soldiers no matter how bad the cause of glandelinia may be all bor to command with a spirit of dash and enthusiasm which inspired their brave comrades, all despite their character as Glandelinians haveing a warm heartedness which won the love and confidence of their comrades. They were soldiers who should despite the cause glandelinia fought for be held up as a fit type of the Glandelinian Volunteer whose shadowy images should be armed for and honored in so many homes because no matter what they were or how wrong their cause was, they were equally as brave as their rivals the Abbieannians.

The Regiments mentioned during the battle at gun Salvador was part of axdivision which in after days of battle and march, acquitted itseld neither better nor worse than any one of a million others, drawn from various states of Rebellious Glandelinia. At the beginning the whole of Izner Mylstzes army regarded itself as a most for- midable organization, equal to almost any undertaking. And if so required it would undoubtedly have essayed the invasion of any part of the Christian States, alone and unaided as Hanley, and his other Glandelinian generals did and were diddi g. doing.

But its main general Izner Mylstze had been dignified with the title of the big Glandelinian " WAR LORD" and therefore he was determined to make his great army absolutely invincible, and he therefore secured from the Glandelinian War Depart- ment special authority to recruit and add to it the best of batteries of artillery and large squadrons of cavarly, and to secure also what he desired most, the terrible " Wheeler Dragoons2 which are the fiercest and swiftest Glandelinian horsemen knon known and the most dreaded by the nationals as they are never, never, never defeated.

These were secured however after considerable red tape,,, and in the light of a later experience it was unusual splendid to look back at that complex Glandelinian army on the march, with its ten to twenty main divisions of infantry., with artillery and immense swarms of countless millions of cavarly soldiers on either flank all making the best endeavors to obey the commands laid down to them for ne service of the army alone. The greatness of the conbination was soon apparent, and for quite a time not a single main christian army at these points would dare engage him in a geher l general battle.

After the action at San Salverdor some of these had been badly reduced, the organization had been partically boken up, but the army now lay at Aronburgs Point opposite joun city fr for a few days. The force was divided between ...lto, Aronburgs point, and ...le-illister junction stretching for about fourty four miles . Headquarters were at the first named place from which before the coming of general Beppo Evans looked like a nation preparing for action at one point. For this time of the war it was the greatest army ever formed by the ...glandelinian generals. On the 21th of April Isher Myletze had a portion of his army investing fort ...rmot, and other portions of it took an unimportant but bloody part at Fort gtanck and captured these places while other detatchments made bloody expeditions into the interior and up the Aronburgs ...ver river capturing many small villages, and taking large numbers of prisoners, but fortunately E Isher Myletzes army was one of the few kind which left women and children alone, and hated and upbraided the others for their wanton mass acres and the like, and saying they were injuring a cause for which they were fighting for.

Then came the movement of the army up the river northwestward already opened up by the engagements just past. This was the beginnings of as of Isher Myletzes most famous and finest pageants of the war, and which in later seasons was to end up to probably the most terrific conflict the war ever had.. The one hundred and thirty five million men comprising the Glandelinian army of invasion moved along the shore while about 100,000 of them were embarked upon sixty big steamers, transports and others led by a long line of 456 gunboats and ten naval warships.The long fleet displayed bright colored bunting in great profusion; and with all of the ...regiments either on shore on or on board the ships were great brass bands whose loud music echoed from shore to shore. About sixty of the ships were provided with great calliopes and their glandelinian ...patriotic melodies softened by distance sounded very enchantingly. indeed. Yet as far as the eye could reach, up stream and down rounding bends and threading their way among many miniature islands the long line of armoured vessels stretched away; a magnificent panorama in incessant motion.

...pril the sixteenth general ...urners di divisions disembarked at Chemies Landing, followed the next day by general Giacomo ...urno's...or the whole of general Isher Myletzes army in general great gr great camp discipline was being rigid ly enforced. ...company, squad, battalion and other drillie drills and even mat particular most particular dress parades or were performed each day the army did not march. And General Isher Myletze declared that there was great reason for this, not only in what t se would call; a military sev sense, but for the moral effect on the army.

As the Glandelinian soldiery under his command were not used to the rigors of the Calverinian climate and weather illness increased with an astonishing speed among the troops, mostly caused by colds which hit the men by the wholesale..For nearly all complaints there were not doctors and surgeons enough, and those who were in the army usedwhiskey and quinine prepared at the hospital tents by the barrelful and ...administered with a cup. Unfortunately for many of the glandelinians who were unusual drinkers and who felt they could ot not get along without the liquor it was so unsparingly drugged that it was impossible for them to use it as any kind of a kind of a beverage.

...efore this onthe 29th of March a new camp of an enormous size had been formed one mile and a half further north of San Salvador. Because of the fear of surpr ise attacks by the nationals camp guards surrounded each regiment, and strong pi. picket lines had been posted, and considerable work constructed. On the 31th general Beppo Evans reviewed his immense divisions for the first time, preparatory to a main review by general Mylotze which was to take place on the second of ...pril. ...n the forthsen of fortsenth of April a heavy rain and electric storm had set in, continuing all that e days; far into the night and resuming a part of the fifteenth and sixteenth with unusual severity and the whole camp was almost floods flooded and the soldiers fairly " wallowed in mud" at least it seemed mud was their chief diet.

About six oclock in the evening of the former day heavy scattering fire extendi ing for many miles was heard a far to the front, and the sound of many loud and unusual vibrating explosions, which made the oith tremble, and the branches of all trees within sight shake and sway as if there was a wind;, and about sixteen brigades with two divisions were sent in that direction.. A quick march of five miles was made in drenching rain, and through knee deep mud in places and then the troops were ordered back to camp without encountering a "Christian enemy" or learning the cause ...the larm of the alarm, of or what was the results of the explosions.

Thir Thurd

Thursday morning ...pril the 17th,, when it was promising to be a beautiful spring day, not cold and not a single cloud in the sky, when the whole of Isher Mylotzes army were eating what little they could get for breakfast, or that they had obtained in a forage, they were aroused by the sounds of conflict which came from the rifgt and left front but at a considerable distance away...he battle of San Pedro had begun for the army was encamped on a little creek by that name. A few minutes later the army was further aroused when the long ...landelinian roll sounded mingled with the con stant blare of bugles and cornets; and the troops went into rank on every one of their color lines; and soon half of his army was moving in long lines in the direction of the firing. At the side of a turn in the Yellow Brick of Big Girl Knool Road they passed general Alakazookis of the 21TH Omarian Divis on, a gallant but wicked old white haired man who had seen service in many other battles, and who had often been in other Glandelinian armies since the war began. There was a remarkable sound in his voice and therefore no one who heard his voicethat morning could ever forget their forceful moaning of peculiar intonation;

" boys and men of Myley Mylettes divisions. Fill all your canteens, for all of you will be as bad of as if you were in peruition before to night comes and you'll need water."

Further up the road the troops met thousands upon thousands of badly wounded from the front, all of them wounded and all terror-stricken. They indeed gave brave encouragement to new men going into their first battle;

" it's no use boys now. We are all cut to pieces. We were a full division and now only a few brigades left. The christian dogs have us already licked."

But on pressed the columns At another turn in the road it starts to change dire ection to the left. Every few hundred ,ards could be seen a sight su which would make a coward run away from the army on the instant. Here the surgeons of the army have obtablished their field hospitals and here the soldiers could see the operating tables spread out at many places, under glittering array of knives and saws and all kinds of operating instruments, all these being e exposed to the sight of the raw troops; it was horribly suggestive to them; and therefore it was little wonder that many of the Glandelinians turned pale. The lines of troops the first to go across the field closed over a line of rail and other fen ces and those who found gaps in bob ...ired fences passed through) and all formed in line of battle in large and open meadows .Other brigades connect i with it right and left, and continue so until the line becomes very extensive and ten men deep. There's has about half a millich in this line and it extendes about (Think of it for the number) a little over eight miles. A battery of artillery consisting three hundred machine and other guns galloped up on ol her flank and unlimbered. That on the left started to open fire with great vigor upon the Abbleannians not plainly in sight, tearing their column to pieces, splintering the trunkens of trees, and tearing up the sod; and making many eruptions and big puffs of smoke, while that on the right, stampedes a portion of the Abbleannian line, while another battery finding no room at this point; recalls without firing a gun, and quickly retreat and form further off in the rear to be in reserve.

In the main front and on the extreme age of a field which lay beyond the meadows was a long dense forest occupied by a long thick line of the Abbleannians army. The Glandelinian troops were marching bravely toard it. They meet a fire which drives them back with fearful loss. They try it three times and three times more men fall than I have the nerve to figure here. A fourth time a line goes forward, and not a single man returns. The glandelinian commanders see that their columns are not strong enough to carry the position and they order" about face" to the survivors. The men still under fire march rearward in line of battle. A shell comes screaming overhead there is a queer noise like the loud ripping of can vas and a whole regiment goes down into dead and wounded. Deadly shrapnell. here and there the long line bulged they were more hidden in bursting shell, the men gradually quicken their pace; and now with the christian fire increasing, and with shrapnell laying officers and men down like flies, and hurling dirt and mud and gravel and other missiles all about them there was ev y provocation for a stampede. The commanders however give the ideral orders" Steady" and the gallent Glandelinian soldiersset their teeth hard and with muskets at the shoulder regain the accustomed drill step.

" Battalions, brigades halt. About face. his down and no firing without orders! "

The line of soldiers had not fired a single gun, but so far it had recieved very severe punishment. Its great retrograde movement under heavy fire, was a magnificent exhibition of pluck for the Glandelinian troops; The Abbleannian batteries stretched formilla ...e upond, and the noise was sublime, terrific. First the gunners fired ... solid solid shot which struck the ground a couple of hundred yards in advance and reach the troops in ricocheting. This proved that the A Abbleannians had admirable range. A long line of trees of every size from small to big in front of the soldiers were constantly bruised with the marks of cannon balls within the height of a man. A cannon shot knocked out the corner post of a large shed; letting fall the very roof and with it fifty venture-some fellows who had climed up to witnes the grand battle panorama in front. One of the iron missiles also t ure a cruel grove in the skull of an officer, while another knocked off the muzzle of a soldiers gun, as he was reloading it with fresh cartridges. He completes the operation however, and discharges the weapon but when he brought it again to his side a shell burst close by and though he was not injured his rifle was shattered.

" Does not that take the take the cake" he exclaimed to his commander. But at that moment he was in possessed possession of another gun, for it was thrown away by a comrade to fled in mortal terror only to die in two seconds later as a shell in exploding above him but close beheaded him. Now out of the forest in front advanced the long formidable purple line of battle. On it came without a break in its many ranks and yelling lustily as if it was a part of an advancing tempest. The Glandelinian troops opened upon it a most terrific fire, each man loading and discharging his weapon as rapidly as possible, while the artillery added to the racket. For a moment it appeared as if the long lavender lines would not be stopped but the Glandelinians were shooting them down faster than you could count by an adding machine and finally the Abbisannians could not withstand the storm of leaden hail, and grape and canister---it lost its pace, halted, fired back fiercely for about six minutes, and then recoiled. Three times in redoubled numbers it attempted to rush over that dreadful field of death, and as often did this whole Abbisannian line fall to pieces, and recoil in fragments, and hasten back to shelter with their comrades still falling in droves all the way of retreat.

A new Glandelinian division now coming up was placed to the left of the Big Girl wheel road and engaged the Abbisannians at short pistol range. The ground here was broken and thickly wooded. The fire on either side was horrible for the thick underbrush was literally mowed down by bullets. Hundreds of men were shot in dozens of places at once and men fell in thousands it seemed every minute and still kept kept falling. The dead lay where they fell while the wounded dragged themselves below the brow of hills for protection. From further north for general Adelenieds brigades the ammunition was almost exhausted. There were the field boxes of cartridges and what had become of them? What fatal blunder was this, for there were none where they were most sorely needed. Here and there scores of soldiers at a time could be seen to drop behind the ice ridge and take from the cart- cartridge boxes of the dead and wounded what ammunition is left and resume their places in the line line, only to repeat the act again and again.

So intent are these Glandelinian soldiers upon their errand that one of them did not recognize the close friend and comrade whom he even despoils. Yet this is the key to the position of the Glandelinian army, and here the Abbisannians make their most heroic effort. An Abyssinkilian division consisting of sixty brigades was broken to pieces under the under the most unusually terrible fire it encounters, one of ten of its brigades and a regiment rallies and advances four times, only to fall back again and again. General Over of the left appeals to the Abbisannian troops to make a finaly effort and save the fair name of their army. General Ovreslente the idol of this Abbisannian army now placed himself at their head, and leads them to a grand assault which surprises both the Abbisannians and rebels together with its fury and grandeur and stubbornness, but he and twenty other generals and sixty of other ranks are killed almost simultaneously and their main head general Hotte is mortally wounded.

In this valley of death the Glandelinian divisions who successfully opposed this grand and magnificent charge loses more than one half of the men who went into action within three hours time. Little wonder that with such a thick and long line extending for eight miles so badly thinned out, in a dense now smouldering woods, a young Glandelinian soldier on his return to the front from a search for cartridges, thinks himself deserted, and takes his way to the rear. At the head of the creek, an old lieutenant hails him;

" Say sonny where art thou going!"

" To find one of the regiments to which I belonged. They are gone."

" No sonny they are not. If you wish to find them go to the front. All that are left are there."

" All right sir. I thought they were all gone."

And this young Glandelinian soldier again goes into the action. Every cartridge cartridge was at last gone. Then the order came" fix bayonets." this command rang all along the line.. But the left wing was crushed, and the Abbisannians came on with a wild surging charge from that flank, firing as they advanced and yelling as fiercely as the Glandelinians could do. Every Glandelinian field officer was already killed or disabled, ten brave colonels falling six of them dead. There was little semblance of organization now, and the men were forced to seek the rear as best as they could. There were hundreds of regiments and scores of brigades in the same plight and the last hour of the day was given to seeking their own members, and reforming to hold the lines that night and prepare for a fresh struggle on the morrow.

The whole force was now without food or fresh water and their thirst was increased by the saulty taste of the cartridges they had been biting all day long. Neither had they any tents nor blankets or other provisions for the whole victorious Abbisannian army had possession of their camps.

Then again the rain began to fall and the men drew their gun stocks under their long coat skirts and sat up against the trees, seeking to shelter themselves as best as they could. All night long the earth shook with the concussion of great guns on the long lines of immense gun boats and war craft on the river not so so far off, and the explosions of their own shells in the enemy's lines. but neither army cared for engagement on such a night,, and therefore the hostile lines confronted each other in comparative silence. In the morning the battle was resumed it being a bloody Friday indeed. The whole Abbisannian and gray lines were engaged in redoubled fury for a distance of thirty miles, and at noon the Abbisannians were again victorious, but at one oclock the Glandelinians advanced for a general charge, and drove the Abbisannians into and out of their camps, stopt them from the field, and capturing the Abbisannian camp, and hundreds of thousands of prisoners, six general including among them, the fresh men of Beppo Evans army taking a glorious part in this victorious onset. Forsome days after this battle in which the losses on both sides were very severe the division of Glandelinians under general Adelsheid was firmly of the opinion that it has sustained the fiercest and more frequent of the assaults of the Abbisannians on that terrible Thursday, and that the blunder of some other brigade or regiment was the cause of the temporary disaster. But all the men soon came to learn the important truth, that in this as in nearly all conflicts between armies of armed men each portion of the line has all it can tend to, and its best effort and most fearful sacrifice, a are equally necessary, no more and no less, to a successful issue. The seige of Corinthia followed mit a most wearisome and exhausting and somewhat bloody campaign. General Halsted was now in command of a part of the army and the troops were literally worn out with the long excessive duty put upon them. Sixteen days were consumed in passing over the thirty miles between San Salvordor and Corinthia, and at every advance, earthworks, strong enough for permanent fortifications were throwh up with abatis in front but every time at one point or another fiercely and suddenly attacked by the Abbisannians who kept up a running battle all the time.

During the seige the action was more severe than ever before. No soldier could move from his post of shelter, and from six to seven in the morning; and at all hours of the night the troops went again and again at the double quick against the National defenses, and by the casualties of this seige and two weeks battle, the exposure and labor during the whole seige, companies of men even brigades and divisions consisting of hundreds of thousands of men who left for the army less than six months before was reduced to twenty three thousand men or effectives, and this proportion probably existed throughout the army.

It was a terrible loss but stood well.

There was constant and severe fighting, and several very great actions during the seige of Corinthia, but the town soon fell into the hands of the Glandelinian troops, on May the 29th.. The rer retreating Abbisannians was followed for a great distance, the army being then recalled, and posted along the Mic-Colestor and Pandora Railroad between Corinthia and Corman acting frequent wearisome and generally prifofitless marches along the river banks, pursuing or pursued. The battle of Pellek Pellen was an incident of this sort of campi campaign, and was fought by a portion portion of general Beppo Evans division, which intercepted the forces of Jasmin Vivian Vivish and his brother Germaine after their repulse at Heidi in May the 11th.

The efficiency of the Glandelinian army had been by this time greatly improved by the withdrawal of the old muskets, for these were substituted by more admirable weapons. And about the same time the complete regulation uniform was issued.. This consisted of a dress coat and long trousers of light gray which appeared very ridiculous to the Abbisannians, the uniform having brass shoulder dress, and the soldiers recieved tall stiff black ' Stove pipe' hats but looped up on one side with a brass bird of some unusual sort while in front was displayed a child slave getting a " terrible punishment." Though the Glandelinians liked it, the Abbisannians who fought them had a great contempt for this assortment of military millinery, and did all they could to capture this clothing where whenever the opportunity presented itself, and would parade with it on their own person in all kinds of mock dignities.

During During the marches following this seige large numbers of child slaves who had been from their masters plantations fled before the army. The soldiers retook them and drove them all back to their masters. The unfortunate slaves imagined that the opposing of this Glandelinian army by the nationals would mean their liberation from bondage but the Abbisannians were always losing ground. Many many slaves were forced to follow the troops for miles, being forced to car carry knapsacks and bring water and other provisions for the weary soldiers. Their distress on being thus treated by the Glandelinians was pitiful to behold. At this time by Isner Mylettes orders foraging upon christian farms was most strictly forbidden, and therefore severe punishment awaited the hungry Glandelinian soldier who entered a field for potatoes, or stole a chicken or shot an farm animal.

At this time general Isner Mylette heard of the great blow struck against his cause at Albertinia a few months before and the de di disciplins of the whole Glandelinian army was therefore put to a crucial test. The ma jmajority of the troops were discouraged and disheartened with this news, and there was every prospect of wide spread rebellionwithin the very ranks and of desertion. Anuthough there were so many fighting in Isner Mylettes army yet hundreds were for the setting free of child slaves though ofcourse the man majority of the troops were not in sympathy with this measure, and therefore there was every sign of a coming massacre of every child slave that might be found by the soldiers. In many instances even commissioned officers did not attempt to conceal from the men their own opposition, and expressed the intention of resigning if they heard of another christian victory. In this crisis crissis, general Isner Myletze took a decided stand. He caused the news of the battle of Albertinia to be read at the head of every command in his army, and had it reported out that if any officer tendering his resignation for this reason or expes expression disaffection , or allowed or encouraging their men to massacre child slaves would be reported, with a recommendation for his dishonorable dismissal for insubordination and disloyalty. The effect of this determined action was most salutary indeed(you are in need) not a single resignation was offered, and finally the brewing storm began to passe th away. Other commanders were equally patriotic, many in spite of personal convictions, and there was no further open dis disaffection about the child slave question in the army.

Early in June occured the march through the northern regions of Aronburgs Run the intention being to reach the rear of Miriam Lewis. The campaign was brought for a time to an abrupt close by the disaster at Split Land Creek. That important supply depot was yelded to the Abbleannians, by its commander without firing a single shot in its defense. A few days later however, Myletze moved and engaged in the operations against Miriam Lewis being under fire almost daily then for about a whi whole month. The incidents of this siege seige would require hundreds of volumes in themselves. The bombardment at night by the war craft and land batteries was indes oribably grand and severe. The labors of the army was arduous, but there was less work with the spade than at Corintnia. The glandelinian troops learned that best works were the most sufficient protection and they husbanded their are strength for the main fighting and skirmish lines. The glandelinian army made advances almost every night, and frequent bloody sorties and dashes by day. The end came july the 15th when the Abbleannian white flag went up. It was ot long before the Glandelinian colors were unfurled from many points in the town and the fleet of battleships steamed up the river each vessel firing a glandelinian " National salute" as she rounded to.....

The next day a large part of Beppo Evans army marched up to Algotor and defeated general Herdrude who was threatening the rear of the glandelinian army, returning afterwards to Miriam Lewis. The remainder of the month was devited to expeditions which while in the important general plans of war are worth reading were too many and therefore not necessary to this narrative.

Now began more better preparations for the campaign against Angelinia Agathia which was to turn out to be one of the longest and probable bloodiest campaigns of the war. Both armies under Evans and Myletze were in magnificent trim for the task. True it had lost many a gallent soldier, who if living woul would have done yet greater service for his own country and the glandelinian cause and won honeral honorable distinction for himself. But alas such are the cruel fortunes of war. Aside from this campaging had proved a most severe school,and therefore it yelided most admirable results. Indeed it was for the Glandelinian army a most thorough sinnowing prov process.

The sickly and infirm had been retired from service, the half hearted had dropped by the way side, the cowards and camp bullies had deserted. Every brigade in Myletzes army had been reduced to thirty five thousand men out of fourty thousand when the Angelinia Agathia campaign began. Anticipating the narrative it may be mentioned that later on the greatest army ever mustered at this time besieged Angelinia Agathia for weeks. After the seige only half of Myletzes great army remained, such being the history of Izner Myletzes army. Itis experience is in most cases peculiar, with little exception, it was that of most other glandelinian armies fighting battles in the fields elsewhere.....

Hancancoria, in southern or in the lower Northern portion of An Angelinia state within the shadows of one of the ridges of what is known as glorianna Heights was soon the scene of most unusual and extraordinary bustle and preparation duringthe early part of the month of April 1913.New forces coming by boat and by land and by sea and not just then hindered by the nationals were being quickly concentrated and fully equipped for what was to be destined to be one of the most brilliant, and almost successful glandelinian campaigns of the war for the glandelinia side, if indeed it did not surpass all others in brilliancy in conception, completeness of execution, and thoroughness of results ..It was directed as I have mentioned before absolutely against Angelinia Agathia, but the city of Dorothy Dale was to be the first goal, because if she is not captured then neither Angelinia Agathia could be taken, and therefore if he failed Izner Myletze and tyose working with him would be crushed, and he knew it.

Out of this cap campaign grew one of the most important marches also which I will later mention which caused the tremendous hell of battle at Conservatory Run commonly known as glorianna or Lucillie Dickson. As it will be mentioned throughout thestory so closely will these events succeed one another and so intimately blended will be the their consequences, that this bloody and thrilling Angelinia Agathia Campaign may be said to have started at Delight's Junction, and to have ended with the frightful battle at qld Glorianna. These operations will cover a period of quite a few years, during which time almost every day is to be spent in marching or fierce fighting, and frequently both. There are to be many severe battles, and at all times sharp skirmishing and great disasters, fires and the like, sometimes here and sometimes there, and often along the entire line which were to be then nicknamed the" the Hundred Million death heads." The gl Matador battles were to be fought with these armies and christian armies of immense size alone. But it was to be over a grand" forward" up to the Aronburgs Run Horror at glorianna.

The glandelinian troops who were selected for these important undertakings... were to be the choicest of the Glandelinian states of Rebellion, the veterans of the desperate cap campaigns to be written. Many of them havingcompleted a years term of service re-enlisted and were designed by the glandelinian War Department as " Glandelinian ver veteran volunteers, and therefore given the rights to wear the chevrons indicatives of long and faithful as well as arduous service.They were just returning from home after enjoying a brief furlough granted in consideration of their rep re-enlistment. Every man was a seasoned veteran, thou toughened by exposure, and th taught self reliance through the workings of that first law of nature---self preservation. His bearing proclaimed a high degree of pride in his soldiery record a great conscientious belief in his mission and an unfaultering faith in the successful suf successful issue of the cause which he either was conscious cohbbious of being wicked or he was not.And he was not only a perfectly soldier in himself but he was a school master to the many raw recruits brought to the front from time to time to replace the fallen and disabled, who taught by his exap example l q learned the full dur duty of soldiers in vastly less time than he had acquired and been an almost veterans by his side before the campaign had fairly opened.

And this army alone under Izner Myletze kept a very clean record and never unnecessarily destroyed property or massacred women and children? The largest body of troops was the army of Mis-Gallestinianscommanded by general Beppo Evans a grand soldier whose army also kept a clean record and whose every feature pro claimed him to be as unyeilding ly steadfast as the Rock of Glabraltar--which name he bore and who was equally as hard to fight as Myletze. His own di distinguishing characteristics were reproduced in his men and their superb staying power and capacity for giving and taking severe punishment were appreciated by Izner Myletze who always sent them to hold an enemy while others sought his weak or strong points.

The army of Zimmermannians under general Hendro Gargarto with many of the same traits performed a similar as mission in conjunction with it. Last was the combined army of Scoolders, Turmarannians Omarians and Americanians under general Hendro Gargin fresh from the victories at Delight's junction and the relief of the big beleaguered garrison at the same place---trained to long and rapid marches, swift in motion and as true to its mark as the arrow. This command as general , Myletze expressed it, was the " glandelinian snapper to his big whip lash" and it was thrown from flank to flank as necessity required marching often by night to attack the national army at an unexpected point by day. Besides being under general Gargin it was also commanded by general Richard Tumerline and others but Gargin was one of the bravest who ever bore a sword, and would credict to any real American general himself who lived or died throughout the great Civil war here.

Subordinate to these officers was a brilliant array of corps, division and brigade commanders too many to name here, but which will be given in battles to be described.And auxiliary to these forces and principally engaged to protect ing provision trains and covering the flanks of the army but at many times making rapid and destructive raids upon the communications of the Abbleannian armies were large bodies of Gargoylian and Wheeler and other cavarly, commanded by generals, Baldwin, Gurmer, and Stanck. and also Alsehied Heidito. But in supreme command was general in chief U Izner Myletze the most unique figure of the whole war. Tall in form, and de dressed more like a great king than a soldier he never found difficulty in securing a position on a generals staff in the early days of the war, and when gay trappinge commanded a premium and dress prades pad parades and grand reviews passed for" war he never forgot to take advantage of the opportunity to dree dress his best.

Therefore he was always known as the " Dude of glandelinia" but as much as a dude as he was in his military ways, so much greater was he a fighter, and biggest armies could not resist him. When he spoke he revealed his extrard extraordinary mental powers and wealth of nervious and bold energy. Wether organizing or ordering a movement of troops to meet an un xpected contingency or listening to reports of disasters, or of successes, he instantly comprehended the full import of the event, and equal to any emergency, gave his commands with snappish promptness and at the same time so explicitly that there could be no mistaking what he meant orsaid. or what he said.

In many quarters of the Abbleannian side of the war he had been censured for not being on the " Square" in his fighting qualities but he treated these remarks with a grin and a smile and would say"

" The way I fight my own part of the war against the Nationals is my own business and I don't care whether they like it or not." To him the actual conflict was usually an incident which he knew could be like others trusted to the courage and ability of the officers actually upon the spot. Nothing was wanting in his qualities as a general, he possessed them in the highest degree his mind certainly grappling with great general plans and probably if he had been in general Mac-Cellans command in the early part of the American civil war the battle of Antetam would have been the one where Lee would have surrendered his sword with great humility. His men once in po iposition where he wanted them they could not be ousted, and there were many of those to direct the battle, who he had nothing else to did.

General Izner Mylstze had also won great renown as general Mic-pilleste: johnstons equq equal and the future part of this history will tell how competent he was for the co chief command in the task now set before him, but no one not with him can realize howcomplee completely he was master of his forces and resources. resources.Not a single detail of anything was unknown to him, and he could tell anytn anything on any map with his eyes blind folded, and could read a Geography through by heart without looking at it and explain every question pertaining to the geograp hies put to him. With wonderful directness and promptitude he ordered the movements of this vast Clandelinian army at times seperated into numerous columns and detachments all acting independently so far as they themselves knew, yetall co-operating in the grand grand plan of their main chief.

He was a rare judge of men like Grant and Sherman were in this country, and he was never even mistaken in his estimates or fault finding and the like... like... He could tell all the weak points of any brigade commander, the strong pints of another and all this were ever in his mind,, and he also knew all the various posts alon along his railroad communications, many hundreds of miles tothe rear or front, and also their main and under commanders, and whether they were in possession of the Abbieannians or his own men....if the telegraph or wirelesstold him that a certain town was be ing attacked by the Nationals, he knewwhether the Clandelinian general in charge would repulse his assailants or be worsted or surrender, or desist a christian army with infantry and artillery to the last...

Also he knew at all times during the big campaign just how many rations and rounds of ammunitions there were in his immense wagon and auto truck trains and also rounds of ammunition, hos how his men were in health and spirit, what the conditions of the weather was going to be in summer or weather or winter by just taking a look at the direction of the wind, and the appearance of the clouds, and the condition of the feet of his immense bodies of cavalry and artillery horses.

He knew every hill and state, and town in northern Angelinia and Calverinia, and also all history, and how generals should work with one another, and with all this intimate knowledge of officers, enemen men and means, and an immense army having unbounded confidence in itself and in him and his good generals, Izner Mylstze was absolutely invincible to the nationals and as greatly feared by them as concen ni Concentinian Aronburg was feared by the insurgents.

Great as he was Izner Mylstze did not fight for the child slavery, as he though a born Clandelinian was really bitterly opposed to it, he fought for the purpose of patriotism and for the defense of country and flag. yet a little more than a year after he was first known by the national Nationals he had been o semi-officially denounced as not being a " Fighting general of the rebels" but a dude who knew nothing at all about military affairs, and that the most dumb christian officer could spank this rebel" DUDE"That he was a man unfit for the command of more than an awkward Clandelinian regiment of " Dumbells" and now there was not a christian general who did not try their very best to keep out of his path.

In th the first year of the war Mylstze insisted that 10,000,000 men would be needed to ocep occupy the State ofVirner and carry on offent offensive operations and yet committed to his charge now was over 100,000, 000 to work out probably the greatest problem of the war, the attempt to annh annihilate the war ouir supporting resources of the " Abbieann Abbieannian Cause" and to transfer his armies to the south-east, to later if possible co-operate with the Man,Manleys in the hoped for destruction of the Vivian kings, and their great armies. and the winning of the war.

And more. He was soon to write his own name high among tothose of all great masters of bloody wars, and to plan and make campaigns that would be models for study by all generations of soldiers yet to be born. His slightest strategy was unusually marvellous, but later in the war he fought a number of equal and worthy ad vers adversaries in the main generals that then were to oppose him Jack Evans, Concentinian Aronburg, Vivianana, Hansonia, and the Vivian Kings. Love was to succeed move, like ruck and pawn on the chess board, one giving a checkhere, the other there, and so on.

Izner Mylstze was to manoeuvers so as to gain position after position but with unusual loss of men and material, according to the savagery of the collissions with the christian foe, while various christian generals were to retreat before himso skillfully that they were so scarcely lose a man. And that the one shouldachieve so many victories where the others were to try and withhold it will be high praise. No other struggles of titant titans was to be witnessed durinthis unusual war.

As a fighter General Izner Mylstze was in all respects inimitable, and the way he would erite letters, reports and make plans and maps and the like he should besides being a soldier been an aurthor and an artist. All his great orders, reports, letters and plans and and maps, were every time made in homely and vigorous phrase, emphasizing his points in such a manner as to fasten them indelibly upon any ones mind...Once while pre paring for the great campaign he said in a writing to general Manlet-

" I fear the christian armies no more than they fear me. And as I and my army have a clean record which your's have not, I do not need to hide in the dark."

Clandelinian citizens and others at various places along the line of his march gave as much as was within their means means to the Clandelinian soldiers, and general Manley urged general Mylstze to stop it. He answered;

" The railroads cut off by the national armies are not always able to bring food and provisions to my armies. One or the other of us must quit, and my army doesnot intend to do so unless Emperor Vivian, and his best generals makes us. Let the people alone. The people in favor of the National government do the same to their soldiers, and therefore do not interfere. I go my way and you go yours."

The Abbieannians had often endeavored to wreck railroad trains operated by the rebels, by planting explosives on the track, and therefore general Mylstze once wrote to a subordinate;

" Order that section of the railroad suspected therefore to be rigidly tested by a car load or a wagon load of National prisoners, or even citizens implicated, as I do not show mercy to an enemy who makes such trap s when they blame us for the massacres of children and others whom my army has never been guilty of so far as the war has lasted."

The most special abomination in his eyes; and which he never allowed in His camp No matter where or what nation they came from were the special Newspaper and war andcother and other correspondents, which always provoked him to the greatest kinf kind on of a wrath;; and spasmoicid spasmodic profanity and blasphemy of a highly original pattern, andwhose found within his lines no matter who they were or what their purpose was; nor what Nationality were treated as " Christian Christian spies of Abbieannia" and recieved such punishment as was due to the discovery of their work.

" They are, said he, as a rule disasterous to both sides. They are the gossips of the entire world, and always a retail camp scandal and always drift to the Headquarters of generals and other officers and find out something about him and what he does and the like; and makes reports of the outcomes of battles and disasters which never happened. I was once reported killed in the battle of Delight's junction; when the only injury I recieved was the loss of my horse.They are always tempted to state and prophesy events and state facts and things and occurances which reveal to either my army or to that of the Nationals a purpose in time to guard against it. They also state that the child slave cause is not an evil and though I'm fighting for Clandelinia and to uphold her flag I'm not afraid or ashamed to say that I can prove that child slavery upheld by any one is the most crushing evil that can ever be known on the face of the earth, and which will be the ruin of Clandelinia and the world in general if it is not stopped without the victory of the nationals with whom I fight against for the sake of my country, but which I do not hate nevertheless, I and Emperor Vivian having been the best of chums and friends in our boo boyhood days."

One of the Clandelinian editors of the great Clandelinia city Newspaper then a secret correspondent with the army, incurred the personal displeasure of the irascible General at or immediately after the battle of Delight's junction, because he would not allow his army to do the same things the others under the Manleys and other wicked generals did and was treated by him in such a manner as never to be forgiven even to the endof the war and this outraged scribe allowed no opportunity to pass without giving the general a sharp rap in pue partial payment of the old score until Mylstze once wrote back to him....

" Whatever you do write about me in news papers and the like does not gain you any rewards or credit in any way, and if it is because I do not allow massacre of children, or the degrading pri priests and nuns of the National enemy because other Generals do so then I have reasons for which I retain to myself only. As I command my armies; it is my duty to command them, and one thing I have never recieved his od orders from my government to committ massacres of children, and what general Manley and his bloodthirsty murderers do is not for me to do under any conditions and if it is believed that the Clandelinian states will win its freedom from the government of Abbieannia by carrying on a war against not only women and children and all religious sects of the nationals then we might as well try and capture heaven."

Since the beginning of the war, if it be possible General Izner Mylstze had grown even more completely intothe affections of all those h commanded in every field and his appearance at any portion of his army calle forth greater enthusiasm than that of any other Clandelinian general of the war period. This is also largely due to his unaffected heartiness when among those who were the gray in the darkest days of the great rebellion. He was the most approachableof men as accessable oto the private Clandelinian soldier as to the major general, and his intercourse with all whether in private or upon public occasions was such as to impress all with his entire honesty when he said in a letter to general picknell;

" I cherish a real love for the men who fought this great civil war, and who try for the sake of Glandelinia to bring it to a successful conclusion, And if it should even end in favor of the National government it is thenall for the best, for which way the war ends is for the good of both sides. Despite the fact that I am fighting on the Glandelinian side I also cherish a real love and sympathy for all child slaves, and whether the war is won in our favor of or in favor of the Nationals or Not, I wish them one and all, full freedom, and the largest measure of honor and happiness on this earth."

CHAPTER tTHIRTY EIGHT ... .:

MAKING READYFOR THE CAMPAIGN IN GENERAL. THE GREAT / GATHERING OF SUPPLIES. GREAT ATTEMPTS TO PROTECT RAILROADS FROM ABBLEANNIANS AND THE RESULT. THE LARGE NUMBERS OF RAILROAD CO STRUCTION COPPS AND THEIR DANGEROUS WOIR. THE DANGEROUS WOIK OF THE TELEGRAPH AND SIGNAL SERVICE. THE ARMY BLAZING ITS WAY. NORTHERN ANGELINIA TO BE OVERRUN WITH THE GLANDELINIANS. LONG LINES OF WAGONS LOADED UP AND MEN RELIEVED OF THEIR BURDEN. HOW TO ENDURE PATENT TRAB AND COFFEEN. SOME AIVANTAGES OF MILITAIY HARMONY. BAFFO EVANSCIUBBES THE AIDNBURGS HON, AND MYLETZE MOVES OUT OF SCHLOEDERTOWN. ENGAGEMENT AT EL TORUP EL TUIPO. THE ABBLEANT IAND ABA DON TURNEW ILLE. ALCIOVE OCCUPIED BY A PORTION OF MYLETZES ARM . THE FIRST INCIDENTAL HORR O PORTION OF THE CAMPAIGN. A SEVERE FORCED MARCH UNDER FIERCE FIRE. HOW THE GLANDELINIANS PUNISHED STRAGGLERS.

THE IMMENSE ARMY about to move from Schloedertown was to consist of nearly one hundred million men and also the plans of the campaign contemplated a frequent departure of from the various railroads and dependence upon the long wagon and auto truck trains for provisions and food. The army was reclothed as far as pos ible possible and those troops together with all food necessary, and ammunition for infantry, cavalry and artillery and forage for animals in great quantities for a four months supply were all to be sent from Calverine by se secret routs the best of supplies which also secretly provided for the besieged at Vivian Wickey.nearly four to five hundred miles distant miles distant over a single pair of rails traversing an immensely hostile region.

Although the road was guarded by various armies of Glandelinians posted along its length, in strong fortifications, stockades, positions, block houses at fortified towns rivers and water and wood and other stations, the Abbleannians very often made very serious breaks, destroying thousands of engines , long lines of freight cars, thousands of passenger coaches, caused millions of great explosions, and burning or carrying away vast quantities of stores which were greatly needed by Isner Myletzes army. At its ordinary capacity when undisturbed the railroad could do little more than provide for the necessities of the army. This line was once the property of Abbleannian governm government and was known as th as the Heidi and Pundora and Sacramento Railroad, lines.

To accumulate supplies for such a tremendous forward movement in the face of such difficulties demanded more close economy and extraordinary effort than it could take a million of these volumes to describe. All the items of the rations for Myletzes Glandelinian army which could possibly be dispensed with were often so stricken out, litt little therefore being transported save hard bread, hard tack, bacon, sugar, coffee and salt. Bad beefcan driven from every farm the Glandelinians were allowed to raid, which was permitted under such circumstances so that raids of Myletzes army soon became more destructive than the passage of a tornado. Only the most necessary articles of clothing were issued.. Shoes and stockings absolutely needed on the march were absolutelt indispensable and were provided in some abundance, but little attention was usually given to supplying outer garments and and/or uniforms, the men bei generally being willing to wear the same old uniform and coats and trousers they had brought with them sin since the battle of Delight's Junction. And it was true in many cases that these dilapidated articles exposed more tfian the human anatomy than they con cealed but their wearers did not expect to see company which would be fastidious about such things, especially " women"

Many of the main officers were scarcely more presentable than even the men and with them partook of the same limited fare... but thesupplies often failed to accumulate. Therefore cutting red tape with a sudden stroke of his pen general Isner Mylet.e ordered all railroad cars reache reaching Calverine or coming from there,, and from whatever direction to be loaded with supplies and sent to the front, and in spite of the angry protests of the railroad officials all over the country his orders w re were obeyed to the letter and many trains often were captured. Henchforth trains were motely enough and it therefore may be said without even exaggeration that in many of them there were not more than six or seven cars belonging to any one road, and nearly all came from north of the city of Calverine, and some mysteriously from the direction of Vivian Wickey.

A few passenger cars were run as far south as Abbleann, but none beyond that point, and any officer or soldier seeking his command or who was a fugitive prisoner seeking refuge at the front was obliged on leaving Abbleann to find a place on the top of a freight car as a member of the armed guard which always accompanied each of these trains. He was always fired on by Angelinian or Abbleannian marksmen from behind hills or trees, these trains were often attacked by cavarly, and often the train was thrown from the track by some obstruction or some displaced rail and then was attacked at a great disadvantage by a considerable force of Angelinians and also Abbleannians. But this route nevertheless as dangerous and as rough as it was was one usually of greedelight compared with plank and dirt and brick or concrete and asphalt roads designed to most of those returning from some prison camp or hospitalsThe latter o were organized into temporary companies and regiments or detatchments, and obliged to drive and guard herds of captured cattle hogs and other farm animals, until by they reached their destination.....

Notwithstanding the difficulty,, of securing railroad transportation and the urgent necessity requiring it entirely for military purposes only, sanitary and other commissions,, and also voluntary philanthropists from every Glandelinian state having a soldier in the field, sought the freedom of th the railroad for their own use,,,, only to be fully denied by the lynx-eyed Isner Mylatze. Therefore one of those well meaning functionaries complained to his authorities that the great general had treated him with discourtesy, but the authorities re retorted in this very characteristic way-

"No passengers are allowed on the military trains, and therefore for the sake of the cause allow our generals and their armies the period of their campaigns to have the exclusive use of the one single track railroad everyfoot of which we must guard against the " CHRISTIAN DOGS" and every inch of which has cost us thousands of precious lives in men and officers."

And indeed for Glandelinia's invasion this slender artery of life upon which depended the very existen e of a hundred million men and perhaps that of the Glandelinian nation itself was soon with the aid of Hanley and others to be indefinitely extended to keep pace with the army under Mylatze pressing ever northward, every additional mile costing more scores of thousands of lives, adding to the risk of bad breakage by the enemy, and almost diminishing the moving columns to the ex ent of the e t extent of the detatchments left behind for its protection against the Nationals.

Important bridges and all strategic points were guarded v by veteran troops posted in earth works and artillery and with machine batteries but for the greater part of the defenses were more block houses, and ill made stockad stockades garrisoned by men only enlisted for the purpose. It was a service of vast importance but very monotonous and inglorious AND TH THE HOMELY PAINTED signs displayed at each of these liner posts addressed to passing soldier trainsa" please throw us a book or some thing to read" indeed told a sad story of their loneliness and anxiety. In many cases these garrisons which were either small or big were fiercely attacked, and often made gallant and successful resistance, though the nature of the Ab l Abbleannian attacks and their ferocity were far more horrible than the attacks of the savage indians upon posts in America in east or west. The heroic defense of Heidi referred to hereafter in length, a long and bloody battle is almost as famous as the actions at Delight's Junction----it was certainly far more momentous in its results and certainly disasterous to the attackers....

The Railway Construction and Repair corps of general Isner Mylatze's army but at frequent intervals made up not only of soldiers but also of loyal citizens was an all important ally, even though they worked constantly under severe fire.harge detatchments were stationed at many suitable points(providing they were sharp enough) and dispatched to every break in the railroad as soon as one occured but this was usually dangerous work, and in these cases the Abbleannians treated o soldiers and working civilians alike.As a matter of such things this corps though under fire frequently and set upon often was perpetually in motion and fought like demons also. And so completely and so zealously did it push the work despite all opposition, that the very most annoy Abbleannians themselves frau frequently were surprised out of their wits to hear the engine whistling in front within a few hours after they had inflicted damage which they believed could not be repaired in a month or a year,,,,,,,,

And duplicates of bridges and important trestles were kept in reserve to replace all those thatwere destroyed, each timber also beingnumbered and fitted ready to be put in place. Despite opposition some of this work was almost marvelous but the grandest achievement of this Corps was the replacement of the burned or broken bridges over every branch of the Aronburgs on or the general stream itself which had been destroyed by the retr eating retreating Abbleannian ,armies.

These structures being within the enemy's lines could not be duplicated from the storehouses and therefore most of the timber had to be cut at of the forest eve even at the risk of being fired upon from ambush, and on either side of the streams. They were sometimes from twelve hundred to eighteen hundred feet long, and from eight eighty nine to nearly two hundred feet high, yet they were replaced even while the workers were under fire in two to six or ten days.

Despite all the resistance to this military labor that was going on during the marches t the moral effect was so marvelous that it seemed a miracle. At least the nationals thoug thought it so. And general Mylestex Glandelinian troops were led to believe that even their communicationwith their own private homes in far away Glandelinia could never be in terrupted save for a few days or no stay. timewhile the Nationals was full, convinced, that Inner Mylstze and his whole army of men were all but omi omnipotent and that destructive measure were of little avail to arrest their progress, and believed there fore that Inner Mylstze was Glandelinia'an only " Christian general."

Indeed however it was evident that Emperor Vil Vivian himself had determined to nitify all the armies opposing Mylstze or attempting to to blow up even hills in his path, toast forests ablaze, blow up important railroad tunnels and the like, to do anything to check his advance even make floods, whereupon one of his generals made this remark; remarked//.:

" There is no use in doing that because general Mylstze carries duplicates to every thing except for the moon or stars."

Not less important was the service dangerous as it was, yet rendered by the Glandelinian Telegraph and Signal Corps, also made up of citizens besides soldiers and under the charge of many officers who worked under the Superintendent of all the Glandelinian yilitary telegraphs and the like. At every fort,,, and block house and other places along the railroad line was stationed one or more of these corps. Each one of th the operators had for his equipment a navy revolver and other weapons, and also a min- iature pocker " sounder" which always served a very good purpose. At times of course he happened to be driven out of his perilous office office was a dash of National cavalry or perhaps an infantry force seeking some lodgement upin upon the main railroad. Hehe frequently made his escape, and the first thing he did after bidding a hasty good bye to his assailants, was to climb a telegraph pole, attuten his very pocket instrument, and notify general Mylstze at the front, of the number and designs of the enemy and the direction in which they had gone. Never did the Abblemnians learn any thing of importance importance from this trusty servant.

He dealth in any kind of a disguised code which it was believed that ev en the crafty Vivian girls would never make out and which was absolutely unintelligible save to the initiated, and ev n this was frequently changed. Another important adjunct was the Signal Corps. As may be mentioned in all parts of the war its members were chosen from officers and most experienced men of the army, with a special view to great intelligence, unusual daring and adaptability. Each detatchment carried a yellow flag bearing a black and white square in a triangle colors easily seen at the greatest distan distance within eye sight, and signals were conveyed by certain movements to right or left vertical and horizontal more like the fashion of the boy and girl scouts of the Nationals but different meanings, indicating different signals, different letters and so on of the Glandelinian alphabet which is just like our own own.

The letters signalled stood for other letters so that a ciper co de was necessary to the interpretation of any message given thereon, and the key was was changed at frequent intervals.

The officer in command of each detatchment carried powerful field glasses and also a fine telescope in order to distinguish signals at a great distance. Probably of all actions of this war for both sides combined, there was no work more dangerous than this. The Signal corps whether of the Glandelinians or the Nationals always were seen to be at the most conspicious eminences whence they could overlook a large scope of country and detat detect the movement of either side, and frequently they erected a temporary observatory in the top of a tall popular or spruce and other big trees in full view and within easy range of the hostile rifle men or gunners of a battery.

All of their deeds were of momentous importance, as at Delight's junction after the falling back of the shattered christian waves, when general Mylstze signalled in person to general Hanley and encouraged his army there to protract its terrific resistance to general Vivians desperate headlong assault, untill reinforcements could reach it. This service of the Glandelinian signal corps was always fraught with more great persona. danger than even spying or being on the front firing line or under shell fire as when before Delight's junction the observing officers and men held their positions in trees and other places almost on the very line of battle and suffered terrible loss in killed of men and officers.

With each column, whether they be Scouts Scoudlers and others, marched a Glandelinian Pioneer corps, whose position was as near the advance as was safe, and which rendered invaluable service in repairing roads and bridges. As it traveled it " blazed" its way on trees by the road side, that troops following might make no mistake as to direction. Each army corps had its own peculiar " place" which was so familiar to all that a straggler knew at a glance, whether he was following, gunnonia, Hogania, Bicknell, or general Evans although there might not be a soldier or a wagon or army truck in sight!

And each army corps had a distinguishable badge--the color, red pink, white, green, yellow purple, blue or brown------ indicating the the divisions.....

The badge worn by these men were upon coat or hat, and it was also inscribed upon the wagons of the supply and ammunition trains. Some of these emblems emblems were peculiarly suggestive of the traits of the commands to which they belonged; " as the "Lightning" worn by the Fifteenth Corps noted for its rapid movements and sureness in reaching a place when wanted on time, 2 " The Glenglionsneum Serpent" of the eighteenth corps famious for itsfighting qualities, and capacity for making itself heard, and the " Jupiter" of the twelvth Corps which stood firm in action as the oak before the storm. These significant were the " Dragon" of the Thirty first corps Corps, the " Deo demon of the Fourteenth, and the others. It was therefore this complete system of organization, this close attention to seemingly small matters, in very many particulars peculiar to it alone that raised this army of Glandelinians to such a high degree of efficiency and gave to its chief such a wonderful mastr mastery over it, and to command it properly and to be able to drive all before him with such perfect ease.

It may have been seen in or read in real history that Napoleon once remarked that he had overun overrun the whole of Europe with the military bivouac. General Mylstze having read a lot of history therefore caught the same inspiration. Wagon trains were cut down therefore to the smallest number of wheels and animals, early in the days of th this war each regiment was provided with a ten mule wagon and three were considered necessary for one company. Even then when a movement was ordered it became necessary to abandon much camp paraphernalia because of not proper transportation. The cutting down process ha had been therefore going on gradually untill now only one wagon was allowed to a regiment and that for ammunition mainly, regimental officers being only permitted space enough for a tent-fly, a small mess kit, and a few light valises and this species of property was always the first o to be abandoned, if it became ne necessary to lighten the load,,, on account of broken down animals or unusually bad roads.

A mules for A pack mule for carrying cooking utensils was permitted to each company but was often dispensed with as most of the soldiers had to carry their own utensils. Each army corps of fifteen to twenty thousand men, had a commissionary and ammunition train of about five hundred wagons or army trucks. The various headquarters were provided with one tent each to shelter the general and staff, general Mylstze himself never using a tent, but some old hut or a half tumble down barn or shed to set the example. He was closely imitated save by general Beppo Evans who took with him so larg large a headquarters tent or train that it went by the name of" Beppo Evans's famious army Circus."

The slightning of the Glandelinian army indeed involved a g i grim contradiction of terms. The number of animals was constantly lessened and their burdens decreased but additional loads were put upon the troops. n The endurance of the men surpassed that of the best beasts. General Inner Mylstze estimated that the soldiers of each corps of armes carried upon their persons the very eq uivlent equivalent of three hundred wagon loads but this estimate includes arms and personal effects which would not be transported for the troops in any v event. The men became almost pack horses and encumbered as they were, their long and rapid marchessere nothing short of marvelious. Each man carried his long gun and accoutrements, sixty five rounds of ammunition in his cartridge belt, and box, and about two hundred and sixty more in his coat and pants pockets and shirt pockets, knapsack, and haversacks. His blanket and light rubber and other blankets were made into a long rol t rool roll the ends tied together like those of the gond Confederate or Union soldiers during the American Civil war so as to admit of being carried upon the shoulder, a method which the Angelinians and Angelinian and Ab lesminian soldiers nevervuse, as all things are for their wagon trains.

This roll generally contained an extra uniform shirt, a pair of socks and a half section of a " dog tent" or piece of light ducking(quack , quack) which when buttoned to the half carried by a comrade, made a very fair shelter for two men, and occasionall a soldier carried an extra pair of pants or an overcoat, but this evidence of extravagance was regarded with contempt by most men. Knapsacks were often discarded entirely. The provision issued to a solulen was a much abridged ration but it brought up the total weight of his burden to goodfourty to nearly sixty pounds, or more, accordin accordingto m how strong he was, no light loads to carry for days at a time, in all weather, in all seasons, and over all kinds of roads..

He always had a three days supply of hard tr tack and bread and fat pork and this was to last from ten to twenty days in case of necessity. If a soldier would happen to have a toothache which was common among Glandelinians all he did was to yank it out with a piece of strong string in the hands of a soldier who did the yanking. If the tooth resisted the pulling, the soldier got it out by a cutting process. But if the boys of Glandelinia were limited as to their rations in bread and mean meats they nevertheless had ot made up with his lavashiness of sugar and coffee. And here therefor therefore led it be recorded that coffee accomplished moe more tward the long resistance against the supression of the rebellion than any other one article, unless it be gun peas powder and explosives and fighting itself. It was very generous in quantity beyond reporach as to quality, and the Glandelinian soldiers surely knew how to extract its subtlest virtues. They were also allowed as much brandy and whiskey as could be secured. Each one carried an old " Hooligan style" tin can in which he brewed the delicious beverage---the summum bonum of human comfort, the panacea of all or for all ills. This coffee unsun black as the face of a plantation negro, and as Isner Myletze said" strong enough to make a bull drunk, and yet inno cent of lacteal adulteration, it gave strength hundred fold to my weary men, and the heavy laden, and courage to the despondent and sick at heart. The withdrawl of this coffee ration would have brought about the movement of my army homeward a great deal sooner than Emperor Vivian or Jack Evans could. In fact a most dastardly experiment on the part of a probable soulless Glandelinian officer almost provoked a great mutiny one time. It was when general Isner Mylezes army lay before those of the Vivians at Delights Junction. For about four weeks before the action there, there was being issued to the troops in lieu of the coffee berry, an a beautiful extract which purported to be a sort of resemblance of coffee, compounded with sugar or milk. It came in gallon tin cans and so much resembled patent wagon wheel grease grease, that it went by that name.

A simple tablespoon full stirred into a tin cup of hot water was supposed to produce first class home coffee, but it had a taste worse than Castor Oil or Epson Sault s and the taste and stomach revolted a ainst the villainous compound, and the air of November was streaked and shaken with the oaths and blasphemies of the most ornate and florid phraseology abounding in the most picturesque imagery of the hadean future of the patentee and the general in question, his heirs, administraitors and assigns forever. Therefore the Glandelinian commissionary department never had even the nerve nerve to attempt to issue another supply of the vile stuff..

The Glandelinian troops were now ready to mos move out of Schloedertown... The pomp and circumstance, of this glorious war,were to be left behind with the sick and lame, the tents and surpa surplus baggage. The army therefore at this time was nce at what we'll say its fighting trim and weight, stripped to the purpose ready and most willing a to give and take the hardest of blows... henchforth for many months to come, until the battle of Glorianna itself there were to be no daily drills or parades, exce except for a few days after the capture of Heidi, and again at Alto. The drum and fife were seldom to be heid and the army was to march and fight its way to the d city o of Angelinia Agathia, and then back to general Manley, and his armies.to the prompt and stirring sum ons of the bugle.

For a time during this ca campagin the armies of Isner Myletze and of Beppo Evans were to act independently and also without concert, like a balky teamsters team no two ever to pull together, and to strike as often as it was pos i possible to be done.General Mic- ollester Johnston himself had lately been t transferred by the Glandelinian Government to the west as general in chief to succeed general Lucus Turner who fell at Obsespirre Dantonia and general Isner Myletze had succeed general Black Brooks who had resigned from his command to take command of other armies aiding Manley in his operations against the Vivians in the northwest. These four were great and thorough soldiers, but Myletze and Manley were no friends because of Manleys unclean record, but he and Johnston were intimate friends, rejoicing in each others successes, or sorrowing in each others failures, and not only willing u but more ethan glad to be so placed as to co-operate.

They used the telegraph and signal stations freely and maintained a voluminous private disguised correspondence, exchanging views and so on with ref references to the movements of the various Glandelinian armies east south, north or west, suggesting means to this or that end, and each conforming his course to that of the odder.

In short, complete confidence and concert of action existed, and the war on their side was was carried on, from Schloedertown to Angelinia Agathia, with a series of great definite plans. May the 3th 1913. general Beppo Beppo Evans crossed the Aronburgs Run moving tward Beppo Lewsin and sixteen hours later as according to plans general Isner Myletze put his army in motion in the direction of Angelinia Agathia. And each of these two big Glandelinian armies were as fully determined to furnish so muc muc much employment to the nationals in his front, that no forces could be spared by either to confront the other.

Isner Myletze's army numbered about ninty six million men for battle.Against him any various christian army and not any particular one would have to muster about sixty to a hn hundred or are million, and which number may be increased according to necessity. The latter armies being upon the defensive and operating on interior lines lines was by all rules of war more than equal to its assailant. This ratio was theref therefore subs a substain substantially man maintained during the campaign ending with the repulse of the best of Glandelinian armies at Angelinia Agathia and Glorianna Glorianna hence it will be seen that the Glandelinian armies had no material advantage over the Nationals.

General Isner Myletze first step was the occupation of Callenburg, naturally a very strong pint point and a railroad junction of the greatest importance to the Nationals and indeed the direct route was to be impracticable. It lay through the pass known as Falcons roost a formidable spur in the Vivian Ridges. The army of Schl Scould Scoodlers under general Cannonia occupied the northern entrance to this pass supported by the thirty six Corps under general Hendre Hello while the army of Zimmermannia under general Dickon Picknellian began a series of well executed flanking movements for which it was to soon become famious for the Glandelinia cause,. Picknellians line of march lay o south northeastward to Aronbur Greek's Cup wh which gave an easy entrance to the villiage of Adelsheid to the south of Callenburg occupied by an Abbieannian army under general Nero. This movement was begun in excelle excellent order, Picknellian passing through Aronbur Creek Cup without the slightest difficulty and only meeting at the further end a strong cavalry force which was easily dispersed. On arriving in front of Adelsheid however he found the Abbieannian position and outer works so complete and well manned that he doubted his ability to take them by assault and therefore he only laid seige, and brought heavy guns to bear on the villiage. General y Myletze was greatly disappointedand said;

" such an opportunity does not occ r twice in any ones life but it seems that at this critical moment general Picknellian appears to be a little timid. He can capture more than half of Neros army and all his artillery and can one if he only tries. A seige just now is only a waste of time. Meanwhile Mcmanhile Cannonia and Hendro fought Nero hard at Heidro Pace Creek and all day long, making the scene a smoking inferno ntill the antill the failure of Picknellian's movement upon Adelsheid was known, when general Myletze ordered a concentration of a part of his main army upon the latter point the next day. As soon as this became known to Nero he abandoned Callenville and both armies faced each other at Adelsheid. Then the Abbieannians retreated to El purpo about a mile from Adelsheid.The strength of the position of the Abbieannian armies here and the nature and extent of their works proved to be all that Picknellian had asserted, and the entire army found serious work for three days May the 4,5,6th. The enemy's lines was developed May the 4 and the next day was a continuous engagement, more or less severe, along the entire line, the army of Omarians taking the brunt of the works after making eight successive charge charges in which they lost whole brigades of men for every rush, and finally gaining a heavily fortified ridge from which it might reach with its guns the railroad bridge across the Pinpoint river. The enemy all the next and third day made desperate and repeated attempts to dislodge Picknellian, Hendro, Cannonia, and also Myletze, and stormed the works with great fury even all night long without the slightest pause but without the slightest s cess success. The night of May the 6th Nero abandoned Adelsheid and El Po purpo.

The Abbieannian army lost 100,000 men in killed and wounded in this engagement. Myletzes army which part was engaged lost about only 23,456.

From all o er the loyal parts of Abbieannia came a fierce howl and complaint of rage on account of this disaster, and soon Nero was censured so severely that later on he thought it suter to vindicate himself in language which is indeed a fine tribute to the army which opposed and attacked him.

" My own operations against the Insurgents" he said" were much determined by the relative size and forces of the armies, and also a higher estimate of the Angelinian rebels than our Abbieannian editors and politicians were accustomed to express or even the loyalty seemed to entertain. Observation of almost thirty years of service had impressed fully on my mind the belief that the soldiers of the Regular National Guard of Glandelinia under Myletze were m re than equal in fighting qual qualities to any that has been formed in the drums of the war in other quarters of our our Abbieannian states. General Isner Myletzetroops with whom e we were contending had received a much longer training in war than any of those with whom I had served in forker times and are braver and fiercer fighters and more shrewd. Therefore it is not to be believed that such Glandelinian troops under a most sagacious and resolute leader, and covered by entrenchments were to be beaten by greatly inferior numbers."

Nevertheless general Nero so far heeded the clamor ag to issue a general order promising to give battle at Turnerville, and his troops as was discerned from the utterance of manp many prisoners were constantly taught by their officers that they were not being compl compelled to retreat because the fortunes of war was war was going against th them as such a thing for a righteous cause could not happen, but because their general was only trying to draw the enemy on to certain destruction. This was a fact inall ways but Myletze was a " Fox," he was a General George Washington, Sherman, Grant and a Lee in one and knew all the intentions of the national adversary...

On the 17th of May general Nero went into position at Heidiville but the army of Omarians pressed him so closely in front, while the army of Turnerannians threatened him seriously in one flank and that of the Glo- ollestinians on the other. The battle was desultory but quite violent, and lasted a day, with the attackers on all points repulsed with great loss. but nevertheless as Myletze had attackers on all points repulsed with great loss. but nevertheless as Myletze had such a large army not yet even seen an engagement Nero decided to retreat to Turner ville where he entrenched heavily, and extended his lines, and issued to his troops orders for a general battle. The battle was severe, but Nero's right wing was rolled up and his center demolished, and at no point could his strongest Abbieannia line take a stand and losing nearly 500,000 killed and wounded and 100,000 prisoners fell back on the 21th. General Nero however had considered the he retreated further southward on the 21th. General Nero however had considered the he retreated further southward on the 21th. General Nero however had considered the he retreated further southward other fixed the responsibility upon generals Vivianis and Culluhan who were the first to be forced from their positions by the attack of the rebells and who maintained that the attackers were overlapping in such a manner that the christian position could soon be infiladed by the Glandelinian artillery and that no fierce and headlong was the attack that they would be unable to hold it. General Hero also said of this:

" Although it was the best position we had so far I at last yielded before the violent attack of the Abbiannian insurgents under Cannonia in the belief that the confidence of two or three of the main corps of the army of their unable to resist the enemy would inevitably be communicated to their troops and further further produce that inability.

Out of this affair an angry discussion grew and many were the statements made on either side, your general Culluhan in particular entering bitter denial. And in the face of these conflicting statements it was extremely difficult to arive at the truth. Upon abandoning Abberville the Abbiannians retreated across a small stream known as the Ribbon Run burning a number of creek and railway bridges behind him and setting the haystacks and other farm property afire, although hotly and immediately pursued, Here Mylets halted his big army for a brief time for much needed rest as well as to enable the construction corps to repair the railroad, an unexpected give opportunity for reloading the provision trains which were well nigh exhausted.

Meanwhile a division under general Tenerline made a rapid movement upon Roma somewhat to the right and rear, and entered that place after a long and brisk engagement in which it lost about 10,101 men in killed and wounded. This success not only relieved the principal column of Glandelinians from constant threat but it also made an easy pathway for general Physician who was marching from the Aronburgs Run River with six divisions of the Eighteenth corps ret iring from" Veteran Furlough." Alcove was the next constructiti on obstruction and a most formidable one. General Mylotze determined to avoid it and its immediate region by a movement to the right and on the 23th general Cannonia moved his command toard Grandon taking fourteen days rations in knew haversack and wagon. He had approx had approached near A country Country catholic Church now in half ruins when he found that the enemy had abandoned Alcove and was again in his front!

A sharp and severe battle followed lasting all day, in which the enemy was driven for quite a distance to the vinicity of the Church, where he entrenched and Generals Bicknellian and Cannonia were called to close up with the remainder of Mylotzes army then in line. In this movement general Bickl Bicknellian was sharply and fiercely attacked in the vinicity of Alcove but was met by brisk work had succeeded in throwing up slight fortifications and repulsed the enemy after another day of fighting, inflicting great loss, and sustaining considerable loss also.

Some few days afterward general Mylotze occupied Alcove again reaching the railroad and the Glandelinian Construction Corps was set to work rebuildin the bridges over the " Little Ribbon creek".

During the month since leaving Schlosdertown Angelinia state Izner Mylotze had driven his Christian enemy nearly two hundred miles, fought six severe battles, captured twelve hundred guns, and two hundred thousand prisoners, and killed and wounded one million five hundred thousand of the nationals. His own loss in killed and wounded was about one hundred and ten thousand men.

THE main army was joined at Mac penzie was general Bruno Glotze with the third, fourth and Fifth Divisions of the Eighteenth corps of Mic-Hollestinians. Indeed general Izner Mylotze had been very loathe to leave Schlosdertown beforethe arival of these Glandelinian troops who had been home on the ten days Glandelinian Veteran furlough granted to all Glandelinian soldiers who would re-enlist for another term of four or five years. On account of the movements of other christian armies and because of great fires, they could not assemble in proper time however, and therefore he had been compelled to begin the campaign without them,, as he did not see it proper to wait.

They were greatly needed now to make up for the losses sustained thus far, besides general Izner Mylotze's intimate acquaintance with them, dating back to the earliest days of the war indeed led him to depend upon them in an unusual degree.

General Price's command had rendezvoused at Gandandonia and was to be transported by boat to Meldon Picknell town on the Aronburg Run River then ce marching across the country by Way of Turmertown, Northern Angelinia state. There were some very serious incidents connected with this march. General Bruno Krutze a valient officer was always noted among the Glandelinians for his strong self assertion and a disposition to make this trait very conspicious when he happened to be in a potion where he could do so. Notwithstanding urgent and repeated repeated orders from gener general Izner Mylotze to hurry his command to the front he was forced to tarry at Gandonia bythe concentration of a strong christian army at that point point under general Francis Gandonia Vivianis.... He did not like to force his way through without orders, and once he possibly thought he had some excuse for making such a demonstration but his officers advised him against it. The transports which he was expecting were under the control of high officers andthough they too regarded the emergency as sufficient to call for any unusual effort, they did nothing because they had recieved no orders whatever. Nearly all the transports chartered by the Rebel Government were engugese engaged between Gandonia n and prts on the lower Mic-Hollester Run, and though the diversion of any of them to a trip up the Aronburgs Run seemed to him more than important an undertaking to engage in, yet the nationals were ever on the watch and nothing was attempted for fear of an eg engagement of such an unusual extent that it might result in unusual disaster. At this juncture Gen general Seeman Sesemann of the IIf 144th divis division commanding the post at Gandonia recieved telegrams from Izner Mylotze, enquiring as to the whereabouts of General Krutzes commands, and being informed on return telegram of the real state of affairs, he then directed him to take any measure necessary to expedite its departure if it had not already gone, and to crush general Gandonia if possible.

General Sesemann at once issued orders for the fleet to move up the river under full steam under any conditions to fight t its way through if necessary, and it therefore happened that the longest river side cannonade ever imagined occured asthe fleet s owned up and was fired upon by national batteries for the distance of fourty miles. But the fleet got through inflicting more damage than the ships recieved. General Miriam who was extremely anxious to make the junction with Izner Mylotze at once embarked his four brigades, and proceeded up river closely followed by the remainder of general Caldeslilians division, and that of general Stonemen. General Miriam in particular was highly pleased with general Sesemanns action and therefore expressed his obligations to him in warm terms.

The march from Gandonia was an exceedingly unpleasant experience indeed. Thirty days of assually high living at home, feasted by mothers, wise wives and sisters upon all the enervating delicacies to which they had so long been strangers, together with ballsand late suppers and doing no kind of work at all but taking it altogether too easy had softened the muscles of the men while their pampered appetites rebelled against short rations of course food.

But there was urgent necessity for these troops at the front numbered numbering about 1800000 10,000,000 infantry, and 5,678:000 cavarly and delay there fore was not to be tolerated. The men did not under stand the main requirments of the case as did general Bruno who had been goaded to almost desperation by the sharp and frequent messages of general Mylotze, bidding him to push forward in the shortest time that was possible, and they, men and officers, cursed horribly at their commanders for the rapid pace at which they continually pushed them. Sixteen to twenty miles a day was the shortest march expected, and a number of fast more frequent ly from thirty to fifty miles was the distance actually accomplished. This indeed was no small task loaded down as the men were with rations and ammunition, besides the artillery was late in May the weather was extremely hot, And during the greater part of the march the column was constantly and severely annoyed by Rodney Graves " Night Riders, the most dreaded of the Abbiannian cavarly, which was sufficiently strong enough to do great damage, set fire to the ca camps, and wagon trains and so take many prisoners and the cavarly was numerous and alert enough to keep the blood warm and cause the Glandelinians to keep themselves on the watch night and day.

On the 27th of May the troops reached Labrania on the Aronburgs Run river one of the MOST BEAUTIFUL and picturesque situations visited by either the Glandelinian or christian armies, during the entire war itself. Later in the day a pontoon was laid, ad they crossed to the northwest side. Before reaching Landale much of the route lay over a very mountainous region but a paradise in scenery. Falcons Heights a spur from the northern continuation of the range of which in later years the famous Glorlandia Heights will be the most conspic conse conspicuous members was partic ulry particularly dangerous not because of its condition but it was a perfect hornets nest for the whole distance.

This was not a single peak but two sharp pointed mountains thickly swarming at times with Falcons and of no great altitude, yet at some points very precipitous and greatly resembling the Falcons Nest mountian in Switzerland. The hill on which the roa army passed was great in slopes and through this section a roadway had been cut, but so narrow as to forbid only one single team. Elsewhere you could overlook an almost an almost perpendicular descend of many hundreds of feet, and a sudden pitch sideways or a rough jolt against one of the many huge boulders which lay in the roadway was sufficient to upset a wagon and send it tearing down the mountain side and over and over. Several such incidents actually occured but fortunately no human life was lost through such accidents, the teamsters being fortunately enough to leave their seats or saddles and reach a place of safty before the crush came. The passage of the wagon train unusually put a great deal of arduous labor upon the troops, and often they were fired upon from many hidden places by enemies lurking in ambush and it was by no means unusual to see a full ten squads of soldiers bolstering up a wagon in order to keep the center of gravity within the limit of safty, and endure all the dangers danger from shots coming from ambush ambush.

The fire of these hidden Abbiannian marksmen in all parts of this mountain was very severe in many cases, and the Glandelinians had no means or opportunity to fire back whatever and revenge their losses. This kind of firing from ambush so caused considerable struggling which was frequent during the march and therefore severe punishments were methodod out to repress it. In one instance by the personal o order of general Lyons, and under his very eye one of the offenders was tied to the top of a covered wagon face down ward, his arms being extended, and his wrists tied to either side of the wagon to the side lathe face downward. Unable to see through the top of the vehicle, or look up at the sky or down at the road his punishment was painful enough in the passage over the mountain as he was k jerked violently from side to side with every motion of the wagon, and occasionally fired on by some hidden zAbbisanhian soldiers behind rocks or trees. When night came the wagon pulled in to the place selected for general Bruno's headquarters, and the general recognizing his victim and appreciating the fact that the breach of discipline had been sufficiently punished ordered him to be cut loose and provided a good supper and a full canteen of " commissarry" then dismissed him with an injunction to remain in the ranks there after. This Clandelinian a soldier accepted the liquor, if not the advice as the " Ahombe hokofubio" and both he maines.

Near the city of Hendrickson still northern Angelinia state, a countr country post office yeilded a large supply of A bbisannian mail sent out by the National army undergeneral Vivian in the month of march previous. The letters had been held at this place previous on account of the impossibility to forward them to their destination and were sealed as as when the writers sent them out. The Clandelinians though unusually breaking the regard for having respect for personal private mail had no respect for the sanctity of the Abbisannian mail during war time and therefore distributed and opened them; the contents in many instances provoking great merriment, and other emotions. But the following following extract from one of these letters gave an inside view of the feeling not only o in the Federal ranks but at their homes as well------

AS ALBERTINIA. MARCH THE LAST. 1913.

DEAR FATHER.

As I feel sure you will not be able to hear anything at Albertinia fa o favorable to our ugly cause, I willtherefore give you all the particulars known as far in regard to our great and unusual victory. ward the later part of March after several and most bloody but unsuccessful attempts, Emperor Vivian forced Manley to battle near Albertinia(Calverinia south) which up to the present time ha has continued with great fury and is still raging. Robert Vivian our glorious king has gained a great and most glorious victory and crushed the Clandelinian army completely. Manley in his retreat destroyed Albertinia entirely yesterday setting all the buildings on fire, crossed the Mis-sollester Run River and is flying tward Jennie warner hotly and vigorously persued by Emperor Vivian with the noble army of Angelinian and Abbisannian veterans who have already thrashed him soundly, taking over six hundred thousand prisoners, one thousand five adred and fifty two pieces of artillery, a long line of wagons which could stretch to a distance of sixty five miles and innumerable small arms; etc. General Vivian will make him yes victory still more disasterous to the " most wicked government the world ever saw. It is his intention to drive the enemy across the Aronburgs on and thence out of Calverinia before he stops. Expect me home in about twenty days as I have been wounded in the battle. I think by that time another large number of little child slaves will be free. with much love as ever, it was raining with occasional thunderstorms of unusual severity and almost without intermission during the latter part of the march but shortly reaching the Turner Creek the sun again came out and died the clothing upon the soldiers. However the river was greatly swollen and was rising rapidly starting to flood portions of the country country and as the pontoon train was almost hopelessly an and anchored in mud; far in the rear, the troops were ordered to ford the d stream. Being severe to again marching in watersoaked clothing, they removed their shoes socks, and trousers, and even upper garments and strapped them upon their knapsacks and then plunged in dressing themselves on gaining the further shores. March the 5th general Brunois command reached Loveton and opened communications with the main body of the army which was ten miles further northwest. Some women and child e children who witnessed the passage of this Clandelinian army in concealment remarked that they never saw an army of " Adams"ever before in their lives.

Your son.

CHAPTER THIRTY NINE.....

I. WHICH I TRUST WILL BE INTRODUCED TO GENERAL MYLETZ. THE CHARACTER OF THE GENERAL AND THE CHARGE OF HE IS BRINGING HIM A SLAVE CHILD. THE TWO CHARGES, JUDITH AND A FIX QUESTION.

Late in the morning of a chilly day on the twenty first day of ..rch March while the reinforcement Clandelinian army which was marching toward Angelinia Agathia had built an in its advance because of a driving wind and blinding blizzard storm two Clandelinia generals of evidently very high rank were sitting in a big warm tent by a round table all alone, and if any one were to enter the tent they would observe that it was not even so well furnished as a generals quarters should. The army had encamped in front of a small village called Rosenburg, and soldiers who were on guard duty were sheltered as much as before as much as possible from exposure to the dreadful weather. Inside the tent there was no one else present, the Sentry having recieved strict orders to allow no one in at the moment no matter what his mission was or what he wanted. The generals were sitting by a round table, one on each side, and were discussing some subject which though of great interest was nothing about military affairs, plans of battle, strategy or the like.

As I have said before there were two generals hitherto seemingly of the same rank and commission but one of the parties whom observed why should not seem strictly speaking to come under the species of a general belonging to Myletzs army and also a general who did not have the same nature of character as the Clandelinian generals serving under Myletz. He was a tall slim built man, with the usual features that are observed when you have a view of clandelinian generals under the Manleys, coarse common place features, and that strange haughty yet eagle like air which marks a general who is trying to win his own campaign if he had to fight a war to extermination to do so. even child butcher ed so one for a Clandelinian general he was dressed much in di differently, lets say, something like " overdressed". His uniform coat was covered with decorations of many gaudy colors, and the rim of his large blue gray hat which (which soldiers under the Manleys usually wear) was plentifully bedecked with cord decorations and a blue hat band not only around the top but also around the outer rim and arranged underneath with a circular row of silver bells something in the same style that you observe in one of the dancehalls in the stories of Oz quite in keeping with the general air of this Clandelinian chieftian.

He wore an unusually long beard, and bobbed hair of a dense black color; and his hands large and coarse were of a non burned color and he wore a heavy gold watch chain with a bundle of images of child slaves of unusual size and colors attatched to it which in the order of conversation he was in the habit of flourishing and jingling with unusual satisfaction. To have one good look at his face was enough; it would have made the most faint.

His conversation was unusually free, and was garnished at fre ,uent intervals with various profane and blasphemous expressions and words, which even the most wicked man in this country would not like me to use here. The other general had an appearance of some unusually high prince in a splendid gray uniform, but he was not overdressed, and also his appearance was not quite so unusual though a little villainous too and the arrangement of the tent inside, and the general air of the housekeeping of it, indicated easy and even opulent circumstances. As was stated before the two generals were in the midst of an unusually interesting conversation.

The bearded man whose name was general Raymond Richardson Federal said-

" Why cannot you arrange the matter as I plan. She'll be a great help to you in your desperate campaign and will be of value."

" I am not able to make any trades or buy slaves in that way,-- I positively can't general Federal said the other hitting by a glass of wine to his lips. " and beside besides what I do in my campaigns is when I have not enough National prisoners I exchange slaves for my men who are held with the Nationals. so why is it I should buy a slave from you when you ever what is over 10,000 and I even do not know her value."

" Why the fact is general Myletzs the little girl is an uncommon little slave. Her name is Juanita Marcia Lillian, and for a that she is worth and was worth in my command she is worth that same anywhere. She is steady, a good worker, honest and capable for her years, go and can do her work like a clock. If you turn down my offer you will be sorry."

" You are one in the room as all other child slaves as child slaves go" said Myletz finishing the glass. " I have in my army now about forty thousand slaves, and there are more girls than boys. why do many girls. are you trying to make my army an army of girlish ones."

" No I'm not. But then you should try that little sprite at least. She is a good sensible pious little girls as all these slaves are, having received it as we know from the Christian Boys. Out of her training also from her parents who are dead, and I believe she is trying to be one of those holy Christian saints you often hear about. As wicked as I am and as big a child butcher as I allow my army to be I have trusted this little sprite with everything I do, money, and we should let her come and go round this war torn country, and I always found her true and square in everything. However cannot keep her within bounds, army because the Vivian Girl princesses seem to know something about her, and are not only looking for a chance to get her from us Glandelinians but has the Gemini scouting every place and Glandelinian camp for her. So as you see I have come this fifteen hundred miles from the west with her hoping to interview you sir and have you buy her at this reasonable sum."

"Some folks don't believe I do with my slaves as it is your Excellency" said Mylets with a candid flourish of his hand but I do and sometimes have to. I had dages me 4 day or two before the Battle of Delight's Junction about 30,000 slaves in my army and they were all valuable too. I exchanged them for prisoners, two slaves to a man and they fetched me a pretty number of the soldiers back too, for the thirty thousand slaves enabled me to regain over fifteen thousand Glandelinian soldiers who were prisoners in the hands of the Nationals. I had one slave now that I retained under any conditions at first, for I took a liking to the little boy, and he was good and gentle and prayed for his freedom every day and begged me often to exchange him for a prisoner. When I secured him I bought him of a trader and it cost me a pretty good sum too, and later one of my generals was captured, general Algrey by name and I exchanged the lad for him. At first the Nationals refused on the grounds that a slave is not worth a general but I argued that if the preaching about child slaves is really true and that the Nationals were fighting for their freedom they would be mighty glad to accept the boy as it was for the general. Yes I consider exchanging a child slave for a prisoner as a valuable thing when you have very few National soldiers as prisoners within your own lines, especially when the slave is the genuine thing; but general Manley gets sore and raises a racket. But what I do with my own slaves is my own business."

"Well Jannie'sgot the real article if ever a little slave had" replied rejoined the bearded general. "My last fall at the early part of the war a Christian general of an army that was then opposed to me approached me at a truce and ofv offered to give me back a great general for the little slave. It was a great way to do business with me but as I valued the slave too highly I refused. I am sorry to part with her I must say but it is dangerous to keep her in my army. Why only six weeks ago an officer came to me and says" General the Vivian Girls are having the country and all Glandelinian armies combed by secret spies for your important slave. They want to free her. so I says to jannie says I I trust you keed because I think you are a christian dog--I know you wouldn't cheat, tell me do you know the Vivian Girls and what they are? She comes back with the answer sure enough I knew she would. Many other slaves said to her Jannie why don't you run away from the camp and try to find those Vivian Girls who are looking for you. You will be free sure enough."An Hunter does not want me to do that and it is too dangerous if you are caught you die she answers. I am sorry to part with Jannie I must say but I'll have to. You ought to let her cover the whole balance of the depth I owe to you and you would general Mylets if you had any conscious.'

Well for a Glandelinian general who is fighting for a cause that is declared by many a very wicked one, I have got just as much conscion conscience as man, a man who usually is in the child slave trade and so on" said Mylets jocularly" and then Iam I'm ready to do anything in reason to I oblige a comrade, but you mean a little too hard on me. Iam demanding the price as she is, and if you cannot afford to give the kid for my price let's forget the business."The other general sighed contemplatively and poured out some more brandy, at least he was a little giddy now.

Well n then general Mylets how will it be to trade?" said general Federal after an uneasy interval of profound silence.

I am not incle inclinded to trade but if it must to done it must.

Well then how will you trade, have you a boy or girl that you could exchange for her that mig t be of the same value as she is.

Hum.---none that I could well spare to say, its only your desire to get rid of Jannie because of the Vivian Girls being after her that makes me desirous to accept your sale or trade. But I don't like parting with any of my special slaves I have now a when I can use them to other good advantages.'

Here the canvas cloth of the tent entrance was suddenly pushed aside, and an officer entered with a small boy slave who was between six and seven years of age. Though a slave he was foreign as it could be easily told by his face and his appearance was somewhat remarkable beautiful and engaging and seemed to be of English birth. His black hair was as fine as silk or floss and hung in long tobbed fashion about his round dimpled face, and his pair of large dark blue eyes was full of fire and softness and gazed at from beneath the rich long lashes as he peered curiously and with a little fear into the tent. He wore a child slave custom almost resembling the one seen in Ashleys army (like a prison garb) and he had a certain air of defiance despite being a slave yet blended with bashfulness and a little fear,which showed that he always was determined to run away and seek his freedom when he grew old enough, and also by his appearance it was evident that he recieved little attention from his master, who was general Mylets himself.

Hi hello there slavy" said general Mylets whistling and snapping his finger loudly what brings you here. We are in secret conference and want to be left alone."

The child frightened scampered toard the exit with all his strength but the officer who had brought him sternly grabbed him saying "pillow hold on there kid. Then adding Your excellency he knows something about that child spy called Gertrude angeline and therefore thought you ought to know."

Mylets looked sharply at the officer and said; nang girl and boy spies of christian armies. Did I not tell you sir that I've an important interview and did not want to be bothered. Clear out or Hell-I'll"

The officer turned to obey when the other general signaled saying to Mylets- pole I like to take a look at the kead. Come here slavy.'

The child hesitated and edural almost got angry and said again" Go CUME HERE"

The child came up and the general looked him over, examined his hair, and then looked at Mylets. Mylets knew tht the le lad could do some tricks or two and think ingto amuse general federal said to the lad;

Now George shot this great glandelinian general how the Vivian Girls dance and sing.

The boy looked at general Federal and not liking the looks of his face hesitated hesitated, and then as Mylets insisted a little little more sternly he began one of those graceful unusually beautiful dances which he had seen any one of the Vivian Girls perform perform and also started singing one of the Christian war songs, accompanying the sing in singing with actions according to the words and nature of the song, all in perfect time to the music.

It is certainly g and grand" said general Federal looking on and feeling his long br beard. it " it is certainly grand. "

" Now George walk like one of the high Christian generals do when he is on drill or dress parade" said his master throwing an apple to the lad.

" Instantly the lad stood up as straight as his could assumed the appearance of great haughtiness and With his masters walking stick placed at the shoulder like a general has his sword strided proudly about the room his childish face drawn into one of the e of those dignified expression in imitation of general Vivish himself.

Both of the Glandelinian generals laughed loudly and most heartily until the t tears ran down their cheeks.

Now George said general Mylets after his fit of laughr laughter was overcome" show us how the Christian Priests Says Mass on a Sunday."

The boy stood before a table and made all the imitations of some Priest saying Mass toning the words through his ose with the most imperturbable gravity.

Oh Great for alad of his age said general Federal That chap is a promish for an any one I'll warrent. Tell you what " said he suddenly clapping his hand on Mylet s Mylets shoulder--" I'll give you Jannie for that chap and that will settle the bush business. Come now general if that ain't doing the proper thing then I'll go and die"

At this moment the tent door was again p sh pushed gently open and a soldier of higher rank than the officer who had brought the lad apparently about fourt, five years of age saluted and entered the tents he brought with him the little girl known as Jannie, and here she enters the story full and great as she is to be in later times as great a heroine as any one ofvthe Vivian Girls or their friends. I'll give the reader a good glance at this little girl ti identify, that she is of Spanish birth. She had rich dark brown eyes with long lashes, and long bobbed silky hair but longer than that of the boy. The Spanish brown of her complexion gave way on the cheek a perceptible fli flush which deepened when she saw the gaze of general Mylets fixed on her and indeed he looked at her in bold and undisguished admiration.

She had only a short thin dress on but of the neatest possible fit and set off to advantage her finely moulded shape, a delicately formed hand and a trim foot and ankle were items of appearance that did not escape the quick eye of the general.

Well is that the slave you call Jannie said Mylets to Federal as the child stood sti stood still and looked hesitatingly at him.

She is just the one walk speaking about sir.

" By Jupiter" said Mylets turning hastily to general Federal in his exultation " there is a fine little girl slave now. you surely could have made a stir by fortune on that slave my place you'd have taken her any day. I've re exchanged over a thousand like to to the Nationals long before this and never found me set to look like this one."

I have no desire just now to make my fortune on her" said general Federal airily and seeking to turn the conversation, he asked Mylets to uncork a bottle of fresh wine and then as Mylets handed him a glass and the former drank it, he ask asked him his opinion of it."

" It is excellent, sir beyond questioning" said general Federal then turning and slapping his hand familarly on Mylets shoulder a second time he added;

" come now will you trade the boy for the girl. or will you give me 10,000 dollars for her---what will you do?"

I'm sorry not I " but I will not pay forty dollars for no slave" said Myletze. Besides I have not that much. Therefore I cannot buy a slave at least them for a thousand. Nothing more for the purpose for which I buy them."

" Aye, aye but you are foolish to do that and in some way break military rules cause it ain't the right way to do to exchange child slaves for prisoners taken in war for the government does not what those slaves free. Manley always says such things about your doings that I do not like to think of and says you have no sort of right calculation to exchange for prisoners that way and if he only had the authority he would stop it. Just shows how he likes to interfere in other peoples business and that alters the whole case I believe."

" I tell you general Federal this subject must not be spoken off. I'll use child slaves for no other purpose out what I have been doing, and I'll pay no more than a thousand I and if you insist I'll say no and mean no" said Myletze decidedly.

" Well you'll exchange her boy the boy then won't you or let me have the boy" said the general" You must own that I'll value him cheaply to the gold."

" What on earth can you want with that boy, slave?" said Myletze.

" Oh, general Manley can make good use of him, he'll buy the lad from me or exchange him to raise for the slave market. He'll be a more fancy article for Manley than any slave he ever had yet---can sell him for field work, building of fortifications, or for a waiter or for a waiter to a bunch of generals and other officers and so on and the, 'll pay very, hand handsome for him. or he can be a sort of servant for Manley, he'll be a real handsome boy to open doors wait and ten upon him. Child slaves like this little boy will bring in a good sum and this little devil is such a peculiar concern he would he would be just the right slave."

" I rather would not like to part with him sir" said Mylstze thoughtfully" The fact is sir I'm not the kind of men most of you Glandelinian generals are. I am more humane and I hate to sent off the boy sir, not know to whom he'll belong or what'll happen to him. I'd rather keep him to exchange to the Nationals for a private sir."

" Oh you do. Well that is something unusual of that nature sir. But I understand most perfectly. It i is mighty unpleasant for these child slaves I do reckon and they usually go through a perdition of horror sometimes, fiends of course sir to whom the boy or girl belongs, and what portion of the army they is in. Him a wicked general myself and have seen a bit of it, have caused it sir, and I have seen these screeching screaming times that will make your hair stand up on end. I have seen things sir which if the Christian dogs would have witnessed witnessed they would give no quarter to any Glandelinian army whatever. They are mighty unpleasant for me too sir as wicked as I be but as I manage the child slave business, I gel generally avoids all these things sir. I'm very particular to whom they go to sir. Now what if you keep the two of them then and give me a chance to pay up and I'll be better off. If you need the need so bad them I'll come down to a thousand providing you give me another need in her place and keep the boy."

" I'm afriad I cannot do it sir. It would be brutal."

" Brutalnot if I do it right. Of course these slaves are not like children of other folks, they'll get over things only if you manage them right. Now they say sir" said Federal assuming a candid and confidential air" that this kind of buying and selling is hardening to the feelings, but I do not think it os is so providing it is done right. Fact is I never manage my slaves like I see many others do the business. I've seen em as would pull a child slave to pieces because she fell down from the effects of overwork, or lay about with a terrible long whip, and the whipped slaves screeching like mad all the time. That is very bad policy, damages the article--makes em quite fit or unfit for any kind of work. Therefore it is better to sell slaves to the army and not to a pro private owner as the army uses them properly(which is true)I knes a real handsome child slave once whom I sold to an owner known as Boob lour and she was a beauty but was entirely ruined by this kind of handling. The fellow that owned her did not want her bun baby brother around, and this little girl was one of the real high up spirited sort especially when her blood was up. I tell you she hugged her little brother as tightly as it was pesible, and screamed and fought and went on real awful. Wicked as I am it made my blood run coldto think of it, and when they carried off the boy and sold him, and locked her up in her slave cabin she r just broke out one day and ran away from the camp and somehow got a squad of christian soldiers to save the boy before he was gone. Clear waste sir of ten thousand dollars just for want of good management that is what it was. No matter how wicked yo are est is always best to do the more humane thing sir, for that is my experience. Do not sell to a private owner whose character is not known. Sell them to the military. They are taken better care off, and of course they work hard, but get their full reward for it."

And the general leaned back in his chair and folded his arms with an air of virtuous dee decision. The subject appeared to interest general Mylstze deeply for while the formsr was thoughtfully peeling a large apple general Federal broke at a out afresh with becoming diffidence, but as if actually driven by the force of truth to say a few more words.

" To tell the truth it does like look proper for a Glandelinian general of my rank to be praising myself, but I will just have to say it because it is the truth.

But I believe I'm known as to frequently bring in to any Glandelinian army in the war the finest drove of child slaves that any general or military government has b has bought---at least they have told me so-- and I have done so a hundred times or more----all in good condition and strong and healthy ones too, fate and likely and I have made far more the cause than any one else in the same business. And I declare they that is it is through my way of managing things sir, and humanity sir is the best way to make profit on the slaves."

General Mylstze did not say anything else but-

" Not sir many of the generals under the Manleys have laughed at your notions sir, and they have talked to me about them. Your ways of exchanging child slaves for a glandelini soldier hold a prisoner in the army of the christian dogs ain't popular in their eyes, and they ain't common but as you see it is your way of doing business when you have no christian dog prisoners then stick to ir sir it is a good policy in my eyes. I would stick to em if I were you and I realize well on em sir for your way will some day pay well too I may say. and do not pay any attention to either John Manley, or the other three Manleys, for there are no bigger Jackasses in the world to day sir than they are who are always getting licked in battle while I or you keep the Christian dogs ageing as if pesy cats were chasing bulldogs."" and the general ou laughed at his joke. There however was something so piquant and original in these last words that general Mylstze himself laughed the most heartily for he had no very goodfeelings for General Manley the biggest murderer on earth. Perhaps the reader could laugh too but you know Jackasses comes in a variety of strange forms now adays and there is no end to the odd of things that even such a Glandelinian general like Manley will say and do that makes him the greatest of all Jackasshs ever in existance or dreamed off, besides in the bargain being an old goose and duck at the same time.

The way general Mylstze laughed somewhat encouraged general Federal to proceed proceed.

" Nos sir, it is the most strangest of all things now but there is one thing I could never get into one slave owners head. Now this one is known as Augustinia St Clare who used to be an old partner of mine in pre war days down in Glandelinia city. He was for a slave owner and trader, and buyer and seller one of the most clever of all fellows I ever knew, but he was a very devil with slaves, and if you have ever sir read " Uncle Tom's Cabin, sir and know the character of Legree you'll understand that Legree is a saint compared with St Clare--on principal it is you see his system to make his child slave plantation a regular seething hell. I visted him often and I used to talk to St Clare. N " why St Clare" I used to say to him" when your slaves take sick, or break down from overwork and so on what's the use of lashing them with cat-o-nine-tails- and using them for footballs, and knocking and kicking and chocking them and the like. It is ridiculous and dreadful St Clare and don't do you no sort of good and they'll die on you. Why the way you make them work it is natural for them to break down, and if nature can't do a thing in one way it'll have to do it in another. Besides St Clare" says I " It just destroys and spoils your slaves, they'll never live through it, and some time the elder ones will get rebellious---particular those Spanish and Itilian ones do and its a devil of a time you will have if they start a act of sedition. Now why cannot you treat them better, coax them up and treat em fiar and if you cannot manage them sell them to the army for a good sum. The military will give you a good suj for an slave. Depend on it St Clare uses a little humanity, for that goes a heap further than all your yelling, swearing and beating, and it pays better and you'll make better profit on your slaves." but St Clare does not listen to my advice, and he spoiled so many slaves which I even had loaned to him to care for me till they were sold that I had to at last break off with him, though in other ways he was a good hearted fellow, and as fair a business hand as is going, and if he favored a slave he was good to it, no matter how mean he was too others. But I'd like to capture the Vivian Girls and give them to him for a change" he muttered under his breath. " He'll teach them a thing or to and break them down so they'll never bother a Glandelinian army again."

" And do you find your ways of managing the business that way by sending off the Vivian Girls to him so he'll have half kill them and cause the Government to refuse Glandelinia any quarter" said Mylstze.

" I never gave them to him." said Federal surprised that Mylstze overheard his last words. "N" I only wished I had the chance. You see they trouble the armies a good deal by their spying work and though I take care to whom I sell the young slave girls and about other unpleasant parts, I'd give anything to get the Vivian Girls put out of sight---out of mind you know---and when its clean done and they have had a good experience under this St Clare and it can't be helped they'll never bother the--the--the--Glandelinian army again: I usually do not allow my armies to massacre children either, just like yours is not allowed to do so, and you know it too, but I do wish any thing on them spies. It aint you know as if they were really slaves that is brought up in the way of expecting to obey orders like the slaves do but if they had a taste of St Clares manners they'd behave themselves hereafter and leave our armies alone. And children you know that is fetched up properly have no wishes ways like violets and her slayers sisters so all these things come up easier."

" I'm afraid you got the wrong idea" said Myletze. Do not we send in our own spies whether men or not, and don't they torment the Nationals like the Vivian girls do. And are not the Vivian Girls just as great a bunch of heroines as a soldier would be in the same way. "

" But I do not excuse that." said Federal. " They are Princesses, and they should remain home as they have no business in this war.".

" I'm afraid you have not been brought up in the proper understanding then." said Myletze. " But your desires about their care would be of no use. They are naturally used to many horrible things and therefore that might be a case where Myletze would give any price to you to take them off his hands."

" Spose not, you Glandelinian generals of this section spoil the slaves I reckon. But you know you mean well by them, but it ain't no real kindness after all. Now a child slave you see what had been treated roughly, and had been hacked and scourged and tumbled round the plantation or the army, and sold to any certain master or military officer, and the Lord knows who it ain't no kindness to be giving him good treatment and so on and bring him or up her up too well for the rough and tumble will come all the harder on him later on. Now I venture to say your child slaves whom you use for exchange purposes would be quite crest fallen and would go mad in a place where they would recieve different treatment where they in the hands of a master much unlike yourself, save say like St Clare. Every slave you know thinks well of his or her own way, and I think I and you treat child slaves just as it is their desire to be treated. But I do not exchange them to the Christian dogs for prisoners they might have. It is not a business proposition of my own part."

" It isa happy thing to be satisfied nevertheless" said Myletze with a shrug of his shoulders and some perceptible feelings of a disagreeable nature.

" Well" said General Federal after they had both silently eaten two oranges" What do you say.?"

" I'll think the matter over and talk with my generals" said general Myletze".

" Meantime general if you want the matter carried on in the quiet way you speak of so the Vivian Girl spies do not have the chance to trail her here, you better not let your business in this neighborhood be known..It will get out among my men and in my army ther there are lots of generals war correspondents who will broadcast it, and it will not be a particularly quiet business getting any ne away from the sight of those Vivian Girls if they know where the one they are looking for is I'll promish you."

" Oh certainly I.ll keep mum about it under any conditions. But I'll tell you I am in a terrible hurry and shall want to know as soon as possible what I may depend on as I must get backwest within another two days." said he, rising and putting on his hat and uniform overcoat which was of a buff blue color.

" Well call up this evening between six and seven before the army starts the night march and you shall have my answer.I'll try and take up a collection if possible" said general Myletze, and after saluting general Federal bowed himself out of the tent.

" I'd like to have been able to get the kid for only a thousand dollars " Said Myletze to himself as he saw the tent door close" but he certainly must have a value on the child to want ten thousand, just as if he had some advantage over me. If any body would have ever said to me that I should seel my child slaves to any one of those rascally slave traders and owners, especially like that St Clare he mentioned I should have shot him like a dog. Hell I'll get that kid Jannie if I have to forage for the money to buy her with, and exchange her for a general who is a prisoner in the National army. And I'll keep the boy too. I know that I shall have some fuss with my staff about this, and for that matter about the kid Jannie too. So much for wanting to buy a particular slave to get back my general. The confounded whiskered moon faced devil sees his advantage and means to push t it. Ied like to have kicked him from here to the end of the river but it'll take too much work and time. And " Christian Dogs" " If the Christians are dogs then he is a bulldog of the infernal regions. Ugh such a face. I'm surprise his boks did not kill the sen son sun moon and stars and fighten all the angels at of heaven."

To tell more on this subject the mildest form of the so called child slavery is to be seen in the st the Glandelinian armies, under any commander, whether west east, or south, but the best of all is seen in the armies under Myletze or Beppo Evans. But in Myletzes army however there is never those needs of requiring those awful seasons of hurry and pressure that are called for in the military business of other big Glandelinian armies, and therefore according to those those in Myletzes army the task of the child slaves are more healthful and more reasonable ones, while the military officers content with a more gradual style of work and service had not those ways of hard heartedness and severe ferocity to thevlittle slave which always overcome such frail human beings when the prospects of sudden and rapid work and gain in the building of works and fortifications and the like is wei weighed in the balance, with no heavier counter poise than the interests of the helpless and unprotected.. And in particular concerning the cases of the armies nder Myletze or Beppo evans the slave hardly has an to do any toil at all, but is just considered belonging to the army for the purpose of reguining prisoners held in the christians ranks for their exchange. Therefore who ever visits any portion of Myletzes army and witnesses the good humored indulgence of some officers and priv private might be tempted to dream of the ill fated or the offfabled poetic legend of a patriarchal inal institution, and all that, and that the saleve of slaves of Myletzes army are not real slaves at all but just children held for easy ransoms and that is given to the Christian military for the return of Glandelinian soldiers taken prisoner in battle, something which general Manley says is against the law of war. But sometimes above and over the scene there always broods a most portentous shadow--the shadow of higher and stricter Military law. Sometimes if Myletze is in the mood nothing will make him give a slave for even a hundred prisoner prisoners, and there are times too if he is in the mood to do so the slaves will certain certainly toil if Myletze believes he sees the necessity for it. And so long as the wicked Glandelinia law considers all these unfro unfortunate small human be i gs beings stolen from parents and homes of all other nations, including Abbiennia too children with the character and needs of children, as so many things, belonging to either a master or the military, so long as the failure or misfortune or imprudence or death of the owner; none of which have ever been kind except in the military, will cause them any day to exchange a life of kind protection and indulgence for one of one of hopeless misery and toil, worse than even the lives of the negro slaves of olden times(may the slavery of the worst treated negro was a heaven compared to the lives of child slaves) so long it is impossible to make anything beautiful or desirable in the best regulared administration of slavery.

General Myletze was despite being a Glandelinian general of high rank a fair avaerage of a man, good natured and kindly, and disposed to easy indulgence of all the slaves around them, and would never let go a slave or sell a slave to any other army or private unless he was fairly sure of his character and there had never been a lack of anything which might contribute to the physical comfort of the child slaves in his army, and such slaves when the army was on the march as it is so now, at this campaign were to ride in the wagons left empty, and soldiers also saw that this was done. He had however sent slaves to the christian armies quite in large numbers for exchange of prisoners especially when he had no soldiers of the Nationals within his own ranks, indeed had involved himself very deeply, and his note of this always signed by other christian officers had some how probably through spies got into the hands of Manley, and this small piece of information is the key to the proceeding effects that though fighting on the same side brought enmity between Myletze and Manley.

Now it so happened that when brought before Myletze at the beginning Jannie herself and the boy too had heard enough of the conversation to know that general Federal had be been making offers to sell her to general Myletze, but when Federal left h she was obliged again to accompany him. She would gladly have ran away had she the chances to do n so, but of course knowing Myletzes character as he did not look the man he really was. Still she heard general Federal whom she dreade dreaded like a mouse feare a cat make an offer to exchange her for the boy, and could she be mistaken. Her heart swelled and trobbed, and she acted so strange that the Glandelinian soldiers who ob served her looked at her in astonishment.

" What ails you to day Jannie" said general Federal, when while waiting upon him in the tent she had a cidentally upset the wash pitcher upon his feet, knock ed a bottle of ink over a paper which he was writing something on, upset a workstand and finally was abstractedly offering the general a long uniform overcoat in place of the hat he had ordered her to bring to him.

Jannie started. She said nothing but bursted into tears, set fo down on a chair and began sobbing.

" Get up this instant you brat. what the duce ails you!" demanded the general. "are you going crazy or rebellious. Stand up answer me" he snarled.

" Oh sir, sir, I don't want to be sold to the general you spoke to to day. I'm afraid of him. His face showes his ways are mean."

" Well what has that got to do about it. and suppose he is, that is your own outlook n and m not mine. what he is after you are sold does not worry me any."

" No, no I won't go to him Iell ran away" she screamed.

" Well you silly brat why don't you. And suppose you are caught what then! You know wh what the penalty is do you not."!

" I don't care I don't want to be sold to him, or exchanged for that boy. I was alright in Manleys army."

And the por child ignorant of the real fact of Myletze threw herself into a chair and sobbed convulsively.

Why should I not sell or exchange you when the Vivian Girl spies are combing the country for you to take you to the dirty christian dogs where you do not belong. And besides Myletze will do the same you foolish goose. You should know from what is broadcast everywhere that general Myletze never deals with traders and owners, and once buys a slave never means tosell to sell any of them as long as they behave well but exchanges them for prisoners and that way you'll get free in a more proper way. Why of all child slaves I have ever brought from any camp or to any camp you are the silliest of all gesse I ever met. And sho do you think he would sell you to if he could not have the chance to exchange you for a prisoner! you ' no one at all. Do you think all the other generals are set on you as he is you most foolish of the goosies. Come chh cheer up and give me my hat and not the coat, and don't go crying like likea silly goose any more."

" Well but he has such a naughty looking face that he is likely to--to--"

" nonsense you brat, to be sure he has such a face but his looks don't count. what do y you talk so for. But really you boob you are getting altogether too proud of yourself and afraid of every general you see because you don't like his face. You shun me like a like a sparrow because of my face, yo yet you know full well I have done ye no harm except just see to it you toil, recieve three good meals a day, plenty of sleep, no early rise in the morning, and plenty of rest on Sundays and Celebration days. But yet you cannot look at a man before you are afraid he is going to treat you mean. If you were in possession of augist Augustinia St clare you would find ut a out a lot. I have never in my life saw a man who is more handsome in form and face but if you ever belonged to him you would not last long I,ll tell you that. So be content general Myletze is goingto be your future master and not the brute St Clare."

Reassured by the confident tone of general Federal, Jannie proceeded nibly nimbly and adriotly with her work. This glandelinian general was a man of a very high class, fierce and brave, and also very intellectually brave and great in too many ways to state hereTo that natural magnanimity and generiousity of military views which one often marks as characteristic of the best generals leading the Glandelinian generals he always added high moral and military sensibility and principle carried out with freat great energy and ability into all great practical results and was as much feared by christian generals was was Myletze or Beppo evans.

But he made no profession to any particular reg, religion, and during times when he was on a short furlough conducted a unusual kind of child slave trade as was in his power. Yet as wicked as he was, one though so greata foe of the Vivian Girls it was certain that he gave the slaves in his possession unlimited scope in all their efforts, allowed them the proper amount of toil, to their own comfort, gave them instruction when necessary which hardly few generals would do, and did all he could to improve the condition of his slaves. In fact though a bitter enemy of the Nationals he really seemed somhow or other to fancy that the slaves had piety and benevolence enough to be a saint, to undulge an expectation of getting into heaven through their superabundance of suffering toil, and miseries to which he made no particular effort to stop or interfere with. And in fact if not exc exactly a believer he sometimes for the fun of it took a decided part in the meetings the slaves held himself and sometimes made a pretension of being a leader of their religious meeting.

The heaviest bad on his mind lay in the forseen necessity of selling Jannie to Myletze because the Vivian Girls had spies for ever after her, and in doing this he had met the opposition and prom protests from which he expected to encounter from Manley but Federal had said to general Manley in strong words;

" The slave belongs to me. your army and men are not fit to have a slave of her kind and I'm selling her to Myletze as soon as I find his army. If you don't like it then just to spite you,I'll in person punch you in the nose whether you wear a uniform or not for well everyone knows eb even your own officers that you need it."

General Manley being entirely ingonrant ignorant of Myletzes character, and knowing only the general storm of D Federals temper when it is once up had been quite sincere in his efforts not to butt into Federals business, and therefore what Federal did concerning slaves which was his own property he dismissed from his mind witnout a second thought.

Before he was brought to general Isner Myletze JanN Jannie had been first stolen from her parents and sold to general Federal when she was four years old. She therefore had been brought up by her medious master untill she was five and six, going on seven and had recieved treatment from this Glandelinian general who by his looks, and ferocit ferocity to the Vivian Girls and the like had been a surprise indeed. Of course he never petted her, never treated her like his own child, nor was she looked upon by him as if she was an indulged favorite. But as brutality or otherwise that was not forthcomi forthcoming. While with Federal all the toil she ever did was to wait on him, by bringing to him his coat, hat, boots or shoes or which ever it may be and the rest of the time was allowed to go about his camp as she pleases knowing that she could not run away. He never allowed her to be abused nor petted, and many officers within his army have remarked that peculiar air of strange refinement, that softness of voice and manner which in so many cases is a peculiar gift indeed to a child slave of this sort.

and these natural but unusual graces of a child slave were often united with a strange almost celestial beauty of the most dazzling and one in almost every case with a strang strange personal appearance prepossessing n and ugg aggreeable. Therefore Little Jannie Francis :illian hillian as we may have described her would make an unusually fancy sket ch for a child slave. But somehow terrible as he looked she was safe so far under the protecting care of her master and therefore she had reached her early age without those temptations which makes beauty so fatal an inhert inheritatnace to any child slave

She was now to be sold by Federal to general Isner Myletze who was one of the best of all Glandelinian generals known, bright and tarlented, and though not having the character of other Glandelinian generals was nevertheless much dreaded by the National armies for his great military tarlent. This great glandelinian general had been ordered just recently to leave from his fortifications at Delight's junction with his ernormous army to start a campaign against Angelinia Agathia because the aurthorities saw that his adroitness and ingnuity caused him to be considered the first hand general in the whole service and that if he succeeded in cutting the rail road lines of the Mic-Hollester and Pandora roads and capturing Angelinia Agathia, all national communications with the besieging armies at Vivian Wicks6 would be cut off and then Abbieannia's Situation would b the same as a man whose throat had been fatally cut .So far he had a human machine for an army, which considering the education and circumstances of the general displayed as much military genu genius as generals Lee, grant, napoleon and other great generals put together into one.

He was a very handsome man in some respect havingpleasing manners and of many Glandelinian generals was only a few of those who wore no beard, but he had what is o known as side burns and a little 'goatee" under his chin. He wasa general a favorite of the nation and armies and only he and Manley did not get on good terms and for one good real reason, is because Isner Myletze always bitterly and hotly critized him for his massacres he committed or allowed his armies to commit in the west once saying;

" Your wicked murderous conduct will e the ruin of the nation altogether both north and south. If you want us to lose the war entirely keep on massacring children, and se what'll happen in the near future."

Nevertheless this young man and general in the eye of the nationals was not considered a christian as he was generally nicknamed, but a " rebel" as well as the others, and that he did not have the vulgar narrow minded nature of other glandelinian generals was a surprise to them a indeed, and therefore because he had these superior qualifications, and bettervnatures than the butchering tyrannical Generals, he was considered to have far more luck than they and therefore because of this was considered as a Glandelinian general as who could never b be whipped, and so was more dreaded by the Nationals, than the insurgents dreaded Concentinian Aronburg. Therefore general V Federal hounded by the Vivian Girls and their Conde Confederates was fearful of what might happen to Jannie, and the therefore having heard of the fame of general Myletze and also how he deals with child slaves gained from the government a two weeks furlough and took a long perilous trip over to where he found Myletzes big army was encamped before the finaly advance to see what this intelligent general had been about, what he really did, and if pesible to sell Jannie to him for a good sum.

He was recieved with good enthusiasm by the chief of all generals who con gratulated him on possession so valuable a slave but as he did not have the proper ammount of money he tried to buy her as low as $1,000.

General Myletzes had waited upon general Federal, shone shown the slaves that Myletze keeps in his army, and the general talked so influently held himself so erect looked so handsome and really that any one who saw him would thought have thought that he was some handsome elegy of a Moving Picture comical dude of the Charlie Chaplin style of face and that he never was to be a general which he really turned out to be. Having heard of him even general Concentinian Aronburg had begun to fell an uneasy conscious consciousness of his inferiro inferiority. Myletze had already begun his campaign so far and hat halted about thirty miles from the Aronburgs un to encamp for the night and many officials of the nationals had planned desperately to put a stop to it, and only had succeeded in breaking themselves to pieces. Myletze in the late afternoon held the council about buying the slave at Federals propositon. The Conversation went as follows.

" But Your Excellency" remonstrated general James pargin" Is not that too huge a sum to pay for a slave when You'll sure exchange her for a prisoner!"

" But what if it is, we would not the slave be mine to do wiwhat , please with. I do not see anything in mney anyhow."

" No generals would be willing sir in out cause to increase the rate of compensation and you then can keep the slave as your own."

" no object at all general Bargin. I don't need to pay any 10,000 dollars for a slave at least I want to. And I don't need to exchange any of my child slaves for prisoners unless I have not enough men prisoners in my ranks, or unless I've a mind to."

" But sir, general Federal seems perfectly adapted to this business and won't give up the slave for a measely one thousand dollars if she is as valuable to him."

" Dare say he may be, never was much adapted to anything else I'll be bound. The only reason he wishes to see sell me the kid is because those so called Vivian Girl princesses want her themselves. What I'm thinking is that I'd rather they had her in their possession long ago.

" But only think how much work you could get out of her if she is valuable." interposed general Black Brooks.

" Oh yes make a machine of the kid for saving work for the sild soldiers is it.

I don't keep slaves for working purposes but for pets or for exchanging for prisoners. Federal as I can see by the appearance of the child treated her differentely differently than his horrid looks show. The machine he'll make of a slave is a spoiled spoiled pet altogether even if he does not be too good to her or favor her in the least. H The work he made her do is n t nothing. He is a labor saver among his armies and slaves he keeps within his ranks do only this kind of hard work--ride around in wagons all day doing a march, peeling apples, potatoes or sitting down idle or sleeping and the like, the same as is in my army. No since he insists and since she is a little sprite of a black haired little fairy Iell I'll buy her if I have to raid to gain the price. I'll draft the 10,000 and keep her for my pet. And if the Vivian Girls come to my lines looking for her, why Hell I'll first capture them, and then run them out of the camp with her in their possession. If they like her so well they derserve her. I do not believe in child slavery anyhow. Of all kinds of slave slavery it is a great dooming curse that surprises me God does not destroy us all for."

General Dargin looked like me transfixed at seeing this, or hearing this but this out he knew that Mylestzes way was irrestible. Mylestz had folded him arms tightly pressed his lips. He breathed short, and his large eyes flashed like live coals and when all the generals had finally reached their degree general gennunia touched him on the arm and said in a low tone;

" Get the slave at any price if you can. Manleys army is no place for her any way. We'll all try and help you secure the money by a collection among the troops."

General Dargin heard the whisper and understood it, though he could not under stand what was said, while Mylestz inwardly strengthened himself in his determination to get the slave if he had to take her from general Federal by force. The council which only halsted half an hour passed, and Mylestz went back to his headquarters. He had been able to repess every disrespectful word about Manley but the flashing eye, the gloomy and trouble brow were part of a natural language that could not be repressed in so great a general, which showed too plainly that the general was a man that usually get's what he wants no matter how he gets it as long as it is honestly.

It was during the beginning of general Mylestzes advance that the generals Wife and two children risks the perils of a hostile country to come and see him and his army. For a year before the battle of Delight's junction Mrs Mylestz had seen her husband frequently and there was nothing to interrupt their happiness, and once her beautiful hair was adorned with blossoms of roses. Then now as Mylestz would have to mak make a long and probable dangerous campaign she had been forcecto stay at home and on her return from Angelinia she had been mistaken by the plandelinians of some other command for a national and therefore they had reliuecher possessions and gone off with her two children to wh whom she was passionately attatched andwhom she mourned with so grief so intense as to go absolutely insane and then die. The loss also enraged Mylestz who blamed it upon Manley and therefor therefore he was wad done was done for child slavery altogether, and though he would still serve in his cause, and keep slaves he would turn them in exchange to the Nationals as often as possible.

After Federal had bought Jannie however she grew up under his care like a kitten does in a home of a favorable mistress and becam tranquillized and settled, and every bleeding tie and trubbing nerve brought on m by her capture and the loss of her parents seemed to become sound and healthful, and therefore whether she was a slave or what, from the treatment she recieved she was a happy child, but now a little unerved at being sold to a new master, whose appearance she at first did not like.

There had se secretly followed Federal an agent from Manleys army who as soon as Federal was gone visis visited Mylestz, stating what command he came from and tried every possible inducement to lead him to refuse to buy Jannie, and to restore her to her former owner which had been a private pla plantation owner.

" You need not to trouble yourself to talk any longer on such matters" said Mylestz doggedly" I know my own business sir."

" I did not presume to interfere with it sir. I only thought that you might think it for your interest to give the slave up to me on the terms proposed so that Manley can possess her."

" Oh I understand the matter well enough. Is the slave a cur that I have to b be so foolish as to sell her to that fiend. Well he won't come over me that way I,ll tell you. I'm a general sir of this part, even supposed to be higher than me is, and I'm free to do wh with the slaves as I see fit when they are mine. The little girl is mine already sir, MINE and I'll do what I please with her--that's settled."

" But if you exchange that little brat for a chr to the christians for a prisoner why Manley"--- " Orderly show this man out of the tent please."

andone fell Jannie's last hope to remain with her former master, and she feared nothing more than a life of toil and drudgery, rendered more bitter by every little smarting vexation and indignity which plandelinian tyrannical ingenuity could devise. In fact she did not yet know general Izner Mylestz. an

General Federal had gone out to see some one for a few hours and Jannie stood inthe tent rear r dejectedly looking after his retreating figure, when a hand was laid on her shoulder. She turned round quite startled but then as she observed who it was a bright smile lighted up her fine eyes..it was general Beppo Evans and she knew him since she was three years old. He said nothinghowever excepting asking if her where general Mylestzes tent was and she having directed him he went out and was seen to enter it. Mylestz also arose and saluted as Evans unte rumered entered.

" Why general Evans .I did not expect you so early. How you startled me. But never theless I am so glad you came at my summons. General Federal intents to see sell a slav slave to me and I decided to ask you your opinion of it."

Saying this he drew at a chair for him.

" How glad I am since you came so soon--but why do you not smile. And look at this little child slave how he has grown."

The little boy slave stood shyly regarding the other greatvgeneral through his long bobbed hair but standing closer than ever to general Evans. " Isn't he too beautiful to be a slave" continued Mylestz lifting hisclong bobbed hair and kissing him."

" It is better for all of these slave slaves if they had never been born" said General Evans. " I myself wish I had been born somewhere else than in plandelinia, then I'd have been better off."

" gurprised general Mylestz sa r an, while the lad himself burst into tears.

" There now sonny it is to bad I have made you feel so, poor kid" Said Evans fondly " it is too bad that the war has not a better cause. Oh how I wish we could even now fre ll the slaves whether the Nationals win the war or not. Oh I really wh wish I had never seen a slave----then I might have been more happier".

" why general Evans how can you dare talk so when you know it is too dangerous. You know this dreadful thing has happened, o and other dreadful things is going to happen before very ling long. I'm sure our cause is a righteous one whether the nation keeps slave or not. But I'd be willing to fres them if I could."

" So the cause may be righteous but only the way we two fight it" said said general Evans. " Then drawing the timid child slave on his knee he gazed intently on his glorious dark eyes, and passed his hand through his long hair.

" just like my little son, and yet he is the handsomest little boy I ever saw and the best so I ever wish to see, but oh I wish this child slavery was at an end. My God it'll bring ruin on our nation whether the war i c is won by our side or not."

" But general Evans how can you talk that way."

" Yes I can. I've seen a lot of it general, and its all misery, misery, misery, and death and butchery everywhere. The lives of hundreds of thousands of little little slave children is as bitter as wormwood, the very life is burning out of them. They are poor little miserable little drudges, and such horror will drag the nation down to perdition sure as there is a heaven. What's the use of our fighting for our own intention when the Nati nals will win in the long run anyway. Why the cause of the nation is so wicked that even God himself will cause the Nationals to be victorious. What's the use of our trying to do anything, trying to know anything, trying to be anything to make ourselves militar, heroes for a cause that is fighting to keep little kids like these in misery. That's the use of fighting. I wish we were Christians ourselves""

" But mee goodness general Evans that would really be treason. I know how you feel about the horrors of the child slave trade, how many of them will and do have a hard master but pray be patient, and perhaps we'll both get our hands on lots of the from plantations on our march and name them over to the Nationals for an exchange for prisoners.

" Patient" said he. " who could be patient when all this goes on and brings so much dreadful trouble upon our nation. Di we ever see a place outside of our own camps wer the nationals were ever kind of little slaves, and where they did not work them to death, I pray them of even a moments play, give them rotten food not fit for dogs, thrash and beat them to death, and then have others say, we are fighting for worthy cause."

" I know it is ter dfal" said Mylstz" but after all that is up to God to settle not ours" and who made them master of little human beings. That is what I am thinking of every day---what right have they to those slaves when the children belong to the parents from whom they were stolen from. They are human beings as well as any one else, the kids are ever better than they are, and therefore what right have they to make a drag horses out of the children.

" see that here" said Mylestz but a little more about the business than many people do but Manley, is fully responsible for it the way it spread anyway, despite the war. He is jealous of me because I am a better general than he is, because I can write a better hand, and I have earned it all myself, and no thanks to him I've learned it in spite of him and yet what right has he to tell me what I shall do with my prisoners of war. I send them over to the christian lines for exchange of prisoners. He tried to cause me to lose my command, no sir, He'll bring me down and humble me and because he finds he cannot succeed I me and he now put to spite me put his own drug child al ves to just the hardest, meanest and dirtiest work on plantation. I don't really believe the Vivian Girls are after Jannie at all. I believe Federal wants to sell the kid to me to prevent her getting into Manley,s hands, and I don't blame him.

" why general Mylstz you do not frighten me. why I never heard you talk so of Manley. I'm afraid you'll do something dreadful to him yet. I don't wonder at your

f. limpet till but one--be careful. Act for your best for Manley, is really a danger our enemy if he is aroused."

"Yes I have been careful. And I've have been pitied but its growing worse and worse the way he tries to interfere with me in cash and troops. I can't bear it any longer, every chance chance he gets he insults me and tries to annoy me with by refusing to send me troops. And I have to fritter all these myself or draft them. I thought I would receive a lot of aid in my campaign toward Angolinia against, that I could do my work well, but the Manleys one do not support me and I have to make my advance alone, and either depend on the government for aid or di draft troops by the wayside during the advance and the more he sees I can do the more he thinks he should load on. But Manley does not know that I've got the devil in me and once of these days it will come out in a way he won't like or I'm mistaken. He is the leader of all the child butchers and all the worse massacres the Glandelinian armies ever committed, or the great floods which occured at are at his command and he tries to blame it on me."

"But what should we do generally" asked Beppo Evans mournfully.

It was only yesterday" said Myletze that I found one brutal child slave master within my own lines. One of the slaves a girl was busy loading one of the provision wagons when the young upstart of one of my officers stood there leshing his whip no near the two horses that the creatures was frightened and almost caused them to run away. I observed the little girl ask him to stop in as pleasant a voice as she could--but he just just kept right on. Then the little girl begged him again and then he turned on her and began striking the little girl a mad manner indeed for a boyscout. I saw the little girl hold his hand, and then he screamed, and struck her in her face with his fist till she was compelled to let go, and then ran to his father, and told him that the little girl was fighting him. I saw him come in a rage, and say he would teach the little girl who was his master, and was about to tie the little girl to a tree to have her "horsewhipped" when I interferred, gave the colcts colonel and his son a good lecturing and took the slave away from him. If I don't make these child slave mut masters smart for it some time I don't know what'll I do" and knebrow of this this righteous Glandelinian general grew dark and his eyes burned with an expression that would have made any one tremble. "who made this man a slaves master? That's what I'd like to know he added.

"Well" said general Beppo, mournfully I always thought that we were fighting for a righteous cause, and yet though we ain't christians as do not like to like to see children made slaves.

"There's some sense in it in your cane, but our own way of holding slaves is different and not quite so wrong. We have brought them up as if they were our own born children, fed them, clothed them, indulged them, and teach them so they'll have a good education, and then send them over to the Nationals for prisoners which they have providing when we have not enough soldier prisoners on our own side. I have bought schildren who have been kicked, cuffed, and sworn at, and therefore what do I owe for fighting yet for such a cause? I've paid for all my keeping a hundred times over. But yet I won't desert my cause for anything. If we lose the war to the the Nationals it'll be the fault of the Manleys, and besides I won't bear no inter ferrence on their part. If they try and cross my path I'll fight them too as I would the Nationals" Mylatze said clinching his hand with a fierce frown.

General Beppo Evans looked at Mylatze, but was silent. He had never seen general Mylatze in this mood before but he sympathized with him just the same.

"You know poor little Francis Carlos that you sold to me" added Mylatze "she
"She was a pretty little slave and had been all but the comfort all the comfort that I had in my lonely days. I allowed her to sleep in my tents with me at nights, allowed her to follow me around during the day time, and always looked at me as if she understood how I felt. It was I felt about the situation. well the other day I just loaned her to an officer who I thought I could trust and what do you think he done behind my back. He tied a stone around the little girls neck and threw her in the river."

Oh general Mylatze how could he do it.

Well he did. I and a large number of soldiers almost risked our lives in our effort to save her and I stepped into a bog and it took twelve soldiers to draw me out. Poor little child she looked at me so mournful, as if she wondered why I
I would risk so much in saving her. I had to risk everything to get her out but I did.
I disgracefully discharged him from the army stripped him off his uniform in the barracks burgain and gave him a severe flogging. These child slave drivers will soon find out that I'm one that won't permit brutality, to the slaves. That little girl was exchanged for an officer yesterday yesterday and is now free. The day will come yet that this country will go to ruin if these child slave masters do not look out. I don't blame the Nationals for refusing, matter of fact the same as child slave for ransoms I would not do it myself. I'al fight this child slave horror the same as I fight the Nationals."

"But what are you going to do. Why even Heaven says the very Glandelinia nation is doing this wicked thing. And yet we fight to preserve it. Therefore we are almost as wicked as they even if we do trust in God a little more and try to do right, and I like to deliver the slaves over to the nationals but just the same that does not exempt us from the penalty."

...a terrible looking face. A very horrible ghastly face, ...glaming eyes and [illegible] and it was staring at him from ...one of the high pillows.

We are not Christians like the Nationals evans, yet my heart is full of bitterness even against them also for it was their fault in much as our own governments for allowing such [illegible] to spread. I cannot even trust in God on that matter, it is ridiculous. If our nation is fighting for a cause that is so wicked, why does He let such things be so."

Oh but general we should at least have a little faith whether we are christian ore not. Even general Baldonia pizarelli said once that when allthings go wrong to us, so must believe that God is doing the ver, best, and that if our cause is really righteous he'll make it win in the long run, and cause the Nationals to be able to free the slaves just the same."

That's easy, for people to say, it who allow their slaves to sit on sofas, or in carriages, and the like and do no more work but which is allowed to their feet, but let their slaves be there the others I have seen, I guess it would come some harder and they too would stop it by force. I wish I could be good, but my heart burns both against Manley, and the Christians and I cannot be reconciled, anyhow. You couldn't in my place-- you can't now yourself as you saw lots too, and you have not heard all I've got to say. You so don't know the whole yet?"

"What can be coming on now?"

Well general Bargin interviewed me yesterday and told me that general Manley says that he was a fool to allow so many child slaves to be sent to your army, that he hates any one who exchanges child slaves for pro prisoners when he could use christian prisoners just as well, that he says Mylatze and all his generals are too proud and are "Christian Dogs" in disguise and that you and I hold our heads up above him, and that I've got proud notions from him or you, and he says he won't send child slaves to our armies any more, and that he'll stop private owners from selling them to you as well. Bargin said that at first he only scolded and grumbles these things, but now he is preparing to carry them out."

Why but that don't worry me any at all, I'll get the slaves if I have to raid to very plantations to do so" said Mylatze simply. I can even induce them to run away and come to me.

Don't you know what happens to a slave that runs away. There is no law in this Glandelinian war that can prevent the penalty meted out to a runaway slave, and so, no one can save the slave if the soldiers choose to shoot them. That's why I wish I had never seen the child slavery----why I ever wish they had never been born, it would have been better for them and the nation together, if would have been better for every poor child slave if they had never been born. The Holy bible talks about the horrors of the region called Hell. Why, ha, that's a Garden a Eden compared to the lives these slaves live. If you do not buy Jennie all this may happen to her yet, for she had it hard enough before Federal took her. He did not buy her either, but took her from the brutal master."

But why buy her at so big a price. and anyhow general Federal is so kind."

Yes but who knows, he may die in some terrible battle---and then she may be sold to an only knows or maybe Manley will get his hands on her, and then what will her life be worth. What pleasure is it that she is handsome, and smart and bright.. I tell you general that a sword will pierce through her soul for every good and pleasant thing the child has or is, and she will be worth too much elsewhere for any one to keep."

These words smote heavily on general Mylatze, the vision of all sad trader-ness life to his [illegible] and as if some one had struck him a deadly blow he turned pale and gasped for breath. He looked nervously outside of the tent where the little boy slave tired of the conversation had retired, and there he was riding triumphantly up and down on general Mylatzes sword scabbard. Then to himself he thought;

I'm going to buy her.

So now Your excellency" said general Evans almost mournfully Good bye for I'm going."

Going your excellency going where."

To start my army on the advance" said he straightening himself up and when we are through with Angolinia which we are ordered to capture, I hope to buy more slaves very fore to get there and all the hope for them may come true. There are many who have kind masters who won't refuse to sell them. I'll buy as many as I can--God helping me I will, and exchange them for prisoners."

But suppose Angolinia shall never be taken. suppose we fail.

We won't fail. A nation will be free from nationals rule or we'll die first."

Well general for my sake be careful. Don't do anything wicked in your part of your campaign but what is your plan."

Well general I here is my plan. The government had sent me orders to support you in your campaign and took it into its head to send me right here with my army. It would please it me if they thought it would aggravate the Manleys. I'm going to do what I can to help you in the campaign and fight a great part of the war itself no matter what it can be said. I'm going to move forward quite resigned, you understand as if how it may turn out. I'm going to move forward quite resigned, you understand as if all was at your own will. I've got some preparations made, and there are those that will help me and in the course of a week or so I shall be one of the heroes of Glande will help me and in the course of a week or so I shall be one of the heroes of Glande linia, to a marday. Pray for me your excellency, perhaps the Good lord will hear you and lling you success."

Oh pray yourself your excellency, and go trusting in him and then you won't do anything at of the way.

Well good bye your excellency said general Evans holding him by the hand. They stood silent, then there were last words, and nods and bitter weeping such parting as those may make whose hpe to meet again is as the spiders web- and the two great humane Glandelinian generals were parted.

To The Glandelinian army after the first three days of its march since the beginning of the campaign had encamped right on the banks of the same stream, the camps stretching as far as eye could see in tents of many, & ornamonous sizes, but there was one which was of a more deeper gray color and at which was closely adjoining the one which was occupied by general Isner Mylette. This was a large one almost resembling a circus tent of circular form and this was designated as the quarter for the child slaves and indeed the child slaves had been learned or instructed to put their own tent up itself though they recieved aid also from soldiers in work which was beyond the strength of the eldest child to do. The snow was still deep on the ground, and the tent entrance was guarded by soldiers to prevent any suspicious persons doing anything to the slaves.

In front of it stood a peculiar but beautiful flag and the flag was designed with a large scarlet bignonia and a native m dififlora rose and also designed on me it were various brilliant annuals such as marigolds, rock roses, petunias, four oclocks and D.lsies and under these were written the words;

" BANNER OF CHILD SLAVES. ARMY OF IZNER MYLETTE".

Yet this flag was a delight and a pr de to the child slaves.

Let us enter the big tent. The best of these slaves especially the girls had cooked for they had to learn this too, the evening meal for the generals, which now was over and the head slave girl Mammie Caldwell by name who pr s presided over its preparation as chief cook of all h had helped inferior officers of her crew on the work of clearing away and washing the many dishes, and then to come out to start cooking meals for the slaves therefore doubt not that it i s her that thereader may see by the big tent cook stove presiding with anxious earnest over the cooking u tensils and anon with grave consideration lifting the cover of a bake kettle from whence steames forth indubitable intimations of " something very good". (only child slaves in Mylettes army were allowed to eat even better food than the soldiers did) A round beautiful young face is her's and so white as to suggest the idea that she might have been created for some strange fairy. Her whole countenance beamed with evident satisfaction and contentment under her well starched checked turban bearing on it however if we must confess it a little of that strange self respe respect and consciousness which usually would become the first cook of the cook house as this little girl slave was acknowledged to be not only by her fellow slaves but by many of the Glandelinian officers as well. And young as she really was she certainly was a cook, and as good a one as any grown woman or man could ha have been. She could make corn cake and corn bread of all varities, and dodgers and divers muffins and other good species too numerous to mention and which was a sublime my story to all the Glandelinian officers and even privates and Ello slaves themselves, and when questioned she would shake her sides with honest pride and merriment as she would tell about the fruitless efforts of others who strove in vain to attain her elevation.

The feeding of many high officers in the " generals's mesnall" the arranging of their dinners and suppers In style awe awoke all the energies of her soul, and therefore she never beerved any sight more welcome to her than a grand array of well dressed Glandelinian generals and other officers for then she observed fresh efforts and fresh triumphs from triumphs.. Just at present however this girl slave is seen to be taking a box into the baking pan in which said operation letthereader and I leave her to till I finish our description of the child slave tent...

All around its sides stood a large number of small cots but covered neatly with a snow, spread, and by the side of each of one these beds was a small carpet. Each of these bedsaere treated with consideration and made so far sacred from the marauding inroads and dissecrations of Glandelinian boy and girl scouts. In fact the tent was both a cook house and a sleeping quarters but in the middle stood a larger cup carpet on which the chief little cook took her stand,, as being accidedly in or upper walks of lif life. In one part of the tent was a bed of far humbler intentions or pretensions and evidently designed for other uses than for sleeping or lying on. The tent wall all around was designed with some very brilliant prints of battles, and a portrait of general Isner Nelat Mylette drawn and colored in a manner, a ich had often astonished that great Glandelinian hero, for he once said he had never saw its like for the work of young child slaves.

In the center of the big tent was a long row of rough benches, and sitting on some of these were about a dozen of boy and girl slaves of all ages but very young with brown and gray eyes, but somewhat fat cheeks and pleasant looks and adorned with clothing of the same style and color. and and these were busy in superintending the work work of mending Glandelinian uniforms shining officers boots and spurs which as usually is the case is the work of these slaves and nothing else. They looked quite pretty with their same attire of long dusted hair, and the way they acted, smiled laughed and so on it did not appear they were slaves at all. There was one table that appeared to have half broken legs and which was drawn out in the centre of the tent near the big cook stove, and covered with a sort of crazy quilt like cloth simpling caps and nice aaaders for a decidedly good sized up pattern to prove they are used by child slaves only with other symptoms of an approach meal for the slaves themselves. At this table was seated the new c ook Jannie Francis Lillian, the new slave which was to be sold to general Mylette and as she is to be one of the girl heroines of this bne, story we ast the rfore therefore des cribe her to the readers. She was a beautiful black haired little girl of about four summers(if there are any, are any such things as a summer for slaves) with hair of a ful, full floss glossy black and whose face was truly tri truly of foriegn features to tell she was Swiss German and whose face also was characterized by an expression of grave and steady good sense, united with much kindness, forbearance and unusual benevolence, but of a high spirited nature also. and there was something about her w ole whole ir self respecting and dignified, f confiant of her enemy and not good masters yet united with a confiding and humble simplicity and a favor in secret o for the cause of the Nationalis, and in secret a sort of spy for them also.

She was very busily at this moment on a writing book or composition which was lying before her and which she was carefully and slowly making an effort to accomplis accomplish a copy of wording and letters in which operation she was overlooked by the very same little boy slave whom general Mylette was request re quested to exchange re quested to exchange for her. He was a bright smart boy of two years of age older than Jannie and who was instructing the girl in her effort at writing.

" No" that not that way, little girl, you are doing it wrong" said he briskly as Jannie mis s mispelled a long word. You spelled Harsen for march you spelled Harsh for march."

" ow do you know I did" said Jannie looking a little dignified as her young boy teacher Miss Mainly, scrawled a whole sentence of words in a proper form, and then taking the pen in her hand she patiently, recommenced.

How many child slaves learn to do things even if you do not have the chance chances to go to such sch said one of the officers who was watching the proceeding and regarding the boy with pride and surprise. " Tom Wa, you can write, and read too and then come in here and learn the slaves the same thing. I It is a good thing this is Mylettes army an not Manley s. It certainly is mighty interesting.

But I'm getting might) hungry" said the lad looking over toward the cook." Isn't the food cooked yet."

" Just done, most done Mr John" said the girl cook lifting the lid of one of the cookin utensils and peeping in, " and the cake in the bake oven is almost done browning beaut if almost real lovely brown. ah if I could only cook for a christian general instead of these. General Mylette exchanged sadly to a christian camp oneday and she was near as good a good a cook as I am any day. I wish I'm be exchanged and get my freedom. I'd give anything t get back home to my parents whom I have never seen for six years."

And with this final sentence the slave cook wiped off the cover off the bake kettle and disclosed to view a neatly, baked cake of which no bakery could have ever been ashamed of. And supper time was coming for all the slaves she began now to bustle about earnestly in the supper department.

Here you boys letthe girls get by the table first. Get away Bill and Harry, take your seats on side of the table and leave the girls have their's. Boy John you just take off that composition book and sit down by the new slave and I'll take up the s steaks and have the first griddle full of cakes on your plates in less than no time---here you Ward, and Pedro get out of the way and go to your proper places. I tell you or tell report your conduct to the general."

And she with the aid of two other girls started to set the table. . . .

General General General

General Mylette wanted me to come to supper with him and his generals in his own head quarters said John but I said no slaves cannot dare eatwith generals. We are too low for that. and he said to me, that to him slaves are no lower than a general and that he does not fight for slavery, but for the flag only."

"So he did" said no money said the girl whose name was Annie Degree heaping the smoking batter cakes on his plate after filling Jannies' Let us do not know the General yet, but Annie keeps best for us all. so let him alone for that."

And with that she gave John a smile with her finger designed to be immensely facetious and turned again to her griddle with great briskness.

"Now for the cake said Jon John at when the griddle was already, finished and the last cake had fl ed down a la a knife over the article in question.

"Heavenly boys John said Annie laughing with convulsions and suddenly catching his arm don't cut it with that big ugly knife. You'll spoil the nice cake all s sweet spoil all the pretty rise of it. or I'll give you a nice tin knife which I keep for cutting of cake. There now see how it comes apart like a piece of paper. Now eat away, you don't get any cake to eat that one.

" General Mylette says" said John, speaking with his mouth full" that general Manley has a girl slave that is a better cook than you."

" That may be true in one way but in no way those Manleys are of no account" said Annie contemptuously" They are mean to every body. In a kind of plain way they say there is no man living as wicked as they are, and as to getting up victories any they don't even begin to get a notion of it, the Nationals licks them every time. Place any of the four Manleys along side of general Mylettze or Evans. God Lord and General Mic-Hollmster Mc Johnston of Louis Turner--can they ever sweep it up again t against the National soldiers like Mylettze or evans--so kind of splendad and irresistless you know in big battles. oh tell me nothing. These Manleys are not worth their commissions, and they don't treat their ol slaves as good as Mylettze does his."

" well though I've heard you say" said John" that Manley has a fine cook."

" so he has a and a pretty girl too but how does he treather?" said Annie" I may say that she lives a dogs life in his headquarters. She can do a good plain common cooking too, make a good loaf of bread, pies, cake and the like, her corn cakes they say is more extra good than mine, her potatoes are good, but good god come to the appreciating she recieves recieves, I'd like to poison the rascal. but what can she do? he has to take it it I guess. I know all about it for I was her assistant once when Manley had me and Good Lord she can bake pies, and make the real flaky taste of the crusts as which melts in your mouth and lies up all like a puff, and je yet Manley always finds fault with her cooking and says she is rotten for her work and ought to be sold to a mean master. Why there is no meanner master than he is, even Augustinis St Clare is not bad olny only when you cp ose him. Now I was once his slave, and he treated me fine though d he was like a tiger to other slaves. Yet Manleys cook and I are good friends you know John and I'd give anything if Mylettze would buy her. I never said nothing to Mylettze knowing how much he hates Manley but never you mind John. The day will come when the Abbleanniens win will win this war and free us all. Why I have not slep a sweet wink for a week thinking of when we will be free. but talking about the Manleysthey are no account at all. Why wicked Federal is an angel compared to them. I'd kill myself before I'd be a slave of any of them Manleys"

I suppose general Mylettze though the Manleys were ever so nice" said John just to tease her.

" Thought he so said so did you?--' well john you must not have awakened yet. I was with Jo Jennie when she looked for Manley and there she was presenting them to he him the pies she had made, showing them as innocent. I told the general Ma Manley aint goo good to his slaves at a l. she can't expect him to be the old human heart. But it aint nt fault of here. as Jo John you don't know half of it. If you was a slave of general Manley for a few days you'd find out." here Annie si sighed and rolled up her eyes with emotion."

" I'm sure Annie I understand all my own good luck" said John. ' Ask this little new girl here if I did not have a narrow escape of goi o f going to Manleys lines. Why Federal wished general Mylettze to exchange h me for her. Ju he refused. He'd either buy her or not at all....."""

Annie sat back inm r her chair, and indulged in a hearty guffa of laughter at this news laughing till the tears ran down her face and varying the exercise with playfully slapping and poki ng the boy, and telling him not to joke so much, that his jokes was enough to kill her, and that he certainly would kill her one of these fine days and between each of these sanguinary predictions going off into a laugh e each longer and stronger than the other till the lad really began to think that he was a very dangerous witty fellow and that he therefore must be careful not to kill his sister in talking in this fashion as well as he and she and all the other slaves know how much Mylettze wanted to keep him.

' and so general Federal wanted to have Mylettze exchange you for the girl did he' He,He,He,He,. oh lord what will these distant glandulinian generals be up to next. Why that is enough to make a horn tug laugh. Why you'll e Mylettzes son some day so you I will he likes you so much. Anyway we are not slaves. We are his sergents servants only waiting to be ordered."

' Yes" said John John " I heard him say to Federal that he does not care to exchange me for any one. He is the right sort of a general I'll say even if he is fighting on the wrong side.'

" Pity now pisen ll couldn't buy her" said Annie for the child seemed to make upon h her benevolent heart a strong impression" You ought to ask Mylettz to make her you steady companion as she is quite pretty for you and will be a sweetheart. you know John adole-b- F-h begrue we slaves should never feel above anybody cause all our pr ipriviliges are given us privileges are given us but I do think I'm much above Manley and his generals any day."

Well I mean to ask Mylettze to give her to me as a companion as soon as he buy her off Federal" said John' and you do your prettiest little girl' now indicating to Jennie and you'll find that you'll need to fear no one here. Mylettze is all right. He'll make a first rate priviliged slave out of you and won't we make Manley so surprised that he won't get over it in a year."

Jannie did not answer but Annie said;

' Yes I guess that is true" You'll see Jannie. Lord to think of some of the dinners you'll be eating with him you yourself. you do not even imagine the great big chicken pie we all but with him one night which I made myself when general Pickrell visited him. I and Mylettze came near quarreling about the crust. What does go into the h do f some g herals I'd like to know but sometimes when a slave has the heaviest kind of responsibility on him as you may say and every he is serious and excited, they take pthe time and kind of argue as to who is the best of slave cooks. Now Mylettze who can't cook at all tries to say he can cook better than us, and wanted to try and bake a pie and finally he succeeded in making a pie airight but to eat it was the hardest job any one would ever had. And finally I said;

' Your Excellency you have exulted yourself too much. Now don't you think the Lord must have meant for little girls like me to make pie crusts and you keep the commission as a leader of good soldiers. There I was kida snuey John."

" And what did the general says" said John.

" Say ! why he laughed outright, and so did all the other generals and he said;;; " Well Annie I think you are perfectly right, you sure can book and I only burn it to a crisp. I'm not created to be a cook, but a fighter ." And I heard him mumble under his breath" I'm a fo l to fight for the Glandelinian cause at all."

" and he could have caused me to get a flogging to be so saucy but there you are he was just as friendly as any one can be. See this gold necklace. Well he gave this to me for Christmass. And this Bracelet and this Pos osary also which he said a released National gave him to give to some slave. So what can you expect here when you are his slave"

' well you surely made out with that supper--I remember every general said so " said Said John.

' Didn 't I" and I stood behind the dinning room door da that night and I saw every gene l general pass his plate three times for some more of those pan cakes; and I heard general Pickrell say-" you must have an unusual cook for a slave general Mylettze. Lord I was fit to split my self to pieces with glee; and the general knows what cooking is too" said Annie drawing herself up with an air. " Very nice general that Leonia M-Leonia Meldonia "ickrell and not at all like the Manleys. His army does not massacre children either and is good to the slaves t o too. He is a part of the army under Mylettze and the best part too. He came of one of the best families in southern Glandelina. I know what was what as well as any do the generals and he offered general Mylettze more than $100,000 for me but he would well, as he said-" That girl is more like a daughter to me. you see he is a good general even if he fights for Glandelinia. I know him all the way through. If those Vivian girls we read about come into his camp they won't need to fear him. Yes he knows what a good slave i slave is" '

Jannie had listened to all this r and she felt somewhat relieved, for surely a slave would not talk that good of her master if he was not good to her and all other slaves and therefore she hoped inwardly that she would be taken by him.

By this time John and all the other child slaves had eaten so much that they could eat no more and therefore some of them arose to go to what work they had to perform while the others still remaining were at leisure to notice the entire ery of other child slaves of some other command who looked in hungrily fro from the opening of the tent.

" Her you kids" said John breaking off liberal bits and throwing it at them" you want some I do don't you, come Annie bake them something. General Mylettze won't care."

She both he and Jannie moved to a comfortable seat in the big tent, while Annie after baking a goodly pile of pancakes, ordered the slaves to enter, and they alternate y b began to eat also and distributing to others who were too timid to enter the tent and who seemed rather to eat theirs outside, then enter a tent where they felt they were o not allowed." Oh what are you kids so timid for" said Annie giving hot come and another a piec piece of cake. " Can't you have a little nerve once in a while especially be decent when a nice slave is in the tent. If you don't stop being so afraid the wicked Wicked Glandelinians will take advantage of you and make life hard for you. You'll see.'

What meaning might have been under this warning it is difficult to say but it is certain that its awful distinctness seemed to produce very little impression on the timid slaves thus addressed:

" Leave them alone Annie" said the boy" they might not be able to help it any way and maybe they do not have as good a master as Mylettze might believe. Therefore they cannot help it."

Here some of the older of these slaves emerged into the tent and with hands and faces well plastered with the cake frosting began to vigorously wash themselves.

" You certainly must love sugar" said Annie g t getting more water so they can clean themselves good. " Some day your mouths will be stuck together, and never become loose. Be sure to wash it all off."

Some of the others laughed as they washed themselves or faintly screamed with girlish merriment.

' Did you ver see such foolish yet jolly kids for little slaves" said Annie. rather complacently as producing an old towel about three feet long kept for such needs she poured a lott little water out of a teapot on it and began rubbing off the cake frosting from the face and hands of a younger child, and hav rubbing off the cake frosting from the face and hands of a younger child, and hav ing polished her till she shone glowed. Then she glowed she sat her down by a ing polished her till she shone glowed. Then she glowed she sat her down by a tub, while she set to work at cleaning away the supper. The young child tub, while she set to work at cleaning away the supper. The young child sat looking at for a while in front at intervals in looking over an old magazine which operation seemed to offers her special content.

" isn't she a young little spirito" said one of the soldiers holding her from him to take a full-length view, then getting up he set her on his broad shoulder and began capering and dancing with her, while John snapper snapped at her with a rattle, and the other slaves now returning from outside again roared after her little wild cats or bear cubs till Annie declared they made as much noise as the " Devil yell " of the Glandelinian soldiers during a charge in battle. And accordingly to their own will this usually was a daily occurrence in the tent, and her declaration did not abate the merriment in the least until not until any one had roared and tumble and danced themselves down to a state of composure.

" well now I hope you are done done with the noise" said Annie who had been busy in pulling out a large wooden soap box and now some of you slaves get to work here and clean out the tent and then we all have some fun before it gets to be night."

" oh Annie we don't need to Myletze will break camp to night sure he will. Let us sit up to the night and watch the army move. The parade is so curious, we likes to watch it."

" oh let them wait" said Johndecidedly. " The army, willadvance as soon as Myletz buy's Jannie. I know it.There's no need of cleaning tent now."

Annie thus having saved herself of this disagreeable task seemed highly delighted to pass it by saying therefore;

" well maybe it will do them some good to watch the army make the move".

The tent now resolved itself into a committee of child slaves to consider the strange accommodations and arrangements for the meeting they were going to have.

" What are we going to do for the proper chours now for our meeting I would like to know" said Annie when everything was ready. as this meeting had been held at every day or night the army halted in a march without any more " chores" there seemed some encouragement to hope that a way would be discovered at present.

" Jack broke the legs out of one of our chairs last week" suggested one of the boys.

" Is that so. I'll be bound you pulled them outs yourself during one of your pranks last weeks " said Annie.

" Well it will stand up anyhow, if you keep it jammed up against the tent wall" Said another.

" But I'll not have any one sit on it cause they'll fall off and hurt h themselves" Said John,

" good Lord get some one then who won't said James" and then he'd began " comes boys and girls your freedom is here" and then down he's go and the a lad imitated precisely the strange tones of that slave standing thumping on the floor to make a show of the supposed disaster.

" Come now be decent for once can't you" said Annie Annie" are you not ashamed!"

John and others now however joined in the laugh and declared decidedly that the lad was a comedian. So the admonition seemed to have had no effect.

" Well john" said annie" You'll have to bring in the big boxes outside standing by the tent."

" I saw some boxes th that were bigger---they are better" said John"

" Yes but they are too far and you'll be questioned for taking them" answered Annie.

" You but me of these old boxes must have been already caved in" said another lad"

" and if any one stands on them they'll fall through the middle and break their necks."

" But how about using some big barrels that are older" said a girl. General Myletze would let us have some big barrels and they'll never fail."

" I'm sure one of them will cave in too" said Annie" and let them fall through duringthe middle of the meeting, and I don't want that."

During this slight argument one of the soldiers having overheard the remarks rolled intothe tent two empty casks and securing them from rolling by placing stones on each side placed large boards across them, which arrangement together with the turning down of certain tubs and pails, and the disposing of the chairs and benches at last completed the preparations.

" John Di Fob is such a good reader now I know He will be glad to read for us" said Annie" It is much more interesting nevertheless."

John very readily consented for usually any boy or even girl is always ready for anything that might make them of considerable importance.. The room was soon filled with a motly assemblage of boy and girl slaves. a little harmless gossip ensued on various thems such as to the weather., what the Nationals might do next, or when is Myletze going to make another exchange for prisoners and the like, and how soon Myletze was going to buy a new slave, now for the army was going to march, how the new slave new slave would be treated in the army, and how Myletze was thinking of securing from plantations in swamps and meadows a lot of slaves which he intended to use either for the benefit of the army or for exchanges.. A few of the child slaves were belonging to other slave holders and they had got permission to attend and were brought in various choice scraps of information about the sayings and doings at times their own past of the camp made in secret which therefore circulated as freely as the same sort of small change does in higher circles. After a while the singing commenced to the evident delight of all of all present. Not even all the disadvantage of the singing voices could prevent the effect of the naturally fine voices many of the slaves had, but in airs at once wild and spirited.The words were sometimes the well known glandelinia war songs and sometimes of a more wilder more unusual character picked up at many child slave camp meetings.The chorus of one of them which ran as follows was sung with great energy and unction;

" A hundred thousand die per day on the field " hundred thousand die onthe field of battle,
Glory to the National cause only.

Another special favorite had often repeated the words;

Oh I'm going to fight for glory; comeyou come along with us;
Don't you see the Nationals a running, abandoning everything in to the fray
Don't you seethe Nationals still advancing this veryday very day.

There were many others which made incessant mention of " Abbieannia forever" and " on to Angelinia Agathia; or oh To Vivian Hickey; or oh the Or On the shores of Vivian Hickey, for the minds of child slaves impassioned and imaginative always attatche itself to war songs and expressions of a vivid and strange.Nature, and as they sung, some laughed, and some cried, some clapped hands and some shook hands rejoicingly with each other as if they had fairly gained their freedom at last. Various exhortations or relation of experience followed and intermingled with the singing or shouting. One child slave much olderthan the rest and much revered as a orator a of the past rose and said;

" Well well boys and girls, I am mighty glad to see every one of you safe and sound and that I am able to see you once more; because I don't n know when any one of us shall be sent over to the National Armies for the exchange of a prisoner, but many of us have gone already, and many of us sooner or later may be called to tie up our little bundle, put our hat on, and wait for the escort to come along and take us to the National army, sometimes in the night I dream of general Myletzes riding up to my bed room, and I think I hear the galloping of his horses, and that I'm looking at out all the time,,,,now every one of you must be ready too for I tell you all, boys and girls" she said stamping her foot hard on the floor" that " Being exchanged is a mighty good thing for it means freedom. It is a blessing boe and boys and girls--- you don't know nothing hoe it feels untill it happens. It's wonderful." And this slave sat down with streaming tears, as wholly overcome while the whole circle struck up----

" Oh Abbieannia, Fair Abbieannia
We are bound for the fair land of Abbieannia.

John by request read the last chapters of Revelations often interrupted by the exclamations as " goodness would you you believe that now. Only hear that will you."
" Just think of that now." Or " Is that surely coming hue?"

John was the brightest brightest of the child slaves in Myletzes army and had been in his earliesy days before he had been stolen by glandelinians been well trained in religious religious matters by his mother and father, and now he found himself an object of general admiration and therefore threw in all restraint and read or preached with a gravity and and seriness for which he was admired by all the child slaves, and it was agg agreed by all that a Catholic Priest could not do it better than he did, and that it was truely amazing."

John Adlede God was a sort of child slave priest in religous matters, no matter where he was as long as he was in Myletzes army. Having naturally an organization in which he could practice practice anything kind of religion he desired and having a greather breadth and cultivation of mind than most of his companions had he was looked up to with great respect as a sort of priest among them, and the simple hearty sincere style of his exhortations surprised them all greatly. But it was in prayer that he excelled more than anything else. Nothing could exceed the touching seriousness and simplicity the child like earnestness, of his prayers or preaching, enriched with the language of scripture which seemed so entirely to have wrought itself into his little being as to have become a part of himself, and to drop from his lips unconsciousnelsey in the language of an ince innocent child. and so much did his prayers alwaysxwork always work on the devotional feelings of all the other childslaves that there was always a sort of danger that it would be lost altogether in the abundance of the responses which broke out everywhere around him.

In the while this scene was passing in the child slave tent, one quite otherwise passed in the headquarters of general Mylette. General Federal and the former were seated together in his tent aforesaid at a large round table covered with papers and writing utensils. General Mylette was busy counting some bundles of bills which after which he counted and looked over quite carefully, he pushed pushed over to general Federal who counted them likewise but more steadily and cautiously.

" All fair" said the general" and now for the signing of these papers, and the slave is yours.

General Mylette hastily drew the deeds toard him and singed them like a man that hurries over some disagreeable business and then retained them as he pushed over the money Then General D Federal proceed produced from a valuse vallse, an ar parchment which after looking it over cautiously for nearly a minute as if he was loathe to part with it he handed to general Mylette who took it wu with a gesture of great eugerness.

" Well now the things is finished and the little slave girl is yours to do what you like with," said Federal getting up/

I'll say the thing is done said Federals Mylette in a musing tone and fetching along breath, he repeated " I'm glad of it."

You seem to be unusually pleased about it it appears to me despite the price you paid for her." said General Federal' But I hope you'll remember your promish on your honor, you will not sell Jannie to any Clandellinlan soldier or officer belonging to the commands of the Manleys, or without knowing what sort of proper y she'll go to"

" why I You have just done it sir yourself" said Mylette almost smiling.

" Circumstances you well know your Excellence obliges obliged me' said Federal thoughtily. I" I did not what the Vivian Girls to get her; neither the Manley generals eel h either, and mainly them"

"" Well asyou know they may oblige me too to give them up" said Mylette" that is The Vivian Girls. Howeover I'll g do the best I can in getting Jannie a good home within the christian lines just the same, and as to my men and officers treating her bad you n need not be a bit afraid. If there is anything i thank the good lord for it is I'm never cruel in any ways, and armies of mine never terrify people of towns and villages like those of the Manleys do."

After the expositions which general Mylette had previously given of his humane tendencies general Raymondson Richard Federal did not feel particularly reassured reassured by these declarations one bit but as they were the best comfort the case admitted of he allowedthe trader to depart in silence and as yMylette went out to look Jannie up Federal remained and betook himself to a solitary sigar, and in his heart gloating exceedingly that he had cheated Manley of another little innocent victim. " He thought to himself 'I'll double cross the murderer in another way when I see the opportunity and that other brutal general Federal too."

believe now that you would buy any slave you could see o on the market no matter what the price;" said Burgin in a tone between emotion and admiratio n."

" Well since you must know all it is so ut a bit different ay way. Though I'm fighting on the side of Dixiedixia; and against the Nationals I have agreed to fund a Dixiedixian child slave plantation near San Salvador; and if do I don't know why I am to be hated, as if I were a monster; for doing what every one of my generals do every day; when the masters make it less hell for their slaves. They caused this war and not the christians and I'll make every childslave find, and either keep them in my army or exchange them to the christians for prisoners."

" But why at all others when you can get them so easy buy jannie at such a huge sum" said Burgin: hy buy her instead of taking her; if you do must buy at all:? He educated you."

" Because can get three or four generals in exchange for her; that's why; I could choose whether any if you buy so; The fellow made me a high bid on the little fellow jim and wanted me to give the lad to him in exchange for jannie; if that would suit you any better. " said Hylstes.

" The scoundrel" said Burgin vehemently:

" well did not listen to it a moment because could not part with the kid for no money- So give me some credit."

" My dear" said general Burgin; recollecting himself but you certainly are fighting for a general fighting in behalf of child slavery. am surprised; entirely unprepared for this; but surely you do not mean to say that you could intercede for these little creatures slaves of hom the Nationals are fighting so hardest for: and the law gave you bought jannie a gentle noble hearted child; even if she is a slave: do believe your appeal may that if any one of them gets put up to it they could if they open their lives for you."

" I guess it does may; but that is one of all this; can't help self on this matter: even if am a Dixiedixian general. 'm not fighting for it slavery but for the defense of country and flag; right or wrong: but little slaves are free that is another case."

" Why not make a pecuniary sacrifice and buy some more slaves: if you are e nice willing to beat a part of the inconsistencies of general Hylstes: oh I have tried though a Dixiedixian general be; have tried most faithfully; even as the christians themselves would to do my duty to these poor simple little children and in the eyes of God himself bought e'er to have been slaves as he says" what ever ye do to the least of these e do unto me; our brothers have come for them; instructed them; christened them and known all their little sorrows joys; and battles; as long as have been a slave owner; and a general though I be how can I ever hold up my head among them; if for the sake of a e little paltry gain we would sell such faithful little slaves as he has to e Hadley; and tear from them in a moment all we have thought them to love and value. never will we do it ; and we'll ask continue to exchange them to the Nationals even if we do it ; and we'll ask continue to exchange them to the Nationals even if we lose our command for it. I have taught them the duty duties of their own labors; and of military ways; and how can I bear to have this open acknowledgement that we care for e tle e duty; he relation he ever sustained compared with money. have talked with Annie about her brother; her duty to him as a sister; to watch over him; to pray for him and bring him up in a christian way despite the that wicked Dixiedixians; and how that can we buy t because of some members of Hadley and his confederates he would be torn to that brother and sister apart; and sell them body and soul to profane hands e'ened Dixiedixian generals; just to have our commands. am a Dixiedixian general and so are you but both of us have told our n slaves a hundred times a week I believe that one of you would be worth all the money; and all the wars in the world and how could they believe us if they could see us turn round; and separate brother and sister and sell them sell them sell them to perhaps certain ruin of body and soul and then have the same guilt on our heads like the Hadleys and their wicked confederates; and then expect to win this war. Often feel this war is a wrong cause:"

" I'm sorry you feel about it so Burgin------indeed am" said general Hylstes" an and I respect your feelings too; and share them to their full extent, but tell you how solemnly-it's no use for any one to turn round and tell me that I'm to sell slaves unless want to. I don't mean to tell you this sir; bu but in plain words, there's two choices between me and my slaves; if Hadleys wants to force me to sell slaves of inter force interfere's withmme with me there will be no choice between fighting me and the christian armies at the same time. 'm fighting for Dixiedixia; but do not think I'm fighting against my flag when fight that bloody drutch. Either he minds his own business; or of all goes before he knows it. then ever come in possession of slaves whether I buy them or take them clear off my camp for them only with the Nationals directly for prisoners; and will take all before me. I've raked, and scrapped, and borrowed and sold military goods to other armies, and all but begged to buy good slaves for a good purpose--and the price of Jannie had to obtain by selling to general Cassi Johnonia and Leo Costhille my own plantation down in Dixiedixia which makes up a balance: Federal funeral the boy; but was determined to settle the matter my own way of no other he was in my power rather and had it do my own way. If so you feel so about the slaves would it be why better than if you buy one too."

General Burgin looked like he thunderstruck. Finally he gave a sort of groan:

This is God's curse on the nation for the horrorsest slave child slavery. a bitter bitter most accur se thing; not only a terrible curse to the master and the slave;; but also to both the Dixiedixia and e the Nationals ,overmuch; and a quick speedy downfall for Dixiedixia and all her people: as was a big fool; one of the biggest to e on oith to think that by fighting for Dixiedixia's cause only; could make anything good out of such a deadly and wicked evil: it is not only a sin a mortal sin to hold children as slaves must any time whatever but a dreadful crime; a dreadful result for both body and soul----despite the war and despite fi fighting for the Dixiedixian flag always felt it was the worse of all crimes on earth altogether----I always thought so when was a little boy my myself and dreaded to be so of one of them-- I thought as still more after I tink this war broke ut out----but thought could somehow or other guild gild it over;--I thought by kindness; instruction and care; and the like could make the condition of my own slaves better than freedom; a fool that was: I bet you general Hylstes a hundred dollars to your one; that no matter how brave my are; no matter how strong or ardent fight; nor how good generals we'll make ourselves Dixiedixia will never win this war:"

" Why general Burgin you sure are getting to be quite a grave abolitionist, and a quite: might as well resign your command and join the christians: That would satisfy you better:"

" Abolition ist; if they all knew what know about the horrors of child slavery they might be surprised beyond speaking or thinking;; so do Dixiedixian generals of your army system; do not accuse the Nationals to tell me a about the conditions of child slavery; for you know never thought child slavery was right;--that there is no greater evil in the word than that;--I never felt willing to own slaves; and therefore keep slave children just for the same purpose you do; to rent them within the christian lines for exchange; and that frees them."

Well then in; there are many Dixiedixian generals who differ from us altogether especially his atrocious excitement " general John Jackson; beg pardon Hadley: you remember what he wrote to me once because exchange them for prisoners:"

That was not so interesting as your answer back: never did expect you had even the nerve to write him such a stinging letter: But may nevertheless don't believe even if the Nationals did win this war; the christians could not help the evil any bit; can't cure it any more than we good Dixiedixians can--because there are too many powerful and wicked bodies to defend it------it always went against my common sense; and think you did not think much of Hadley, either; the trouble is to e is to make for you."

Well" said Hylstes; and this time he scowled fiercely:" I must say these fellow Hadley haunts and their generals petty matters further than we poor sinners would exactly care to do: see for instance instances; there's his bloody massacres; without reason at all massacres of women and children; the making of big fires and floods which is not necessary; and so on and so forth all that sort; but we men of the world must think pretty hard at various things and get used to such things; because we cannot do anything: but for one don't quite fancy when other Dixiedixian generals come at us and square and go beyond us in matters of either slavery and massacres that's a fact: To tell the truth; as you know am fighting for the defense of flag and country; and opposing every movement of th Nationals; but would rather any day move my army forward and attack Hadley than would any christian general any day:. If ever get the authority 'll request him in case he ee that he'll feel smaller than an insect:But now my dear sir; trust you see the necessity of the thing and you see 'll have to do the very best that an; My circumstances will allow; so that Hadley or his confederates would not get too many of the slaves in his power; the dogs::"

" Oh yes; yes;" said general Burgin hurriedly and as structedly fingering Hatt his gold watch and chain have no j jewelry of any count not much money. He added thoughtfully but would not this watch do something for me in obtaining a slave my self or can have her to exchange to the Nationals: it was an expensive as when it was one when it was bought. if could only at least save one other child; would sacrifice anything have:"

" I'm sorry; very sorry general" said Hylstes I'm sorry this takes hold of you in like this; but it will do no good use as there is no child slave trader within a hundred miles of here. The fact is; general Burgin the thing is already done; and the best way you can get some slaves is o-tch a troop to a slave plantation and force the master to have them in the army or draft them which ever way you choose: That Hadley alby has had it in his power to rob all child slaves he can get; and now he is fairly off: if you know Hadley and his confederates as do you'd know that all child slaves that are brought to us and not to them; are having a narrow escape indeed."

" Are the Hadleys and their the u their generals so hard them then!' !!! "

" Why not exactly a cruel man; but a man of iron ---a man alive to nothing but deatruct ion of christian children; child slave and profit----less and unhesitating and unrelenthin unrelenting as death; hell; and the grave: He would sell his own parents brothers and sisters at the cheapest ercentage--and wishing them all the harm they could suffer in the bargain. "

" And that brutal cpme hour calling that good faithful little child slave Jannie; and another little girl called Mildred." "

"Well my dear sir the fact is that this goes rather hard with me, its a thing I hate to think of. I drove matters with Federal and will take possession of Jannie to morrow. I'm going to march my army as fast as it is possible to go and reach fan Salvador as soon as possible. I'm in a hurry to get possession of Jannie that's a fact before anything happens to her, and you'd better arrange the movement of your army in the van, and raid every plantation you see and carry off all child slaves found there, and if the masters a and overseers resist shoot all men on the spot and give no quarter. I'll hold it a devil of a crime for any one to make children slaves within my path of advance whether he be a Olandellinian or not. Let the thing be done in the proper form. I say the same as the Nationals, down with child slavery".

" Yes I'll do so saintlyMyletze, I'll help you to end this cruel business. I'll go and see my own poor child slaves, for they do know that the generals of your army can feel for and with them. as to allowing Manley to interfere with us I cannot think of it. The Lord forgive us. what have we done that this cruel necessity of such a unholy war should come upon us."

However it happened that there was no little listener to this conversation whom both of the generals little suspected. Close to the two generals was one of the army wagons but in which were riding about thirteen child slaves, and Jannie was as of one of them and she had heard every word of the conversation. when the voices died in silence and the speed of the marching army increased she being close to the end of the wagon edged a little closer and looked out. She looked now an entirely altered being from the soft pale shivering and timid creature she had been before. She moved cautiously along tward the opening in the wagon, pushed aside the covering and looked out. She saw sun the long line of wagons, and the immense column of soldiers on the opposite side, and seeing nothing else she crept back inside the wagon. Then she looked over her few belongings which Federal had allowedher to has retain. There she had a little case of books, and various little fancy articles ranged by them, the gifts of christmas holidays, there was her simple small trunk. Beside and around her lay the other now slumbering child slaves, some of them with mouths half open, laying every which way, and some of them having a smile spread a like a sunbeam over their whole face something unusual for Jannie to see, as nothing was like this in other armies she had been in before.

" Poor little boy, poor little girl" said Jannie to herself. we are safer her in this army than I believed. they can t sell us from here, but the christians will recieve us yet. we'll be exchanged and not sold. Ready."

No tear dropped from her eyes, for in such straits the heart has no tear to give for she knew not what general Myletze was.

In the meantime another child slave had long before this run away from general Manleys army h and had been a fugitive for over two months and had already gone over six hundred miles. she had a boy with her and she carried a little package of clothing which hels aged to the lad, which she had tied with a handkerchief firmly around her waist, and even as fond is a sisters remembrance that even in the terrors of that awful hour, during the flight, she had never forgotten to raid some place in the dark to get some food. Both had been sleeping by the side of the road and the girl herself was awakened by the unusual noise of the tramp of many feet, and the sound of hote horses and wagons.

Hastily rising she looked and observed a big army of Olandellinians marching by and observed by the nature of the wagons, by the features of the soldiers, and the way the child slaves belonging to the army rode in wagons that it was general Myleeze army.

Myletzes army. it was some trouble for her to arouse arouse the sleeper beside her but after some effort he sat up, and was playing with me of his small toys, while his sister was putting on his hat.

"Where are you going now sis?" said he as she lie low to the ground. She only lay beside him and looked so earnestly into his eyes that he at once devined that something unusual was the matter.

"Hush Jack" she said" we at not speak too loud or they will hear us. A big army of Olandellinians is marching by and they belong to Myletzes command. Let's go into it with the other kids. n Then the other wicked Olandellinians will not be t able to take you away from me, and carry him away off in the bad places, so let's y run off to Myletze and his soldiers. They'll help us even if they are Olandellinians because they are the good Olandellinians."

Saying these words she t brought the lad to his feet and taking him by the hand, she whispered to him to be very still, and then she glided noisely noisely forward to follow one of the wagons which by its color she knewe sheltered slaves. It was an unusually warm March night, with too many stars in the sky for any learned man to count, and as she took him by the hand n he with vague terror clung to her dress. One of the nearest dogs of the army who followed alongside the wagon, s sniffed an she and the lad came near. The girl spoke to him and the animal instantly wagging wagging his tail prepared to follow her although apparently revolving much in his simple dogs head, what the arrival of two new gi children might mean. Some idea however seemed to embrace him considerably, for he often barked as the girl tried to get close to the wagon and looked wistfully first at her, and then at the wagon, and then as if reassured by reflection he patted alongside of her again. a few minutes brought them to the rearof the wagon and the girl stepping tapped loudly on the canvass.

Jannie had remained awake at a very late hour, and althought it was now between twelve and one o-clock she was still not asleep.

At the first rap she was slightly afraid but at the second and hearing a little girls voice outside she then felt more frightened.

" Good Lord what is that" she said, starting up and hastily drawing the canvas aside.

My sakes alive alife if it ain't a girl and boy slave who has no room in a wagon. Get up John and help her in. There's old Jack the dog pawing round what on earth. I'm going to get out and walk with her."

And suiting the action to the word, she let herself drop at of the wagon, and the light of a wagon lantren which John had hastily lighted fell on the her haggard face and dark wild eyes of the fugitive.

" Lord bless you jane. I'm almost scared to look at you said John. How did you get away from Manley. and are you sick or what is coming over you."

" I ran away from Manleye army three months ago---carrying with me my little brother. Manley wanted to sell us to Augustinia St Clare, or wicked Seldon."

" Sell him to Seldon!" echoed Jannie and John, lifting p their hands in dismay.".

" Yes tried to sell us." said Jane firmly" I crept into the closet in his head quarters that dark and stormy night, and I heard Manley tell his generals that he had sold me and my brother, and some others to a trader who'll take us to either Sel or Seldon or St Clare, and since we ran away he has had soldiers all over the country with blood hounds looking for us us . Fortunatelywe came upon this army."

John had stoode stood during this speech with his hands raised and his eyes dilated like a man in a drea. dream Slowly and gradually the it's its meaning came over him he almost collasped, rather than seated himself on the floor of the wagon, and sunk hisahead down upon his knee knees.

" The Lord Oh! The Good or lord have mere, on us" said Jannie. oh it don't seem as if it can be true. what have you done that Manley tried to sell you and your brother.!"

" We have not done anything------it is not for that. Manley want's to get rid of us because he says we are too much like the " Christian Dogs". I heard some of his more human officers plead and beg for us, but he told them it was of no use at all, that no one had anything to say over him about what he should or not do with his own slaves, and that if he so desired he would se l sell all the slaves in the army to Seldon. Y s Yes I heard him say there was to be no ehi choice for any child slaves, and that he would drive them as hard as it was in hi s his pwer to do. Some of them no doubt would say I was a wicked slave to run away so but then I can't help it, and one soul is worth more than the world and we all have souls as well as an, one else, and if we are carried off to a wicked master and knows what will become of us and our souls... It must be right for me to run off like this, but then if it ain't right the Lord forgive me, for I can't help doing it when my soule is in danger."

" well no one blames you" said John But why did you not go sooner. You got off lucky that you was not send down to Augustinia St Clare, or north to Seldon where they kill little girls and boys with a hard work and starving! I'd rather a h a heap let kill myself than go to those slave traders any day. There's time for you to seek shelter here in Mylezes army. Come bustle up into the wagon, and Jannie 'll put your things together. and your safe here. Manley and Myletze are not friends and you won't be bothered by any of Manleys spies even if they do come here.."

The girl and boy were lifted into the wagon hile while jannie looked sorrowfully but quietly around and said:

" Yes, yes you'll becafe here. Let them go with us in this wagon. No one here would say no and eve if you are a stranger the Soldiers won't drive you off but you heard with what John said. if you are followed even here, why let them come that's all. You'll never be taken back to Manleys to be sold, even if everything goes to ruck. I suppose we can bear it here as well as anywhere else" she added while som thing like a sob and a sigh shook her small chest convulsively. My own master always found me on the spot because he was good to me despite his ugly face-- and if he is good Myletze will find the same with me. I have never run away yet and I never will unless I have a mean master. I know its death to run off but better be killed than be a slave of unkind master. as the"

As the other girl was fairly in the wagon she fairly broke down. She lay on the floor and covered her face with her hands. sobs, heavy and loud shook her and great tears fell through her fingers on to the floor of the wagon, just such tears sir or Mrs as you would have dropped either into the coffin where lay your first born son, or over the loss of your child who has been stolen, such tears as my any one wh will shed when they hear the arrival of the dying babe. For these your little girls and boy slaves were children belonging to parents from which they had been stolen from you feel but one great sorrow.

And now" said Jane as she recovered herself I saw my father only once since I was a slave and he is trying to secure me. He could not take me away but he told me that day that he was going to try it some day and keep me within his sight even if he had to join any Olandellinian regiment to do so, and get shifted from one army to another. Do try to get some soldier of this army to get word to him if you can please. Tell him how I fled from Manleys army, how I went, and why I went, and tell him I'm in Mylezes army. You must give my love to him and tell him if I never see him again" she turned way and was silent for nearly two minutes Tell him to leave the Glandelinian army as quick as he can and try to meet me in thekingdom of heaven.'

A few last words, and directions, and then she cried herself to sleep.

General Lee Beppo Lvans and Myletze, after their protracted military discussions, of the day after bu ing Jannie did not go to bed that f llowing night untill it was very late and in consequence slept somewhat ..s later than usual, the ensuing mourn mourning and therefore the continuedadvance of the army was delayed somewhat later than usual though the army was encamped at Headrick Point. While the transport fleets was movingup the river toward Headrick Point and while a sally was made upon the Abbiesnniane in position at Chickadee Point which conflict Jannie and the slaves heard at a great distance for a whole day general Beppo Lvans who had slept in the same tent with Myletze said-

" I wonder what in the world is keeping t that orderly of mine, after having sending a fr few soldiers to look him u for a p to no purpose.

" general Izner Myletze after having issued o issued orders for the camp to move off was standing before his dressing glass, shaving himself, and just then the tent door opened and his orderly entered with his shaving water, and extra water and soap and towl towel for the general to wash himself mit.

" Colonel Andrew" said Myletze" ride over to Camp Number Six and see if you can find general Lvans orderly, for he has summoned him three times already." must have overslept himself the sleepy head" he added to himself with a smile.

Andrew soon made his retoin with eyes very wide with astonishment.

" Lord your excellency, thecurderly is with a party of soldiers coming in with a lot of prisoners. An attack was made on Chickadee Bluffs last night and prisoners have been taken."

Then just before the generals could say anything in reply a soldier came in and said;

" Your excellency, two child slave runaways from Manleys army have been found within o our child slave gangsthis mourning, and I me believe Manleys slave agents will be here after them."

" The truth flashed upon Myletze and Beppo Lvans at the same time.

Myletze exclaimed;

"If Manley suspects they are here, there'll be trouble sure enough. We must get them out."

" The Lord God be thanked said general Lvans" I trust we can exchange them right away."

" We are a fool if we don't" said Myletze, Really it will be something pretty awkward if we don't get them out of camp. If Manleys knows th y are in the lines he will think I was responsible for it and will ac something to disgrace my honor. I.ll turn them two over to some prisoner and send him back to the National lines under a flag of truce. I'll cheat Manley of two victims at least" and general Myletze left the tent hastily putting on his coat coat and hat. As there was some actions still going on at Chickadee's bluff there was a gre great mobolization of troops everywhere as far as eye could see, the shouted commands of offo officers, and the appearances of small standards of all color and shade in different places for a quarter of an hour, and some unusual sound of firing far in the distance. One person who might have shed some light on the matter was entirely silent, and that was the orderly of general Lvans. Silenti silent and humming humming a song to himself he proceeded to eat his morning breakfast as if he heard or saw nothing of the excitement around him, or paid no attention to the three hundred prisoners that were brought in.

During this time a score of slaves were roosting like so many crows on a rail fence sunning themselves in that early April warm weather each one determined to be the first one to apprise the great and wicked Glandelinian general of his ill luck when he should hear of it.

" He will be mad, I'll bet anything' said Jack.

" won't he swear and play hell over in the west." said Jane.

Yes for he does show his character" said Annie the head sh slave girl cook" I know all about general Manley and his character but Mylstze'll b beat him out of the game. The new slaves are going to be exchanged this very morning, and the christian officer that'll take them to the National camp will be free also." And Annie who had never in her life thought of what freedom really was no more than does a canary in a cage now took on airs of superor superior wisdom and strutted about/when at last thecolumn of Glandelinians came in with the prisoners in hand all be all the horsemen being booted and spurred the officer in charge was saluted with the tidings that two new slaves had entered the lines at night, and had before the fight at Chickadee bluff been discovered in the wagon riding with Jannie and other slaves. The slaves on th the rail fence were surprised at the number of pof prisoners, and were not in the least disappointed at hearing them swear at their captors with a fluency and fervency which surprised them all amazingly as they ducked and dodged hither and thither to be out of reach of the riding whips of some of the Glandelinian officers, and all whooping off together they tumbled in a pile of still remaining snow, where they kicked p their heels andshouted to their full satisfaction.

Why not have respect for the soldiers who are fighting for your freedom you little geese" cried one of the Glandelinian officers. " Do not sport them just because they're prisoners.'

But these child slaves did not know any better, thinking all soldiers were alike no matter what color of uniforms they were, and therefore they made a string of indescribable faces at the soldiers of both sides, when they were fairly beyond hearing and sight. The head officer of the prisoners was brought right before general Myletze who had returned to his tent.

I say now general Myletze this is an unusual business" said the prisoner as he was ushered i to the tent. It seems that you make war on everybody no matter where they are, and you surprised us in an unfair manner last night."

" Colonel there are a number of girl slaves present." said Myletze.

' I beg pardon girls' said the prisoner, bowing slightly, with a still lowering brow but still I say as I said before, this is a singular incident. Why is it sir?"

Sir" said Myletze even though you are a prisoner of war,if w you wish to communicate with me you must observe ob servance of the nature of a gentleman. Colonel Andrew, take Colonel Globes hat and sabre and lay it on a table. Take a seat sir. Yes I regret to say that in the night a party of my troops attacked that plantation and captured you and a number of your men prisoners and started something of a little battle. But I had you summoned here before me because two child slaves excited or driven to desperation by Manley anley Manley has run off three months ago and taken refuge in my lines."

" Nevertheless according to the rules of war I did expect some fair dealings in this matter I confess, and what is it to me whether slaves run off or not."

" Well sir," said Myletze turning sharply round upon him" what am I to understand bythat remark of yours. If any man calls my honor in question, when he does the same thing under the circumstances himself, I have but one answer for him."

The prisoners cowered at this, and in a somewhat lower tone said that " It was awful hard on a fellow on furlough, and who had expected to be free for a time before rejoining the army to be taken prisoner this way."

" Colonel Globe" said Izner Myletze" If I did not think you had some cause for your embrassment, I should not have borne from you the rude and unceremonious style of your greeting to me just now. I say this much however since appearances calls for it, that I shall allow no insinuations cast upon me as if I were at all partner to any unfairness in this matter. Moreover you alone I did not intend to hold a prisoner provided I could obtain a special favor of you, and if you do it I shall feel bound to give you every assistance in the use of an escort etc in your return to the christian camp. So in short, Colonel," said he suddenly dropping from the tone of dignified coolness to his ordinary one of easy frankness frankness," though you are my prisoner, the best way for you is to keep good natured and eat some breakfast, with me, and we will then see what my plan is to be. By that you'll be once more free to go to your own camp."

General Beppo Lvans bow arose and said his own military work and engagements would prevent him being at the military breakfast table that morning, and deputing a very respectable child slave to attend to the prisoners coffeeat the side board, he left the tent.

2"That old general who might be your fat er does not like my appearance I'll be bound" said the prisoner with an uneasy effort to be very familiar.

" I am not a ustomed to hear my generals and other officers spoken of so freely by a enemy fighting to overthrow our cause" said general Myletze dryly.

" Beg pardon of course, only a joke, you know" saidthe prisoner forcinga laugh.

"Some jokes se especially especially from a national are less agreeable than from some one else" rejoined Myletze.

" Devilish free since he has me a prisoner of war, ucuss him" muttered the prisoner to himself" quite a grand general too by his uniform. Must be a King of Glandelinia or something."

Never did fall of any convention held at any court occasion then the surge of sensations that was brought on bythe reportthat two slaves had run away from Manleys army, had been a fugitive for weeks, and had come to Myletzes army as a refuge. It was the p topic in ever every mouth whether child slave, soldier or officer, and nothing was done in the camp or in the march but to discuss its probable result. The flight of these two slaves, a girl and boy from Manleys army, and roaming the country for months while the whole region was scourged for them was an unprecedent event near for Mylstzes army-- and was also a grand and great accessory in bringing on the general and great excitement.

An one of the elder boy slaves whose nickname was black head because of the dark hair he had on his head and whose hair was about three shades darker than the black hair of any one ever seen was thinking of the matter profoundly in all its bearings with a full comprehensiveness of vision sion and a strict lookout to his own cer personal well bearing that would have done credit to any Glandelinian general in Myletzes army.

It's an ill wind that's been blowing stray child slaves from Manleys army into our's---that's a fact" said this lad sententiously giving an additional hoist to a Glandelinian flag which he had been ore ordered to put up." Yes its an ill wind that blows" he repeated. " now there's the new slave, little Jannie--well of course there's room for many other slaves to be brought up here, and why not leave them two stay here. Now why shouldn't they I'd like to know--------"""""

" Hulloo, James ye blackhead, the general wants you to bring his horse up to his tent right away. said Annie cutting short James's soliloquy.

High what's on foot now slavy cook."

"Why you don't know I suppose that a spy called Angelinia Aronburg entered the camp this morning and cleared out with a horse belonging to General Peppo Evans."

" You tell yourself that?" said James with some contempt why I knew it much sooner than you did, I am not so green now."

" well anyhow general Dargin wants youto bring up his horse, and you and I am to go with a party of soldiers and help them find her or follow her."

" Good night. Child slaves persue s fugitives. well allright I'll do anything the general asks" said James. "I'ts I who am called for tracking down christian spies if I have to do it. Here's the one who catches them. Yes if I don't catch her now, for master will see what a slave can do."

" Ah but James," said Annie You had better think twice, for she is the devilto catch and if you surprise her she'll be your captor. And besid s this is only to be a bluf bluff persuit. General Dargin really does not want her catched. It's just for the excite ment of a chase."

" High" said James opening his eyes. " How do you knos that?"

" Heard him say that myself his ver, morning when the news came to him. He sent me to bring general Mylatzes a special cornmeal for breakfast, and when I discovered the girl spy in my cook tent, and told the general she was there and got off with general Evans horse he just rose up and said Do not matter about the spy now. we'll chase after her later. I'm not so anxious to catch children. I want my breakfast." and it is always best to stand by him and his soldiers I tell you."

James upon this scratched his head, which if it did not contain very much wisdom still contained a great deal of species much in demand among Glandelinian generals of all complexions and contries and vulgarly comin too' knowing which side the meat is cooked best so stopping with some grave consideration he again stood up fastened the flag cord to the pole and said at last:

" There is no saying never about no such kind of thing in n the world so far. Spies are spies, and it seems like treason to allow one to escape purposely."

" James spoke like a philosopher, emphasizing every one of his words as if he had had a large experience in different sorts of worlds and all their wars, and therefore h had come to his conclusions advisedly.....

" Now I thought for certain that general Dargin would send the hecler cavarly to scour the versal world after that girl spy" added James thoughtfully.

" So he would" said Annie. But can't you see through the mystery yet you dumbbell. The Glandelinian soldiers do not really want to get the girl and yet don't want her to get away with general Evans horse. Do you understand now you nanny."

" Oh yes" said James with an indescribable intonation known only to those who have heard it among child slaves.

" Al and I'll tell you more than that" said Annie I expect you had better be bringing general Dargins horse-----mighty sudden too---for hear the general calling af e after how you--so you have stood fooling with that flag and ple long enough. Do ye get me!

James ponthis began to bestir himself in real earnest, and afterwhile appeared, be bearing down gloriously gloriously tward the generals tent with two other horses in a full gallop, and adroitly throwing himself off before any one of thethree horses had any idea of stopping, he brought them up alongside the horseposts like a tornado.....

longside of one of these posts he percieved that therewas another horse, and which being well able to know all horses this slave at once percieved that it must either have belonged to angelinia Aronburg or was still her's and that she had not as yet left the camp as believed by the glandelin glandelinian officers. This horse was a wild one and very skittish at the approach of strangers, and therefore winced, and bounced and pulled hard at his halter.

Hi, ho, hum scared of me are you" said Blackhead, and his face lighted p with a curious most mischievious gleam. I'll fixye now so she'll have a time of her life"

Now to make a long sentence short there was a row of large b e been beech s trees overen overshadowing this part of the camp, and the shap small triangular beech-nuts lay scattered thickly all over the ground. The slave picked up one of these, and then with two of them in his hand approached the horse, stroked and p petted and seemed apparently bus busy in soothing his fear and agitation. Then on pretense of adjusting the saddle he cautiously and carefully slipped both of them under it in such a manner that the least weight brought pon the saddle would annoy the nervious animal a great d al deal without leaving any gran grass or wound.

There my dear Mr horse" the slave said rolling his eyes with an approving grin I'll fix her so she'll know what it is to have some excitement."

At this moment one of the colonels appears appearss on the outside of se of the tents beckoning to himand therefore Blackhead approached with as good a determination to to obey as if he never cared to do anything else.

What have been the cause of taking you so long James! Maybe you have been loit ering. I sent Annie to tell you to hurry.

But the Lord bless you sir said the lad" Horses won't allow me to bring them up as quick as they are wanted. They went far off down to the other side of the camp and I had to tramp way down there to bring them in . Someone must have turned them loose, and it might have been the spy. "

" James" How many times must I tell you not to say Lord bless you and the like in a Glandelinian camp when you know it isnot allowed."!

" Oh the Lord Save my soul, I went and forgot sir. I won't say nothing of the same no more."

" Yes, but you have already said it a second time."

" Did I. Oh Good Lord and Master. I mean I,----I mean----I did not mean to say it

" You must be careful s slavy as it is punishable to say these words in the camp" said the officer sternly.

" Just let me get my breath sir, and I'll try to stop it if it is wicked and a sin. I'll be very careful."

" Well James you are to go with Colonel Harverto to follow after an escaped girl spy wh who has been within the lines, or maybe she is already in and did not leave. Be careful of the horses boy, you know one of them fell during a skirmish last week with the Nationals and therefore is a little lame, and so therefore do not ride him too fast."

and the colonel spoke the last words with a very low voice, and yet with strong emphasis emphasis.

" Let me alone for doing that sir" said the slave looking into the officers face as if he understood the order. The Gracious Lord knows. He didn't mean to say that now as I forgot again" ,a said he suddenly catching his breath with a ludicrous flo florish of apprehension, which made the con colonel laugh in spite of himself.. " Yes sir I'll look out for the horses, providing they do not look out for me."

Now Annie" said James returning to his stand under one of the big beech trees, " You wouldnot would not at all be surprised if that brown horse over yonder should suddenly give a wild fling by and by, when his riders comes to remount him. You know Annie all horses will do such things" and therewith James poked Annie in the side in a highly suggestive manner.

" Oh you want to say"said Annie with an air of instant appreciation and understanding.

" Yes you see, Annie, the colonel wants to make a short time of it---and sure that is clear to the most ordinary observer. I'll just make a little time for him. Now you see I get all these horses loose, capering wildly around the at and down to the woods beyond and I expect some of the soldiers won't have a chance to be be off in a big hurry.."

Annie grinned.

" You understand" said Blackhead," you see if any such thing should happen as that, and the brown horse should being begin to act mussil to the cont rary, and cut up, you just let go of ee two horses and others to help him, and we'll help him;----oh yes, sure we'll help him." and both the boy and the girl laid their heads back on their very shoulders, and broke into a low and immoderate laugh, snapping their fingers and flourshin their heels with great glorious delight..

At this instant a pretty looking Glandelinian boy scout and about twenty soldiers appeared in front of the tent. The officers and soldiers were somewhat better hearted by unusually good coffee and also a little happy from " happy water" and therefore they came out smiling and talking in tolerably good humor. James and Annie, handing to the soldiers their weapons, clawed for certain long stretchs of broken tree branches, and flew to the horses posts to help the officer and the others. The officer in charge had on his head a peculiar hat and the plumes were ingeniously disentangled from all pretensions to braid, as respects the hats brim, and some of the lon e longer feathers starting apart, and standing bright, gave it a blazing air of freedom and defiance, quite equal to that of any Fejee Chief, while the whole brim of the wide hat being usually decorated with round ball like objects underneath the officer looked about well pleased, as if to say. " who's got a better hat than I'm"

" well boy and girl slavy " said the officer" look alive now, as wechuve no time at all to loose."

" You are right, time is usually precious at this hour, Master" said James putting the rein into the h officers hand, and holding his stirrup, while Annie was quickly untying the other two horses. The instant the officer touched the saddle saddle of the brown horse, the mettlesome creature, bounded from the earth with a sudden spring, that threw his master sprawling into a wet snow bank head first, but some feet off from the side of the road,. James with the most frantic ejaculations made a quick dive at the reins but only succeeded in some how or other either purposely or accidentally sticking a piece of wood he had in his hands near the horses eye which increased the nature of the skittish animal. So with the greatest vehemence, he overturned the boy and giving several contempteous snorts, flourished his heels vigorously in to the air, and was soon gallop ing away tward the edge of the camp, followed by other horses about seven of them in number, whom Annie had not failed to let loose, according to contra Gcontract, speeding them off with various direful ejaculations. And therefore within another moment ensued an unusual scene of confusion. James and Annie ran and shouted,- dogs barked here, and there unusual scene of confusion. James and Annie ran and shouted,- dogs barked here, and there unusual scene of confusion. James and Annie ran and that as if an attack was being b made by the nationa hundreds of soldiers ran this way and that as if an attack was being b made by the nationa hundreds of soldiers ran this way and that as if an attack was being b made by the nationa hundreds of soldiers ran this way

Nationals, and about a hundred child slaves both male and female, raced, clapped hands, whopped, sang, shouted, and yelled, and screamed with outrageous officiousness and untiring zeal.The horse formerly belonging to Gertrude Angeline(Angelinia Aronburg) and which was a very light brown one and quite large, and on whom for real no one could ride but his distress only mistress only entered into the spirit of the scene with the greatest gusto, and having for his coursing ground inside the camp a field 1 nearly three miles in extent gently sloping down on either side and bordered by a forest, he raced on and wouldn't stop, and when he did slack up he apparently would take some delight to see how near he could allow his pursuers to approach him, and then when he was within a hands grasp of them he would rush off with a start and a snort, kicking some of them down, like a vicious beast as he was it, and career far down into into some alley of the woof 1 wood lot. Nothing was further a from James mind than to have any as of any one of the horses horses taken taken untill sich season as should seem to him most desireable -- and the exertions that he made was indeed most heroic.ut nevertheless he sure was not catching any one of the horses.

The Glandelinian officers ran up and down,, and cursed, swore and blasphemed and danced and stamped like a wild Indian suddenly gone insane, while the soldiers could not restrain themselves and all of them were bent double with laughter.General Dargi Dargin in vain(you give me a pain) tried to shout shout direction from his tent, and other officers who witnessed the scene from their own point of view alternate an alternately laughed and wondered-- not without some suspicion of what lay at the bottom of all this confusion. at last at about one oclock in the afternoon, James appeared appeared triumphant, mounted on the horse he was to ride, with Angelinia Aronburgs horse by his side reeking wet with sweat, but with flashing eyes and dilated nostrils, showing that the spirit of freedom had not entirely subsided.

" We have captured him at last the boy exclaimed triumphantly. If it had not been for me and Annie they might have all ran away to the christian lines, but we catched them."

" You little devils growled the colonel in no good mood. " If it had not been for you boththis never would have happened. You are fully responsible for it. You did it on purpose, I know it."

" Lord bless us all, Master" said James in a tone of the deepest concern " And the two of us who have been racing ourselves to death, and chasing after the crazy horse till the sweat just pure off of us."

" well that does not matter a bit to me" said the colonel You have bet me nearly a full morning with your confounded nonsense. Now now let's be off and have no more fooling. And besides she might have escaped so far you have delayed the pursuit so long".

" why colonel" said James in a deprecating tone' I believe you mean to kill us all horses, and all. Here we are all just ready to drop, and all the horses are just reeking with sweat. Why colonel you won't be thinking of starting now till after dinner. All of the horses want to be rubbed down, see how they have been splashing themselves, an and me of one of them lu limi limps too, don t think our general would allow us to start this way anyhow for we have to obey his orders. Lord bless us Master we can catch her if we do stop. Angelinia Aronburg cannot get far with the horse as the soldiers in the camp will recognize it anywhere and hold her and bring her too. and she was never no good of a fighter."

General Dargin, who greed greatly to his amusement had overheard the conversation from his tent,,, now now was determined to do his own part own part. He therefore came forward, and courteously expressing his sinsecre concern for the colonels accident, pressed him to stay to mess, saying that the ndercook should bring it on the table immediately. Thus all things considered, the colonel with rather an equivocal grace proceeded to the generals tent, while James and some of the other slaves, rolling his eyes after him with good meaning, proceeded gravely with the horses to the cleaning yard.

My gosh and gracious did you see the colj colonel ,nnie? did you see him!" said James when he had got fairly beyond the shelter of the horses tent, and fastened the horse to a post. Oh Lord, Gracious Lord if it was not as good as a comedy, now to see him dancing, and kicking and sweati swearing at us, and his soldiers laughing enough to split their sides. didn't I hear him blaspheme though. swear away ,ou dirty dog says 's I to myself, will you want your horse now, or wait untill I get good and ready to catch him. Lord ,nnie I believe I still can see him swearing at us.' and James and Annie leaned on against the wall of the horse tent, and laughed to their hearts content .

' and sure you ou ought to seen how mad he looked, when I brought the horses p. Lord an he would have killed me, if he dared to, and there I was standing as innocent and as humble as if I had nothing do to do with the accident."

" Yes I see you or seen you" said Annie Ain't you a clown now James?"

" I rather expect I am one sort said James" did ,ou see general Dargin and other generals bythe tent? I seen some of them laughing laughing also."

" I'm sure I was running back and forth and racing so, that I d id not see a thing" a said Annie.

" Well you see said James proceeding gravely to wash down the gray horse" I had some sort of observation Annie. and I've always got the habit , and its a very important habit, Annie, and I commend you to be cultivating it, now you are so young. Hist up that hind foot Annie. You see Annie, it is observatu ion and the like that mk makes all the difference in child slaves. Did I not see which way the wind blew early this morning. Did I not see what general Dargin wanted, though he never let on at all. well that's what you call observation Annie. I expect also it is what you call a faculty. Faculties are different in different people, but cultivation of them gors a great way."

" Yes but I guess if I had not helped your line of observation this morning, you would not have guessed it so easily." said Annie.

" Annie" said Blackhead You are a promishing slave companion indeed, there is no doubt about it all at all. I certainly think lots of you Annie and I do not fell at all ashamed to take ideas and advises from you even though you are a girl. We ought never to overlook any one Annie, because the smartest of us all are liable to get tripped up somethi sometimes. And now Annie, let's go up to general Dargins tent now. I'll be bound general Dargin will give us a uncoo uncommon good bite now."

It might be impossible for any one to conceive of any human creature more wholly desolate, and forlorn than Angelinia Aronburg, when she had turned her footsteps from general Dargins headquarters, and then rode off with general Evans horse. Her own sufferings and dangers, and the dangers of all who followed in her foot steps, and her longing for some trace of her sister whom she did not believe was slain, all blended in her mind, and with a confused and stunning sense of the unusual risk she unusual risk she was running, in first entering general Mylelzes camp and then leaving it this way, and cutting so far off from the protection of her strong escort. Then there was the parting from every familiar object in going into an army and through a country whichwas very new to her, and from from the armies where she had seen the vivian girls and their friends, the place where she had many thrilling adventures, the beati beautiful forests with which she had rode through innhappier days, riding beside them, every thing as it lay in the clear April Starlight, seemed somehow to speak reproachfully to her and ask her whether she could go from an army like that to take the risk of paying a visit to a Glandelinian army of whom she knew not nor its generals.

But stronger than all was her love for home country and cause, wrought into a parp paroxysm of frenzy and fear by the near approach of a fearful danger. h The child slave whom she had taken along with her was old enough to have walked or ran as fast as she or good enough to have known how to ride a horse just as good, and therefore in a most indifferent case she would have secured a second horse for the boy, but now the bare, thought of putting him out of her reach and on a horse different from hers made her shudder, and therefore while she had him on the saddle in front of her she strained him to her bosom with a convulsive grasp, as she went rapidly forward. The ground of the road was somewhat mddy and therefore the feet of the horse was splashing the mud in all directions, and yet she trembled at every sound, every shaking bush, every moving group of leaves leaves, and every fluttering shadow, and eve y every far off sound sent the blood backward to her heart, and caused her not only to quicken the speed of the horse, but to have one hand on the holster of her revolver. and she wondered within her self at the strength that had seemed to come to her small as she was, for she felt the sensation and the furious riding and the weight of the boy as if they were nothing, and every flutter of fear and excitement seemed to increase the supernatural power that bore her on at the risk of jading her horse badly, while from her lips burst forth in frequently ejaculations, the prayer of a Friend who s above" Lord help. Lord help me bring him saftly to the National lnes. lines."

If the reader were a fugitive like Gertrude Angeline, and had a little child slave which you took under your care with the purpose to bring him or her to the protecting christian lines, and were to ride a fleet horse, and had to go through a large stretch of Glandelinian camps camps, and had only twenty minutes with which to make your escape before any part of the camp was aroused how fast could you urge the horse, and how long could you expect the horse to keep up that awful pace.. and if you did succeed in escaping out of said camp, how many miles could you make in a few brief hours, with the child sleepy at your bosom---the little sleepy head on your shoulder---the small soft arms trustingly holding on to your neck? For no matter how fast the horse was galloping on, the child slept. At first however the nivelty and alarm and the excited cries cries of far distant persuing Glandelinians, and the crack of mskets kept him him awake,, but Angelinia as she rode wildly on so hurriedly repressed every breath or sound, and so assured him that if he were only still she would certainly save him if she had to shoot to kill to do so that he clung quietly round her neck only asking as he found himself sinking to sleep,

" Then little girl I do not need to kee; awake do I!"

"No little boy, there's no danger now, so sleep if you want to."

" But girlie if I do fall asleep, you won't let the Glandelinians get me again will you."

" No ,so may God, and His Blessed Mother help me", said Angelinia Aronburg with a paler cheek cheek and a brighter light in her large dark blue eyes...

" You are sure are you girlie?"

"More than sure" saidthe girl in a voice so determined that it startled herself, for it seemed to her beyond doubts to come from a heavenly spirit who within with something that was no part of her whatever, and therefore the little boy more than reassured dropped his little weary head on her shoulder, and was soon fast asleep. How the touch of those warm arms,the gentle breathing that came in her neck seemed to add fire and spirit to her movements. It seemed to her as if strength poured into her eletric streams of unusual force from every gentle touch and movement of the sleeping confiding child.

So Sublime is the power of the mind over the body, that it can for a time make flesh and nerv nerve as strong as an army holding an unassailable works that is considered impregnable and make the sinews as strong like strings of steel, so that probably even a weak girl or boy can become mighty as a strong man or woman.

Finally the boundaries of the Glandelinian camps, the big groves, where were seen the pickets, the woods, passed by her dizzily, as her horse raced on, she never stoping stopping despite the challenges of the sentries and pickets, and still she went though now closely pursued, leaving one familiar object after another, slackening not, gaining swiftly swiftly on her persuers, pausing not, till the April morning approached with a dark and heave sky, and with rain storbam to come in chilling drops she found herself many a long mile from all traces of the Glandelinian camp or any such familiar object upon the open highway.

In approaching this camp she had the day before come across and passed through a small village near Chickadee Bluff called San Salvador at which had been quite a force of National soldiers- not far from the Aronburg's Run River, and therefore though she had only gone past once she still knew the town and road well, to go thither,to escape across the Aronburgs Run river were her best plans of escape, beyond that, she could only help in God, and His Blessedde gether.

When Landelinian cavalry occassionally began to appear along the highway with that alert perception peculiar to a strange statement of excitement and which seems to be a sort of inspiration, she became aware that her headlong pace and distra distructed air might bring on her remark suspicion and certain death or capture for she did not know whether the Glandelinians under Myletze were different from Manleys or not. she therefore had the horse going much slower and on as rapid a space as she thought might be much wiser, andthe fact, that though these pas parties of Glandelinians looked at her, and yet passed by without even so much as saying a word surprised her greatly. Then thinking to make it waiser wiser yet she allowed the boy to dismount and adjusting her gray uniform coat and hat, (for she was uniformed as a glandelinian scout) she rode on much slower. She had her knapsack with her and in it she had some food fit only for a the lowest soldier, but it was enough enough to stave hunger nevertheless, and in it was also an apple and a few oranges, and three potatoes one of which she used as expedients for quickening the speed of the child, throwing the potato some yards before them, when the boy would run with all his might after it, and this frauss often repeated, carried them over many a half ale mile. Fortunately before she raced from the camp, she had dressed the lad in a girls clothing too having discarded his a child slave garb and therefore the slave was not recognized , the girl also having smeared some yellow ochre over the spot where the child slave identification mark was supposed. to be.

After a while they came to a immense woods, through which murmured a thick big brook. as the child complained of hunger and thirst, she rode up to the brook with him and then dismounting, and hiding the horse she sat down behind a large rock(it having stopped raining, which concealed them from the road, and gave him a gave him a breakfast out of her little package of food which she took out of the knapsack.The boy indeed wondered and grieved that she could not and would not eat, and therefore after a while he put his arms around her neck neck, and tried to wedge some of his bread into her mouth and begged her to " please eat " for his sake, but it seemed to her that the rising in her throat would choke her.

" No, no little boy. I cannot eat a little bite even til I till I know you are safe. we must go on--on untill we come to the river and cross it. The town is not far away. Come lets be going it's starting to rain again." and she got her horse and hurried again nit into the road, and again went on but this time constrained herself to walk along with the horse, and regularly and with an composed air. She was many miles past any neighborhood where a child slave belonging to a Glandelinian master would have been personally known but having climbed a tree before proceeding she had observed that the nearest christian army was about sixty three miles away. for sometimes she feared she would by mere chance happen to come across some partyof Landelinians who might know her even her even despite herdisguise, and therefore she reflected the well known character of the Glandelinians which he heard about who are under Myletze, but if she happened to meet Glandelinians from some other place, then of course she knew she had to do all possible to hide the fact that she was any such a thing as a fugitive. and as she was also properly disfui disguised, as not to be so easily known as to her identy without a most critical survey and as the little boy too boy too was disguised as a little girl it was much easier for her to pass on unsuspected.

Therefore on this presumption she stopped at noon at a large farm house, to rest herself, and to take shterl shelter from the rain(which was pouring fiercely by now) and buy some dinner for herself and the little boy for as the danger seemed to decrease with the distance, the supernatural tension of the nerve seemed lessened

AND SHE found herself bothwary and hungry, wet and cold... both the farmer and his wife were kind and good hearted, and were staunch Angelinians strong for the cause, and they seemed rather pleased and delighted than otherwose with having a little girl and boy to keep them and their own children company for a little while, and therefore accepted without questioning, Gertrudes statement, that se she was a Glandelinian boy scout girl scout in disguise as a boy, that she was going on tward the Abbleannian lines to scout. an hour before noon time she entered the outskirts of the villiage of San Salvador by the Aronburgs Run River weary and foot sore, but still strong in heart. Her first glance was at the river which lay like a Jordan between her and the other side. It was now early spring, and the river was swollen but not yet turbelent, but great cakes of floating ice were swining heavilybto and fro in the waters. Owning to the caved in wreck of two bridges the ice had been lodged and detained in large quantities and therefore the ice had packed like a walled up jam against the ruins of the two bridges one cake over another thus forming a barrier which lodged and formed beyond it an undulating raft filling up the whole river, and extending from shore to shore.

Gertrude Angeline stood for a moment contemplating this unfavorable aspect of things which she saw at once would prevent any kind of boat from being rowed across, and then turned into a small country house tomake a few inquiries. The hostess who was buzy in cooking dinner for her own children stopped with a big spoon in her hand as Gertrudes sweet and plaintive voice adr addressed her.

" What do you want little girl?" she asked.

" Is there not any kind of boat or any means whatever to get a person across this stream now?" she said.

" No indeed" said the woman who indeed was the only a occupant of the villiage" The Nationals duringtheir retreat from Chickadee Bluff have destroyed all boats and bridges." The look of dismay and disappointment seen in Gertrudes face struck the woman and she said inquiringly;

"Is it be that you desire to get over! anything wrong--anyboy anybody sick. You seem mighty anx anxious."

" Seeing by a flag on the wall that the woman was was an Abbleannian Gertrude said;

" I've got a child slave whom I kidnapped from general laner Myletzes camp last not and I've rode quite a distance since midnight and all morna morning to day in hopes to get across the river."

" Well that is certainly unlucky" said the woman whose motherly sympathies were much aroused. " I'm really con cornearned for you, James," she called from the window tward a man she saw standing by a broken down bridge. The man soon appeared at the door.

" I say James" said the woman" is there any ruins of th that bridge which a person could take the chances of getting across in case of a grave necessity?"

It might be providing you got courage enough to take the risk if it is prudent and not a suicide" said the man. " But on the opposite side there are Glandelinians too belonging to a portion of Myletzes army for it has been advancing all morning and fast too I'll be bound. I could see the head of the column a while ago. But there's nothing to fear from that Glandelinian army, little girl that's why I and my wife and children remain even thoughthe rest fled from the town."

" Tyers is a bridge over there" said the woman pointing," that you can take the chances of crossing if you'll risk it. But just now you'd better sit down and wait untill the Glandelinian army passes by. That's a sweet little girl you've rescued " added the woman offering him a piece of bread with jam on it.

But the child was totally exhausted, and refused saying ;

" I'm tired, not hungry."

" Poor fellow he is not used to walking, and I've hurried him on so to get here" said Gertrude.

" Will take him into this room" said the woman opening a door which led into it, and where there stood a comfortable bed. On the opposite side is another door which led to the river and the woman directed the girl to it saying;

" In case persuers arive, and you see them get out by this door, and across the river. I'll be watching out for them and warn you if they come."

Gertrude laid the weary boy upon the bed, and held his hands in hers untill he was fast asleep. For her there was no rest. as a fire in her bones, the thought of the persuing Glandelinians urged her on, and she gazed with longing eyes on the sullen surging waters, that lay between her and liberty, and then she gazed at thebridge it indicated by the woman which too was a wreck. Here we must take leave of her for the present, to follow the course of army and her persuers.

Though general Dargin had promished the colonel that dinner should be hurried on the table, yet it was soon seen through certain reasons, and asthe thing as often before seen that it sometimes requires more than one to make a bargain. So although the order was fairly given out inthe hearing of the colonel, and carried to theslave cooks by at least half a dozen boy and girl scout and other messengers, they had no full supplies and a boy had to go a mile to the wagon train to bring the necessary things and then something happened here that delayed matters.

For some singular reason some some sort of an impression seemed to reign among most of the child slaves slaves generally that General Mylelze for some reason or other was not in a hurry to have his army to advance; that not far from the town of San Salvador there was a large christian army forming for battle,, and one either and neither were any of his generals particularly disobliged by delay; and also it was wonderful wa what a number of scouting parties went out, and what a number of counter movements of the armies were made from one section to another,, and also what wonder it was to see so many counter accidents occur constantly such as an explosion among a wagon trail train, and so on to retard the course of things. One luckless scouting party of three hundred Glandelinian officers of he and high rank went out on a long distance scouting tour and something happened to contrive to bring back only a few out of the three hundred, and then scouting parties had to be reformed de novo, and these had to advance with due care due care and formality, some of the generals watching everything, and making their plans with the most dogged precision, answering shortly to all suggestions of haste, that they were not going to be reckless to help no one's desires at all.

One scouting party rode as far as two miles north of San Salvador, and encountered a Concentinian cavarly squadron, and they had to make a fair race for life, another column of Glandelinian soldiers on horseback was struck by a column of Domdobian cavarly and precipitated into the path of events, and there was from time to time giggling news brought into the child slave camps that Mylelzes lowest generals were very uneasy about the situation, and that they could not sit still on their horses at all;but were riding back and forth, and stalking through corn fields and through the grain patches wondering how it could be that though the town of San Salvador San Salvador seemed unoccupied by soldiers how all these disasters could come about.

"Serves any of these Glandelinian generals perfectly right," said Annie, indignantly" No matter why they fight in the Glandelinian cause, it may be considered that they are fighting against as Holy a Cause as Fighting against the Church and they will all be worse than uneasy one of these days, if they do not mend their ways. God will be sending for them all and then see nus they'll look. We all know what Christ said about those that harm little children in any way, and yet the Glandelinians do the worst things to us, no matter what army we are in."

"All of the Glandelinians generals or soldiers will all go to torment, and no mistake about it either for even holding us as slaves" said one little boy.

"They all deserve it" said Annie, grimly" The Glandelinians have broken millions of hearts--I tell you, by tearing us children away from our rightful parents to make us slaves, we do not belong to any Glandelinian as we are stolen children, and God help them and yet if the Glandelinians happen to win the war then I-" she finished stopping with a fork in her hands IST It's like what I read in revelations; souls of women and children under the ground calling on the Lord for vengeance on these Glandelinians, and bye and bye the Lord will hear them---so he will and there is no telling what will happen."

This Annie was very much revered by all child slaves; and even others who knew her, and always was listened to with open mouth mouth, and the dinner now being fairly sent in, every slave even while eating their's in their own tent was at full leisure to gossip with her with her, and to listen to her remarks.

"""""Every Glandelinian general or soldier, and every one in that nation will be burned up forever, and no mistake either" said Jem James.

"I'll be glad to see it too, and I don't mean maybe" said Jack.....

"" "" Children, children" suddenly said a voice that made them all start. "It was Jannie herself" who had just at this mment come in and stood listening to the conversation at the door. Boys and girls " she continued I'm afraid you do not know or do not care what you are saying at all. To be in awful torment forever and ever is a fearful thing, it's awful to think of it. It is a mrtal sin for us to wish or desire that on any one."

"Yesx a but these Glandelinians are soul drivers"said James. " and no one can help wishing it on to them for the Glandelinians are so awful wicked. They do not care what becomes of our souls. Therefore no one can tell us what we should wish or desire."

"Don't nature herself cry out against the Glandelinians" said Annie. "Did not the Glandelinians always tear the sucking baby right off his mothers breast, and run away to their own country and sell him, and even the little children as is crying and holding on by her clothes, don't they pull them away and sell them to men who have no right right to them as they belong to their own nation and parents.Don't they tear brother and sister apart so they never see each other till they go into the other world" said Annie beginning to cry," when it's just taking the very life out of them. And don't they be awful mean to the slaves, and kill them in the slave houses and deprive them of all fun children have, and not even allow them to sleep the proper hours, and work too long and beat them to death if they are too sick to work, and all the while these Glandelinians don't feel bad about it,and don't they drink and smoke, and take it uncommon easy Lord if the devil don't get them then I don't believe there are such creatures." and Annie covered her face with her apron, and began to sob in good earnest.

"Pray for them that spitefully use you, the good book says" said Jannie sadly.

"Pray for them" said Annie. " I can't pray for them. It's too touch to do so. We are no not christians enought to pray for our enemies our enemies. The Nationals ought not to give the Glandelinians any qu quarter no matter why they fight."

It is nature, Annie, and Nature is strong" said Jannie' but God's grace is much stronger, besides you and all others ought sure to think what an awful state the souls of these poor foolish Glandelinians are in that will do all these cruel things. We all ought to thank God that you and we ain't like them, Annie. I'm sure I'd rather be sold to the worse kind of masters a thousand times over, than to have all these foolish Glandelinians have to answer for."

"So would I" said James. Gracious wouldn't we catch it good and not " Jack.

Jack shrugged his shoulders and gave an acquiescent whistle whistle.

I'm glad Master Federal did not sell to me Manley as I feared he would" said Jannie That hurt me more than anything else it did. Maybe it might have been natural to him, but it would have come desperate hard on me, but I've seen my new master already today and I begin to feel sort of reconciled to the Lord's will now. Federal could not help himself , he was afraid Manley would get me away from him, and therefore he did right. But I'd give anything a just the same to see my folks once more."

Just at this moment an officer rode up to the tent and Jannie was summoned to general Mylelze's headquarters. Jannie came for she knew she must obey, and as she was ushered in, the general said in his natural way;

Slave, I want you to notice that I'm giving these prisoners into the care of an officer, and which are to train to you later, and if you prove by your showing that you will remain on the spot when ever any of my officers want you ,you'll soon be exchanged to the National lines for a prisoner they got over there. But though you are a slave mark ye, do no work that I alone do not command. And as long as you do never attempt to run away from the army, I'll allow you to go anywhere inside the camp you like without hinderance on the part of any soldier. But you must be within your tent before taps hour at night. So now you may go anywhere you like kid."

"Thank you Master " said Jannie.

"and mind yourself" said general Dargin who was present and don't come it over any of us with any of your childish pranks, for if you do you'll never have the chance to be exchanged. But we want to h show you slaves that we trust you here even though they don't in Manleys army, the dogs."

"General said Jannie-- -and she stood very straight I was just two years old when I was stolen from my parents, right from her very arms. and now I just ask you Master I have been a slave since then and have I ever broken sword for any of my masters good or bad, or gone contrary to them, even though they know I'm for the Christians and their cause heart and soul."!

Wicked as he may be general Mylelze was fairly overcome and the tears rose rose to his eyes.

"My good little girl" said he The lord knows but you say but the truth,' and if I'm able to help it no other Glandelinian army will ever have you again, and all the world shouldn't buy you. You'll be exchanged never fears."

"and sure as I'm a general too said Dargin, the Nationals will be allowed to redeem you by giving back a prisoner for you as soon as it can be possibly done. Sir she said to the officer who was to be her slave master or overseer" take good account of how she is cared for and treated, and if anything goes wrong let me know."

"Yes sir I will said the officer I'll make her worth while and bring her p plum plimp and strong so the Nationals will know the slaves are treated good in one insurrecto army at least."

"If you take the best care of her, I'll make it for your advantage" said general Dargin.

Of course said the officer all is equal for me, rather take good care of a slave then ruin them as Manley and his confederates do. All I want is that the slave returns my good treatment of her, that's all any of us Glandelinians want I reckon."

Yet some how or other both Mylelze felt both annoyed and degraded by the familiar impudence of tyis this officer, and yet both saw the absolute necessity of seeing that all child slaves in their armies recievesthe best of care. The more hopelessly sordid and senseless did he appear the greater became Dargins dream of his recapturing Angelinia Aronburg and the child slave she took along with her, and of course the greater his motive for detaining him from the persuit by every male artifice. He therefore graciously smiled, assented, chattered familiarly and did all he could to make the time pass imperceptibly. At two oclock in the afternoon James and Annie brought up the horses to the post apparently greatly refreshed and invigorated bythe scamper of the morning. It was now raining but the colonel was bound to take up the persuit nevertheless nevertheless, whether it is nevertheless or not. James was there with an abundance abundance of zealous and ready officiousness. As the colonel approached, he was boasting in flourishingly style to Annie of the evident and eminent success of the so called operat operation now that he had finally come to heem.

I suppose your master do not keep any dogs' said the colonel thoughtfully, as he he prepared to mount.

"Hundreds of them" said James decidedly There's Tige he is a roaring lion, and besides thateverry officer he keeps a dog or hound."

"Pooh" said the colonel-----and he said some t something else too with regard to said dogs, and so called Christian dogs" at which Annie herself remarked.....

" If you are a respectful Glandelinian officer you will not swear and blaspheme like that in front of little girls."

" But your master don't keep no dogs for truk tracking out runaway child slaves" James knew exactly what he meant but he kept on a look of earnest and desperate simplicit simplicity.

" He keeps all kinds of dogs I tell you that smell all around sharp, and many of them had practice but what good are they if you have no cloth belonging to the fugitive to trace by. Every one of them are desperate dogs, and go at most anything if you do get em started. But the fugitive is not a slave but a christian child slave kidnapper. Here Nero " he called whistling to a bo big lazy looking dog with overgrown ears who came pitching tumultously toard them.

" You go hang yourself" said the colonel(to the dog) getting up. " Come girl and boy tumble up now. You are to help us and indicate to the soldiers who the spy is and what she has."

" She has herself" said James to himself. " Why should she not also have him!"

Both tumbled up accordingly but James dexteriously contrived to tickle Annie as he did so which caused the girl to split out into a screaming fit of laughter greatly to the colonels anger and excitement and who made a swish at him with his military staff(enough to make you laf e)

" I'm astonished at you "nnie" said James, with awful gravity. " This is a serious business Annie, so you must not be making guns of the soldier. It ain't no way to help the colonel---devil" thevlatter word under his breath.

" I'm going to take this road that goes along and into the river said " said the colonel decidedly, after they had come to the bounderies of the big camp" I know the way down all of these rodes, and all fugitives makes tracks usually for roads down a river so they can leap across in case of hard pressee....."""""""

" Certainly, certainly, certainly" said James" T"at is a good idea. The colonel hit the right idea this time. Now this road meets with another a little beyond the river a pike road, and a corderoy road through a sort of bog land--which does the colonel meant to take.""."".....""

Annie(Op Orphan Annie) looked up innocently at James surprised at hearing this new geographical fact, but instantly confirmed what he said, by a vehement reiteration.

" Of course " said jam s James I'D rather be inclined to imagine that the christian spy would surely take the road along side this here river, but as so many Glandelinian cavarly pass down and up here it is the least traveled by any christian peoples....."

The colonel notwithstanding(providing he is able to stand) that he was a very old bird(if not an old hen) and naturally inclined to be suspicious of chaff was rather perplexed by this view of the case.

" ' I can bet any money the two of you slavies are the biggest liars in the world" " he said contemptu contemplatively, as he pondered for a moment.

The tone which was some what pensive and reflected appeared to amuse Annie immensely and some how or other he drew a little to he behind and shook so with laughter as to almos almost run a great risk of falling of her horse, while James's face was as immovably composed into the most doleful gravity.

" Of course" he continued" The colonel can do as he pleases, he can go down the road along side the river, if he thinks it is more likely to do so--it all up to him and not us. But now when I think of it more accurately I think the other road is the best, because the Glandelinian cavarly do not travel on it much."

" At that any fugitive whether it be a slave of a christian spy would naturally take the most lonesom p lonesome path" said the colonel to one of his officers, and not minding the remak remark of the lad.

" There is no way to say" said James" all girls are particular whether they be christian spies, or other fugitives, they never for on oith do what ever a person thinks they will did, and it most generally the contrary contrary thing. All girls is naturally made contrary, and so if any one would believe or imagine that a goil spy would go od dow down one road it is positively certain to be best for the perser to go the other, and then you are sure to find them. Now my private opinion is,that Angelinia Aronburg girl took the river road, so I think we had better take the other."

Indeed this strange and prof ound and profound view of the female se sex did not seem to dispose in any part clar of the colonels intention taking the river road, and therefore he announced most decidedly that he was going to take the other, and asked James when they c should come to it.

" About one half a mile ahead" said James giving a wink to Annie withthe eye which wa x was on Annie's I side of the head,.; and he added gravely;" But I have studied on the matter matter(smatter Pop) and I'm quite clear that it is not best for us to go that way. I have never been over it at all and it is desperate lonesome, and we might lose our way---we might meet with a body of National cavarly especially the most dreaded of them all(Dondoblians) and then we'd come to the Lord knows where."

" Nevertheless we whether we are to meet with the Nationals or not I'm going that a way" said the colonel. ' I fear no christian soldiers no matter what horse they be."

" But the christian soldiers are no horses horses" said James.

" Getting fresh are you slavy. Well I did not say they were horses. I man norse men."

" Now as I think of it I hear some one say that that road it fenced up by a strong christ ian position and down by the river there is a battet battery that would sweep us all to heaven ain't it ,nnie."

f course Annie was not so certain she only heard it told that some big army of Nationals was there but she had never seen it as this was the first time she had ever had the chance to go outside a Glandelinian camp so fur. In short she was strictly non-committal. The colonel accustomed to strike the balance of probabilities between lies and jokes, of greater and lesser enormity thought that it was best to take the road that run somedist ince aforesaid aforesaid from the river. The mention of the thing he thought he per porceived was involuntary on James part at first, and his confused attempts to change his mind and cause him to go the other way beset down to a desperate lying on second thoughts as being very unwilling to implicate Angelinia Aronburg, Aronburg, not that he cared whether she was captured or not, but he had heard so much of her that he dre- dreaded her more than he did the most brutal master for he knew what she was at the gun and trigger when she was hard pressed.

When therefore James inclinated the colorderoy road, the colonel and his column of two hundred men plunged briskly briskly upon it, followed by James and Annie. Now this road in fact built in a sort of bridge fashion over a really most dangerously(probably bottomless mud bog) was an old one, that had formerly been a sort of throughfare to another section of the North bend of the river but abandoned for many years as to the dangerous nature of the quagmire. The road was somewhat safe to travel by day, but not at night, for if any he happened to step off the road in the dark, well let him try and find bottom to the bog if he lives long enough. It was open for about an hours ride over this extensive bog which was nearly six miles in width and after that it ended into a sort of woods beyon beyond beyond on which the other side was another bog of quick sand. James knew this perfectly well---indeed the road had been so long destroyed at the edge of the quicksand bog that Annie had never heard of it. He therefore rode with an air of apparent dumb bobbleshion only groaning and crying out occassionally that it was desperate rough ,and bad for his horse.

" Now I'm giving you warning said the colonel' I know the nature of you slaves and you can t get me to turn off by this here road with all your fussing, and one thing I don't care a rap about your old horse so please shut up, and watch your step so you don' don't go down into this bottomless sea of muck.""

The colonel will have it his own way" said James with rueful submission at the same time winking most portentously to Annie, whose delight was now near the ex-plosive point providing it is sharp no enough) James was in wonderful spirits--and pretended to keep a very brisk look out at all points of the shore of the bog----at one time exclaiming he saw a party of Dondoblans at a distance; at another he saw a form like like that of a little girl on the top of one some distant hill, or calling to Annie "If that was not the fugitive down near the edge ofthe bog sinking in always making these exclimamat ons exclamations in some rough or crayy craggy way where the sudden quickening of speed was a special inconvience to all partiers parties concerned; and thus keeping the colonel and all his soldiers in a state of constant coo commotion and excitement. After riding about an hour this way the whole party made a swift and tumultous descent intothe woods, and after going a short way almost rode plump into the quick sand which was about twenty feet across. Not a sould soul was in sight but as the new bog stood conspiciously and plainly square across their path, it was evident that their journey in that direction had reached a decided final..

"""""What did I tell the colonel" said James with an air of injured innocence. " Ho How does these strange Glandelinian soldiers expect to know about a part of the christian country.....!""""""

" You dirty little devil for a slave" said the colonel putting on a scowl and you knew all about this.

" Yes and I told you I know only I did not know about the quick sand on the other side. I telled you it might be shut upalso by a christian campand you would not believe it, and there a camp right here as I see it but it has been abandoned. I said I did not expect to get through, and Annie heard me."

It was somewhat all too true to be d s disputed, and the unlucky Glandelinian colonel, had to keep down his wrath as best as he could, and all three " right Faced" and took up their line of march for the other road, but now following along the woods, and no one desired to take a second trip across the bog.... In donsequen ce of all the various delays and of having to meet with parties of mounted Abbieunnian cavarly four times which they defeated however it was three quarters or more of a day after Angelinia Aronburg had laid the child to sleep in the tavern of San Salvador that the party of rebels came riding into the same place at a tyu thundering ga l gallop. Angelinia Aronburg had standing by a window looking at in another direction, when her quick eye caught a glimpse of them. The colojel was only two yards in advance of the soldiers. At this crisis the colonels hat blew off, and drawing suddenly black Gertrude aimed her pistol and fired rapidly as the whole train swept by the window and dismounted a soldier with every shot. A thousand lives seemed to be concentrated in that one moment to Angelinia Aronburg. Her room opened by a side door to a prtion of the river. Seeing the rebels trying to surround the building, and not wishing to waste her ammunition right so soon she caught p the child, and sprang down the steps toard it. The colonel and half a dozen of the nearest Glandelinians caught sight of her just as she was disappearing down the bank, and urging his horse forward, and calling loudly to the soldiers to follow he rode after her like a hound after a deer. A man on horseback always has the lead by yards per second, and realizing this at first she did not know what to do. In that dizzy moment her feet to her did not hardly seem to touch ground and for a moment brought her to the waters edgebut close by the wrecked bridge. Right on behind came galloping with a roar fully thirty Glandelinians armed with long lances, and nerved with streng th such as God gives only to the desperate, with one cry she put the boy behind her and drawing both pistols fired quickly and steadily bringing down fully the whole thirty Glandelinians and horses without a single pause, stunning the colonel and the survivors. Then she grab ed the boy and vaulted sheer over the turbid current bythe shore to the still remaining portion of the bridge. It was a most desperate leap, impossible to anything but madness and despair, and the colonel and all the others instinctively cried out and lifted up their hands as she did it.

A tremendous shower of long lances flew past her as the huge bridge fragment on which she alighted pitched and creaked as her weight came on it, but after returning the fire and bring down the colonels horse, she staid there not a moment. With desperate energy not paying any attention to the wild cries of the surprised Glandelinians h she leaped to anothher and still another portion of the broken bridge, stumbling, leaping slipping--springupward again amid a fresh shower of javilins and bullets none of which struck her however..soon her shoes were gone, her stockings were cut from her feet, while now a lance struck her in the shoulder and another in the left leg, but still she kept on while blood marked every step, but she saw nothing, felt nothing, till almly as in a dream she reached the other shore, and another girl heroine who appeared to be Jennie Turner helped a her across the rest of the bridge. h Then as the Glandelinians tried to swim their horses across Jennie Turner took her stand behind a tree and fired so rapidly that the Glandelinians went back cursing and swearing.

" You are certainly brave now and no mistake Gertrude" said Jennie. " I knew you to be nervy but what you did not breake all records. I never even seen the Vivian Girls do a stunt like that yet."

Gertrude recognized the voi e of Jennie and said;

" Thank god I saved this little boy. Help me--please Jennie, help me--- do save him---do take him hide him before they come across the pontoon bridge" said Gertrude p p pointing in the direction where the rebels were moving nib nimbly over the pontoon.

Why what's this!" said Jennie. " Why if it ain't general Roswell Buster Johnstons little boy."

" Good if it is his child. This boy. They'll get him yet. There they come those Glandelinians" said she pointing to the pontoon. " Oh let's hurry."

So we must said Jennie determinedly as she kindly drew out the lance from her shoulder. " Besides you are a right good brave girl. I like grit when ever it I see it, and I'll tell Violet, and her sisters about it, when Ireturn to general or Emperor Vivians army."

When they had gone a short ways, Jennie paused before the pontoon.

Knowing the strength of the current and that if the pontoon was even slightly damaged it would be swept away she decided upon a plan at once. It was accomplished, a big stone right against the weakest point and in fifteen minutes fully a hundred Glandelinians horses and all were floundering among ice and in the water, filling the air with curses and blasphemies.

" The best thing we can do" said Jennie now is to go there" said she pinting to a large white hor house which stood by itself off the main street of another villiage, Let's go there, for even though they are non combatants they are Nationals and there's no kind of danger but they'll help us both, and your wounds need tending to. You are growing good and weak already and you are bleeding badly.

" The Lord bless you" said Gertrude earnestly.

" The Lord bless us in our undertaking rather' said Jennie. " What' I've d n done is what you've done if I had been in the same scrap."

" And of surely do you think it will be safe there?"

" Certainly Gertrude. They are all armed and a o portion of some National army is there. Come now let's go along like sensible girls we are before the Glandelinians cross the river, for they are attempting to swim across for fair now. You have done a brave deed and deserve general Roswells gratification for all me."

As Gertrude was weak from her wounds Jennie took the little boy and folded him to her bosom and both walked firmly and swiftly away but Gertrude limped a great deal.

General Roswell Johnston now maybe willthink a lot more of you than he ever did for by chance you got away with his own little boy for I recognize him said Jennie. But often you have caught the Vivian Girls in bad fix and always saved them. Somehow however I never saw the like to day. Why to try and get over that bridge is simple suicide and yet you made it. Besides it is the most desperate deed you ever done."

Gertrude did not say anything further. The colonel and the survivors of his soldiers besides Annie and James had stood a perfectly amazed spectator of this scene, till Gertrude had been rescued by the others when he turned a blank inquiring look on James and Annie.

" who ever she is she is a tolerable dangerous girl" said James looking with horror at the number of dead and wounded Glandelinian soldiers, about thirty seven of them.

But that was a tolerable fair stroke of business" said Annie.

" The girl has about seventeen devils in her I believe " said the colonel looking ruefully at his dead horse. How like a wild cat she jumped over the ruins of that bridge and shot my men down. A cruckshot that breaks the record. Yet if she had not fired, neither would b we as it was not the custom of us Glandelinians being under Mylette to fire at a girl. But this time it could not be helpled. She shot a third of my column down."

" Well now" said James, scratching his head" I hope the Master will excuse us trying to continue the pursuit across the river. don't think I feel nervy enough that way since she is so dangerous. " and James gave a hourse croaking in his voice. for he certainly was horrified.

You are a a scardy cat" said the colonel with a growl as he ordered the persuit across the pontoon bridge and which ended in disaster as aforesaid.

But you may go back if you like. I'll send a couple of Soldiers to escort you so you'll not take advantage of being so far from camp and run away."

" Lord Bless you colonel we can not help being afraid" said James looking wit with eyes dilated with horror upon the scene. And she to looked so dangerous her eyes flashing, while she fired so rapidly; and then how curious she looked, a leaping and springing over the fragments of the wrecked bridge and if she was a grasshopper; the bridge a swaying and groaning--and only to see her stop chos in a while and fire back as your men hurled their lances at her. Spring; Lord how she did it" and James and Annie certainly did look more serious about it than the survivoing a surviving soldiers.

Well You can go back here said the colonel ordering a couple of soldiers to escp escort them. They then sent off up the bank under the escort andwere on their horses in a moment.

" Good evening colonel" said James with much gravity. I expect general Mylette will be very anxious about is by now and would not hear of us riding down after so danger ous a girl spy as that" and with a sobre face both started off with the two soldiers, their shouts coming faintly on the wind, Angelina Aronburg made her desperate crossing of the broken bridge across the river just in the dusk of twilight. The gray mist of that unusually warm April rising slowly from the ice checked river,, enveloped her as she disappeared with Jennie Turner beyond the opposite shore, and though the Glandelinians tried three times to cross the stream with their horses, the swollen current and flounering ice and manytroops of ga Nationals appearing on the bank to oppose them presented a hopeless barrier between them and their pursuers. he colonel therefore whose name we'll s say is Francis ,older slowly and discontentedly returned to the big tavern to ponder further what was to be done. The woman opened to him the door of a large room covered with a bare but cleanly scrubbed floor poil carpet where in the center stood a large table with a very shining gray oil cloth, large upholstered chairs of magnificent make with some religious church statues on the large mantle shelf above a very dimply smoking grate a long bench extended its length by the chimney and here the colonel ordering more rooms for the soldiers who could occupy the place sat down to mediate meditate on the inability of human hopes and happiness in general.

" What did I want to go after the little child slave she kidnapped for anyway" he said to himself" That I should have got myself treed like a rain surrounded by wolves as I am this day and to have so many men shot down by that wild cat spy.!" and the colonel relieved himself by repeating over a very unselected imprecations on everything in general, including himself, and yletze and all slaves too. Then all of a sudden he was startled by the loud and grim dissonate voice of a man who was apparently dismounting at the door. The colonel after hesitating for a moment hurried to the window; for he believed he recognized the voice.

" By the name of Neptune if this ain't good luck for me now, even to what I have heard the Nationals call Pron Providence" said Holder. Ill do believe by my own life that is the old child slave trader who used to have charge of the Hell-Mell-Pell Hell child slave prison at Norma Catherine. I'll bet $10,000 to 1 it is James Holden."

Holden hastened out. Standing by the door outside and conversing by the same spot with two soldiers was a brawny muscular man, fully six feet and four inches and then some in height and unusually broad for a man even of his size; so broad that he almost seemed top heavy(maybe he was, that his legs hardly supported his body. He was dressed in a coat of some kind of bearskin made with the brown hair outward, and wity wity with this man and his form he had a shaggy fierce bear like appearance, perfectly in keeping with the whole air of his very physiognomy. In the head and face there was every appr appearance of brutal and unhesitating violence to break all records for cruelty. Indeed he had the appearance of some sort of a very agile bulldog and dragon combined; walking about with a mans coa coat and hat. He was accompanied by another companion in many respects an exact comparision to himself but slightly smaller in size. Indeed again our ready could fancy a female bulldog but he was short but equally as stout, but somewhat lithe nevertheless and cat like in his motions, and despite his bulldog face had a pe pearing mousing expression about his keen eyes with which every fe feature of his eyes and face rather seemed sharpanted sharpened into ferocity such as only a demon hms. He had a thin long nose that stretched out as if it was eager to bore into every body's business, and into the nature of all things in general, his sleek thin black bro n brown hair was long and bobbed with the front sticking eagerly forward, and all his motions and evolutions expressed a dry cautious acuteness. The great man then went insi inside at another door followed by his companion and coming to the bear demanded and drink and was soon pouring out into his glass a big tumbler half full of " happy water" and drank it down faster than we would faster without a word. The smaller companion stood tiptoe and pitting his big head first to one side and then to the other and snuffing considerably in thedirections of the various bottles, ordered at last" the strongest drink you got sir, and mind you no weak stuff or trouble comes" in a thin but gruff fearless world and heaven defying voice, and with an air of great circumspection.

When poured out he took it and looked at it with a sharp complacent air I like a man who thinks he has done the right thing and hit the proper nail on the head, and proceeded to dispose of it as if he was afraid a bottle full would not be enough.

Well now who would have thought that I would recieve such good luck. Why James Beldon how are you?" said Holden coming forward and extending his hand to the bigger man.'

" The devil get you!i" was the civil reply. What brought you here colonel Holden my cousin.? I thought you was in Manleys command.'

The other man who bore the name of a very familiar man known as " Boobhead" James Scanlin; instantly stopped pouring out another glass full of whiskey, and poking his unusually ugly head forward looked shrewdly and fiercely on the new acquaintance as a strange animal that has both a tigers and bull dogs features looks for a certain prey or some other possible object of pursuit.

' I say Cousin Beldon this is the luckiest thing in the world for me to see you not so far away from Vivian Hickey. I'm in a devil of a fix, in a bottomless mudhole to make the right expression, and you must help me out."

" Ugh. Ah, likely enough' grunted his complacent acquaintance gulping down a glass of bra brandy, not rather gulping , but pouring it down like in a funnel anybody may be sure of Heeding help when ever he meets any one he knows. What's the blue now. Did the Vivian Girl Contapeaded string you"!

" You've got a friend here?" said Colonel Holden, looking doubtfully at " Boobhead" partner or relative perhaps?"

" Yes I have. Here Scanlin here is the colonel I was sad to dela wit, in a grat child slave trade(his) that it was in with at Vivian Hickey."

" I am pleased (his) with his acquaintance to (his, most said companion(his) said " Boobhead" thrusting out a long stout arm with a hand more like the claw ofa grizzly bear but probably somewhat larger. " Colonel) (his) Holden I believe.'

" The same sir" said the colonel" and now gentlemen seeing as we have met so fortunately, I think I'll stand up to a sort of treat in this parlor. So now Mr said he to the man at the bar"get us all the booze you can sell and plenty of the real strong stuff, and cigars and we'll have a bloe out, providing the Nationals do not come and blow us out too."

Behold them, the gas lighted, the fire hightened to a bright glowing point in the grate, and our three " excellent northiels" seated round a small table well spread with all that had been ordered by the colonel notwithstanding that the two others were slightly drunk already. Therefore the colonel began a most pathetic recital of his unusual troubles. Beldon closed his mouth tightly with a lighted cigar between smoking like an exploding volcano and listened to him with the gruff and surly attention of a bull dog looking for a cat. " Boobhead" listened with the same dogged attention though some times he almost poked his sharp nose and chin almost into Holdens face. The conclusion of it appeared to amuse them both immen immensely and both perked up their lips with an air of in internal enjoyment and shook their shoulders and sides in silence.

" Sothan you are fairly out of luck ain't you" said the smaller man almost laughing in his face" He, he,heyou are kidding us, dreaming,you must be out of your head my friend. No little goil could cross a bridge like that under fire. what did you dri drink this morning!"

But then as the old lady, and the two kids of hers, and even the bar tender and others testified with Holden theythad to believe it but thought it most unusual.

" well she fairly sewed you up then." he said. ' anddone it most neatly too. But to cross a dangerous bridge like that seemed suicide. I can cannot account for it."

" this here young girl spy Angelinia Aronburg makes lots of trouble for every Clandell irian army said the colonel dolefully. ' I have heard much of her but this was the first time I ever had an engagement with her."

' If we could get girl spies into our cause just like that we would not need to care what happens then for whatever it would be" said Scanlin. " I tell you Holden it would be about the greatest improvement on your part and others I know about to leave such alone untill you know them. Never pursue them without proper escorts who knows those dare devil fire eating battle wild cats.' and " Boobhead" par patronized his peculiar peculiar joke by a quiet introductory snig le snigger.

' Just no' said the colonel' I never could see into it that she was so dangerous, or so quick on the gun--these girl spies we hear so much is a heap of trouble to all the Clandellinian armies that know of their prene presence, and we would think how had you could think how most Clandellinian Soldiers would be glad to keep clear of either, the ones known as Angelina Riches, and Jennie turner, besides Angelinia Aronburg. And the more trouble they cause us the more chances we have to losing our grand and holy cause. And the more trouble they make with us, the more good for nothing they are, as a general thing the tighter they stick to their dangerous adventures. "

" Well Colonel Holden" said " Boobhead" pass the whiskey". Yes sir you say just what I feel, and what I always have. Now I had an encounter in the early days of this war with those Vivian Girl Princesses but only Ones, even when I was in the child slave trade--dangerous little spies and wild cats they are too, and quite considerable smart-- and one day I managed to surprise them, and I just fastened them down near a dangerous geyser and they escaped, and I got caught, and they fight up and saves my life, even at the risk of their own even after what I did to them. Lord you ought to see how they went on at my peril. Why they seemed to value my life more than their's and they were not making believe either, cried about it afterwards they did, brought soldiers to cure my burns, and lepped around as if I had been her their best friend in stead of an enemy : it was really droll to think on it, but nevertheless as the cause goes, and they are on the side of the foe, I still am their enemy nevertheless, but just the same I'd cheat Manley out of his efforts to capture them any day."

" Well just so with me" said Colonel Holden last summe summer down on the Gulfbeam stuck I was persuaded by what appeared to be the Vivian Girls sure enough, and despite their beauty their eyes looked as bright as any girls, but to come to look at I found they were desperately desirous of capturing me at any risk. Fact is, not knowing it their horses rode plump into a quick sand bog. Well you see I being more human than others I at the risk of capture went to their rescue, for I thought there was no harm in just throwing them a rope and pulling them from their horses before they too got caught and not saying nothing, but Skeskip as soon as they were in safe, and I got them easily out of the peril, but some to be taken a prisoner was out of the question. So it was they allowed me my freedom. But just the same as long as the war continues I'm afraid friendship between us is on No use."

" Bah" said Beldeh Beldeh who had listened to these kind of stories with ill repressed disgust Both of you are shiftless in that number, too easy with the National dogs, the dirty christian dogs if I'm pursued by any one no matter who it be I won't cut up no such shines mark ye."

" Indeed what would you do then in my case " said Scanlin briskly.

" What could I do why I'll let them perish perish no matter wh what danger they are in and once I happen to gata catch to those Vivian Girls I'll just walk up and put my fist into their faces and bat to one of them or all of them look here now you little christian christian dogs if you say one word to me I'll cut your insides out alive. I won't hear one word not even the beginning of a ord word: and also I'll say to them I'm going to sell every one of you dogs seperately, to the hardest master I can find; and though you are sisters blood body and soul you'll not belong to each other at all; and you have no kind of business with with one another. I'm going to sell each one of you first rate mind outyou No you and don't any of you dare to cut up any kind of monkey business about it or I'll make you wish you had never been born. I'll tell you they'll see it ain't no play to do anything against my will when I get hold. I'll make them wish they were dead, and if any one of them gives a yelp why I'll--" and Mr Beldon brought down his fist with a thump that fully explained the rhetor."

That is what any one may called good right emphasis with a capitol B" said Scanlon poking Colonel Holden in the side and go n going into one of his beautiful Bulldog grins. " Ain't Mr Beldon peculiar! Ha! ha!He I tell you what colonel He has some accounts to settle with them little guttersnips. They don set his big child slave pridch on fire and burned it to the ground with the purpose to liberate the slaves and got away with them Say Beldon, I'll bet you'll make them little guttersnips understand for all kids no matter what kind they are can be scared if any one only tried it.They don't never have thealighrest doubt in your meaning Beldon. If you ain't the king of devils Beldon you are his twin brother, I'll say that for you good and properly..... "

Beldon received the compliment with becoming modesty and began to look as affable as was consistent with his dogglish dragon nature, more like a dogfaced dragon who ate up a person and then felt as had done the right them to be complimented for it.

The colonel who had been imbibing very freely of the staple of the evening began to feel a sensible elevation and enlargement of his moral moral faculities----a phenomenom not unusual with Clandellinian soldiers of general Mylestrea army under similar circumstances.

" Well now Beldon " he said" You really think you is too bad, as I have always told you, you know Beldeh , you and I used to talk over these matters when we were together down at Vivian Hickey and I used to prove to you that we made full as much and as well asoff for this here world by leavingthose dangerous Vivian Girl spies alone and as well asoff for this here world by leavingthose dangerous Vivian Girl spies alone and alone besides by keeping a better chance for coming of better opportunities in the end, for which worse t comes to worse and there ain't nothing else left you know why then had them your compliments. You know Beldeh they are not the same as they were when you hadthem prisoners in your slave house."

"Bah" said Delaney Deldon. "Don't I know? don't make me too sick with any of your peculiar stuff--my stomach is a little riled now." and Deldon drank a double glass of raw brandy.

"But I say" said The colonel" and leaning back in his chair and gesturing impressively with "I'll say this now (get your cow you're an old meow) I always meant to drive my trade trade so as to make money on it, and to support the cause, first and foremost, as much as any man, but then concerning the Vivian Girl spies, trade is not everything and money ain't everything, cause we all got to be well acquainted with them, and as we all got would, why they would even take them from us for trying to solve them. Don't you see the point, how dangerous those snipes are just because they are spies, and the Princesses of Abbieannia. I don't care now who hears me say it, and a I think a curse might on it, also I may as well come out with it. I am not a man who believes in being as these here christian dogs are good and proper for th the sake of old souls but I do believe it is very foolish in the extreme in committing suicide and the therefore any one who happens to monkey too much with those princesses will come to grief one of these days, and now when I have matters tight and snug, I calculate to tend to my own personal interests and leave them little brats alone, and so that's the use of trying, to capture those creatures, when none of the officers or soldiers of the Manleys have succeeded yet. It's not really necessary, it is not at all prudent."

"Tend y to your own personal interests." repeated Deldon contemptuously" How do you know they'd take our souls? Such a silly remark. It'd take a bright outlook and look out together to find a soul in any of us glandelinians-- save yourself why dare on that score Colonel Holden. If the devil devil shifts any of us glandelinians through a hair sieve he won't find one."

"Why Deldon you are cross" said Colonel Holden "why don't you take it pleasant how when a feller is talking to you for your own good."

"Stop that jaw of yours and shut up" said Deldon, gruffly. " I can stand most any talk of yours, but yout your talk about those Vivian Girls being dangerous--that kills me right up because I know as much and more than you do about them. After all what's the odd odds between me and them. I fear them no more than I did when they first escaped from me no matter how good they are at horseback riding, or with the rifle or pistol, and it ain't that you care one bit more of or love a bit more feeling concerning the cubs--but it is clear sheer doggish meanness wanting to cheat the devil and save your own skin because you say you are afraid of them; don't I see through it. And your getting up that dubject of religion and suicide, as you call it, is after all too poison mean for any of us Glandelinians, for we are not the kind who run up a big bill with the devil all our lives, and then sneak out when pay time comes. Bah. I'll have them spi sprites some day as quick as I'll have that - spite fire Angelinia Aronburg. Hah you talk like a sissy."

"Come come gentlemen I say this is not business" said Scanlin There is different ways as you know of looking at su subjects. Colonel Holden is a pretty good man no doubt, and his has his own conscious and safty ways, and Deldon you have your ways, and very good ones, too Deldon, and so I have but quarrelling over the future of those Vivian Girl Centupedes won't get you any where or answer to any purpose whatever. so lets get down to business. Now colonel what is it, you want us to undertake to catch this here girl e s , say spy "angelinia aronburg."?

"The girl spy's no concern of mine---she's a raider a kidnapper, it's its only the boy I want to regain from her. I was a fool for not watching my tent and the little brat otherwise she could not have gone in without being seen. And she ran off with general Beppo Avanti's horse."

"All you Glandelinian officers no matter how high of rank are generally fools or the christian dogs would not like lick you so easily". Said Deldon scowling feriferel, fiercely.

"Come now Deldon none of your huffs" said Scanlin laying his hand on his shoulder and shaking him" don't you see the colonel is putting us in the way of a good job, so just hold still these here arrangements is my fort now and not your's. This here girl who is she, how is she, and what is she? is she really Angelinia aronburg the dangerous Amazon of the Abbieannians or did you fancy it and it be some one else.?"

"Well why of my men who were with men and with me and officers too could give evidence that she was angelinia aronburg--well brought up in the military business. If I had really in the first place believed it was her, I'd have thought twice before I chased after her."

"Really angelinia Aronburg and well brought up in military ways" said Scanlon his shar sharp eyes, nose and mouth, all alive with interprise. "Look here now Deldon, a beautiful opening. We'll do a business here of our own account, we does the catching or the killing whatever it be, the boy of course goes back to colonel Holden, the gal spy to Vanity Fair to speculate on. Ain't it a beautiful plan!"

Deldon whose great great heavy mouth had stood quite ajar during this communication now suddenly snapped it together, as a big dragon closes on a elephant or other big el animal and seemed to be digesting the idea at leasure.

"You see" said Scanlin to Colonel Holden drinking a draught of whiskey as he did so You see we have patrol stations convienient all along the river shores, and at dif points - points along any glandelinian retreat or advance, that does any little job in our line quite reasonable. Deldon he does all the knocking down and the shooting and the hacking and other things, and I come in all dressed up ti kill a chicken--shining boots everything first chop when the smearing and shooting is to be done. You ought to see me" said Scanlon in a glow of professional pride" How I can tone it off. " one day I'm general Scouting party with a thousand good scouts, the other day I'm a leader of the " Night Avenged Terror, and another day I'm just the Dragon of the Glandelinian persuers where I captures or kills, then again I come out a distant relation of Calmannia Shoemannia or some other butchering glandelinian general. Talents is different you know and a fugitive never escapes me or Deldon. Now Deldon also is a roarer when there's any thumping, shooting or fighting to be done with desperate fugit ives and he too is as clever as me, even better but at lying he ain't no good. Deldon he ain't you see it don't come natural to him but Good Lord if there's a feller in the Glandelinian army that can swear to anything and everything and put in all the cle circumstances and flourishes with a longer fuse and carry better than I I can through it all why I'd like to see him that's allsometimes I'm rather wish they were safe more particular for it would be a heap more fun much more fun than ever before."

Deldon who as we have made it appear was a man of quick thoughts and swift movements and he interrupted Scanlin by bringing his heavy fist down on the table so as to make all ring.

"I'll do" He said.

Lord bless you you need not break all the glasses", said Scanlon" Save your fist for time of need."

"But gentlemen ain't I come in for a share of the profits" said Holden.

"ain't it enough if we only succeed in recovering the boy for you" said Deldon." What more do you want?"

"Well" said Holden " If I give you the job it is worth something--if you can't that girl spy Gertrude Angelina--say ten per cent or more on the profo profit of the reward offered by the Glandelinian authorities dead or alive."

"Now" said Deldon with a tremendous blasphemy and striking the table with his heavy fist with double the violence as to sent a couple of glasses bounding off to the floor" Don't I know that girl Angelinia Aronburg, Colonel Holden. don't you think to come it over me. Suppose Scanlin and I have taken up the catching trade, just to satisf - satisfy a soldier like you, and got nothing for ourselves when we know what a girl she is? Not by a long rush. If it is possible we'll have the girl safe and square but how can you tell whether we succeed in getting one or both--when there's everything in the world to hinder. Don't I know the Vivian Girls are dangerous, that she her their accomplice is still more dangerous, and Jennie turner still more. Ain't you the one who showed us the game, a dangerous game. So undertake the trouble to catch her at the risk of our own lives it is asfree to us as you I hope. If you are reasonable then be so and do not expect miracles. If the Abbieannians wants to chase us, and we, fail e what then. Don't you know better than that Colonel Holden, after your dreadful experience with the gungirl this morning or noon with the loss of thirty six six m n men and your own narrow escape from being shot. Listen to reason man."

"Oh well certainly just let it go at that " said the colonel" You catch the little boy slave for the job you always did the thing fair and square wicked as you are, and always did trade fair with me Deldon- and was up to your word. But it ain't dangerous if you know how to go about it. I was reckless that's all".

"You know that" said Deldon" I don't pretend no shiveling ways but I won't lie in my counts with the devil or h - heaven together. what I say I'll do, I'll do if I can you know that Colonel Holden, but just as you said before, there's no use in committing suicide about it. But I'll take the risk under any conditions and for the risk of cap turing her I reserve a good p portion of the reward offered for her capture, and this here companion of mine deserves the other portion."

"Yes, Yes" s. I say so Deldon" said colonel Holden" and if you only promish t. regain the little boy for me within less than a week at any point you'll name for me that is all I want."

"But it ain't all I want by a long jump" said Deldon" You don't think I did business down at Vivian wickey with you for nothing colonel especially under fire of musketry and c cannon Holden I've learned to hold a fish or an ell, ell eel when I catch him. you have to fork over a hundred and sixty dollars flat down, or we don't start a peg of a move after that sprite spy. I know the danger of it as well as you do. She's as quick on two guns as a flash of lightning."

"Why when you have the job in hand that may bring a clear profit of somewhere best a hundred and sixteen thousand for her dead or alive, why Deldon you are unreasonable" said Colonel Holden.

Yes and have we business booked for a dangerous undertaking. And suppose we are killed while bushwacking around after that dangerous girl spy, - and finally instead of catching her gets killed-- as all girls of her nature is to catch whats liking or not what then if we failed--would you pay us a cent would you. I think I see you doing it- --ough, you no, flap down your own hundred and fifty. If if we succeed in the job and it pays, I'll hand it back and give you a little of the profits if we don't its for our trouble--that's fair ain't it Scanlon."

"Certainly certainly more than right" said Scanlin with a decided tone"It's it's only a rotalning foe you see--for our dangerous work. We take the risk while you stay behind you know. Well we must all keep good natured---keep shiny you know. e Delfon Deldon will have the boy for you, anyplace you'll name won't you Deldon?"

" If I find the young brat I,ll bring him to the first halting place of this Glandelinian army, and leave him if proper with Mylatie with a claim feobelonging to you which will reclaim him." said Deldon.

James Scanlin removed from his pocket a big greasy pocket book, and taking a long paper from thence, he sat down, andfixing his keen black eyes on it began writing these lines;|

"" From general Isher Deldi Mylatzes Army|

Boy5luve about six years of age, taken by a girl spy called Angelinia Aronburg, and who goes by the name of Gertrude Angeline. Ill,0000 one hundred thousand dollars extra for her dead or alive."

" I'M JUST RUNNING over our business to see if we can take this up handsomely. Deldon" he said after a long pause, " we must set a column of swift horsemen with bloodhounds on the track of thesetwo Gertrude and her charge."

T " The blood hounds will destroy them too much" said Deldon.

" I'll manage the bloodhounds, I've got some of my own that's fair in this kind of business" said Scanlon as he continues to write. " I have three of them, good dogs, cause all you've got to do is try and shoot the girl only. Then we'll be putting off for a spell and so now let's come to the particulars. pow colonel Deldon you saw this girl with the boy when she landed."?

" To be sure, as plain as I see you."

" And another girl helping her the rest of the way across the bridge?" said Deldon.

" To be sure I did."

" most likely" said Scanlin" she was taken somewhere because she was wounded by a lance in the plaece but where is the question. Deldon what do you say."?

" We must cross the river to night, no mistake" said Deldon.

" but there's no boat about anywhere" said Scanlon. " " we can't cross the ice without some means Deldon, and ain't it dangerous to wait too long. The longer we delay the more fun she'll have on us."

" Don't know anything about that--it has got to be done" said Deldon decidedly.

" Dear me" said Scanlon fidgeting-I'll be I say---he said walking to the window" it's dark as a wolfs mouth and Deldon, to delay we libe|

" The long and short is you are scared of patience but I can't help that go we must but to cross the river without a boat is impossible."

" Suppose you want to lie by a day or two till the girl has got a long start of us and never be d caught what then" said Scanlin.

" But it can't be done."

" I'll tekk you what Deldon you are scared but I can't help that we have to go and now."

" oh no I ain't a bit afraid" said Deldon--" only--"

" Only what!" said Scanlin.

" Bill about the boat or a bridge that issav safe to cross. You see there ain't any boat."

" I heard the woman of this house say there was one coming along this evening to be brought up by the soldiers and that some soldiers were going to cross over it it. Neck or nothin nothing we must go with them" said Scanlin.

" I suppose you've got good dogs" said Colonel Holden.

" first rate' said Scanlin" But what's the use, you have nothing belong to that girl spy to smell on."

" Yes I hav " said the colonel triumphantly " ere's her hat she left in my tent her hurry. she left her handkerchief, and a neckerchief too."

" That surely is lucky said Deldon " Give it to me".

" Though the dogs might damage the girl if they come on her unawares" said The colonel.

" That is a sort of consideration" said H Scanlin" our dogs tore a christian soldier spy to pieces once down at Vivian Mickey, before we could get them off."

" Well you see for this sort that is to be captured and then sold for their looks especially as the spy is very pretty, that won't answer you see" said Holden.

" I do see " said Scanlin Besides if she took shelter in some christian fortified town which I suspect is over yonder across the river a portion of San Salvador taint no go either. Dogs is no account if they trail any one to a fortified town loaded down with christian dogs; and therefore it is useless to use dogs to trail them down. Therefore we'll have to sneak in as spies and seize her the same as she seized the boy."

" Hellddid Deldon who had just stepped up to the bar to make some inquiries" they say the soldiers have come with a big boat so as you'd say Scanlin let's go then."

He quickly rose to obey. after exchanging a few words of further arrangement the colonel with visible reluctance handed over the one hundred and d fifty dollars to Scanlin himself and the worthy trio separated for the night. If any of our re If any of our refined and christian readers object to the society into which this scene introduces them with wicked Glandelinian slave drivers and traders, let us beg them to begin and conquer their prejudices in time. The catching business of small or big christ ian spies we beg to remind them is rising to the dignity of a most dangerous pastime; may rather I'd like better to be put out ina front line trench in the worse of these big battles stated in these volumes than even go after any of the Vivian Girls or their confederates. If all the broad land between the Angelinia and the Calverinian boundary line becomes one great market for the pursuit of escaped slaves and spies and the like and for bodies and souls, the trader and catcher may yet be some of the most reckless and darndi devil persons in the world so d far as I can make it at. out.

While this scene was going on at the tavern in the town of San Salvador James and Annie in a state of high terror and yet some felicitation quickly pursued their way home, occasionally looking back or to the side of them with every move of a bush or tree, or shadow for fear of suddenly meeting with the dangerous girl whom they had seen shoot down so many soldiers without a seeming any effort at all. Over it all James was in the highest possible excitement and dread, and expressed his f ar by all sorts of almost supernatural howls and ejaculations at every sound, or every movement of a bush an and by divers odd motions and contortions of his whole system. Sometime he would sit back wards with his face to the horses tail; and then with a whoop and a su summersault come right side up in his place again; and drawing on a grave face begin to lecture Annie in high sounding tones for running off and hiding behind a tree the moment the firing began,anon; slapping his sides with his arms he would burst forth in peals of screeches at every shadow he fue fancied moved that made the old woods ring and echoe as they passed. With all these evolutions of fear he nevertheless through the same dread contrived to keep the horses up to the top of their speed until between ten and eleven oclock that night with the ten soldiersescort behind them their heels resounded on the gravel in front of general Dargins big tent. The general appeared in an instant.

" Is that you colonel Holden?"

" o this is James and Annie. We have just returned. The colonel and his men are at San Salvador."

" And what about that Angelinia Aronburg and the kid she took with her. Where are they?"

" The colonel is resting at the tavern-he is dreadfully fatigued sir and has sent back to the camp thirty dead men and twenty injured. That girl shot them all down."

" How did she escape?'

" Well she is clear across the ocean sir. As a body may say in heaven."

" Why James what do you mean' said Dargin breathlessly, and almost faint at the possibl possible meaning of these words came over mmm him."

" well sir, the Lord prr preserves all children. Angelinia Aronburg has had gone over the river into San Salvador proper as remarkably as if a spirit took her over."

James's way of speaking was always uncommon ly fervent in his masters presence and he usually spoke in proverbs first.

" Come over here James" said Mylatie she had just rode p up and tell us what in the world general Dargin wants. You talk like a mystery that's never to be solved:

Come come Dargin"said he passing his arm around him' You are cold and all in a shiver you allow yourself to feel too much."

" Feel too much. Am not I responsible for that kid. Are we not both responsible to god if the other Glandelinians even kill the girl and boy the poor fools. My God lay not this sin to our charge."

" what sin, general Dargin' you see for yourself that we have only kept slaves for exchange to the Nationals for prisoners, and that we are doing what we have a right to do. "

" There's an awful feeling of guilt about it too' said general Dargin. " I can't reason it away."

" Here Annie" called James, from in front of the tent " I'll take these horses to where they belong. You tell the general what he wants to hear."

Annie soon appeared before the general.

" Now Annie tell us more distinctly than he has done how the matter was. said general Mylatie. " where is Angelinia Aronburg if you know.?"

Well your excellency . Saw her with my own eyes, shooting down more than thirty of the men who pursued her; and crossing a broken down bridge across the ice filled River. She crossed most remarkably, it was no less than a miracle to cross and fire back at the same time; and I saw another girl help her across the rest of the bridge, and then both were lost in the dusk. The other fired hard with her pistols to prevent the soldiers from swimming across the stream."

' Annie, I think this rather apocryphal this miracle. Crossing on floating ice is not s, easily done " said general Mylatze. " put a dangerous bridge seems impossible. I i Believe you are telling me a story to make me interested."

" He sir I'm telling you the prompt truth. If you find out it's a lie you have a right to order me to a whipping post. and it was not easy. No one could have done it witho without help from god himself. why now" said Annie it was just this way: Colonel golden and me; and James and his soldiers came up to the little tavern in the town by the river; and he rides a little ahead, we being so determined to catch Angelinia Aronburg and when I passed by the tavern window sure enough she was in plain sight, and we about about to surround the building. well she saw us, and she dodges back after firing out of a window. a shot flew past and hits my hat taking it away; and makes me sing out enough to raise the dead. The colonel goes past the door, and then she races out the back door, and went down to the river bank. The colonel he sees her and yelled a command to his soldiers and we all raced after her, though the colonel knowing oh would fire ordered us to go to the rear out of range. Down we raced to the river and she faced us firing madly and there the bridge lay broken down with water passing over at some parts; and it coveredwith ice and fragments of it jigging up and down as if it were as if it were a wrecked boat.

We were checked by her fire for a moment but in the pause we returned it with lances and then raced right behind her, and I thought sure he would have her right then and there when she gave a defiant screech as I never heard defying us to catch us her and there she was clear over the other side of the six foot current in front of the bridges end, and then oh she went, pausing to fire back or rest, the bridge swayed and dipped, down she went t twice in the water, but again she was bounding like a spring, and I tell you every time she fired at us she hit a man and even brought down the colonels horse. Lord the nature that the girl has is not common I'll say. she is a or creature to be dreaded I'm of opinion. You'll never catch her alive. "

General Dargin sat perfectly silent; pale with excitement; while Annie told her story.

" If she had known our kind of Glandelinians she would have no need to have fired a shot " she said. ' Nevertheless God be praised she is not dead" But where is the girl and her companion now with the lad."

" The lo lord will provide" said the girl rolling up his eyes her eyes piously. " As I have been saying this is a providence and no mistake. They are in San Salvador which has a strong force of Christian dogs defending it. That is all pro vidences".

" There are a kind of providences that will not be very sparing with you slavy if you do not quite calling the Nationals" Christian Dogs. I allow no such names used in the army under my command. That word and that practice belongs to gen ral Manleys army and not mine: " said Mylatze with as much sternness as he could command under the circumstances.

Now there might be no use in pretending to be angry with a slave child then with a common child, or with a child of your own; both really see the true state of the case, though all attempt to affect the contrary, and Annie was in no wise affected or disheartened by this rebuke, though she assumed an air of doleful gravity, and stood with the corners of her mouth lowered in most penitential style.

" Master is quite right---quite; it was ugly on me--there is no disputeing that and of course no one in thi this army would encourage such words but colonel golden and I did not think it wrong. I'm sensible of that, but a poor girl slave is likely to make mistakes sometimes when you overhear it said by some me else."

"I shall speak to colonel Holden about the " Christian dogs" when he returns" said Mylatze grimly.

" Well" said Dargin-2 " as you appear to have a proper sense of your errors, you may go Now and tell your companion Annie Annie she may make for you a good supper. you and the girl must be hungry after your long ri e."

" General you are good to us" said Annie making her bow with alacrity, saluting and departing. It will be perceived that Annie had a talent that might have undoubtedly raised her her to any rank of girl scout of the army had she desired to be one, and she also had a talent making capital out of everything that happened to occur, to be invested for her own personal praise and glory, and having accomplished her piety and humility as she trusted, to the satisfaction of the two generals, she clapped her hand to her head in token of salute with a sort of rakish free and easy air, and proceeded to her own big tent, with the intention of cooking a meal for herself and James.

' I'll specially these other slaves to morrow' said Annie to herself,' now I have guibt the chance. Lord I'll feel it off to make them sure."

It must be observed that one of the special delights that Annie really had was to ride in attendance on her master to all kinds of military gatherings during this campaign, where perched on some rail fence, or perched aloft in some tree, she would sit watching the council or meeting, with the greatest apparent gusto, and then descending among the various brethren of her own kind assembled on the same same errand she would edify and delight them with the most ludicrous burlesques and full imag imitations all delivered with the most unusual earnestness and solemnity, and though the listeners all about her were also slaves like herself it did not frequently happen however that they were fringed pretty deeply with the hue of a fairer complexion, who listene h who listened laughing and winking to Annie's great self congratulation. In fact Annie considered herself, in her vocation, and never let slip an opportunity of enlarg ing her office.

Now between James and Annie there had existed from some time a sort of chronic friendship, may almost to love making; but as Annie was now mediating something in the provision department as the necessary and obvious foundations of her own perations she started her cooking; while just a little later James appeared before Annie with a touching ly subdued resigned expression like one who has suffered inexpressible hardships in behalf of a persecuted fellow creature, with a deluging pub the fact that general Dargin had directed him to come to Annie for whatever she should to cook for him.

The thing took accordingly; the pugnacious virtuous body was ever subdued by the attentions of a lover to his sweetheart with more ease, than Annie was won over by James pleadings, and if he had been her lover himself he could not have been overwhelmed with more maternal beautifulness, and he soon therefore found himself seated happy and gl gloriously over a good meal by the table: Savory morsels of ham, golden blocks of corn cake, fragments of pie of every conceivable make, chicken wings, gizzards, drumsticks all appeared in great confusion; and James as King of all he surveyed, sat with his hat cocked to one side, and patronizing Annie at his right hand for she too took to a meal.

Late as it was the whole tent was full of slaves either half asleep or still awake, but they had all risen up with the hope of hearing the termination of the days exploits. Now was the hour of glory for both James and Annie. The story of the day was rehearsed with all kinds of ornament and everything which might be deemed necessary to heighten its effect, for Annie like many others, never allowed a story to lose any of its gilding by passing through her hands. Bouts of horror attending of atten ded the narrative and were taken up and prolonged by the smaller slaves, who were lying in their cots or sitting up. In the height of the uproar, Annie however perceived of retained a an unusual gravity, only from time to time giving her auditors di ers givers divers inexpressibly dull glances without departing from the nature of her story telling.

" You see boys and girl slaves" said James now devouting a piece of chickens leg, with energy" You see now what happens when a person goes after dangerous child spies belonging to the Nationals, and who fights to free us all. For any soldier as tries to capture one of those so called Vivian Girls or their friends, is as good as trying to capture the moon, you s the principle's the same but harder. and if why one of those drivers that comes smelling after the National child scouts why he have he had the Vivian Girls in the way of Angelinia Aronburg; they are the girls they got to set in with; they are the ones who are the most dangerous to meet---they'll stand up w for the rights of all children----they'll fight for your freedom to the last breath."

"Why but James you told me early this morning that you was willing to help general Dargin catch that girl spy Angelinia Aronburg, so it seems to me your talk don't seem to go right" said Annie.

" I tell you now Annie' said James with awful superiority" Don't you be talking about what you do not know anything about, girls you like you Annie mean well, but they are not expected to calculate the principals of action orvotherwise when it comes to reason by and by."

Annie looked slightly rebuked and angry, particularly by the hard word calculate which most of the child slaves always considered a sort of settler of any argument, but James proceeded.

" Now to go on, one thingwas conscious or conscience Annie, when I first thought the generals bell ol wished me to go after the girl spy, for you know we must obey our general if he wishes us to do a thing. But when I found that the general did not really want her captured and wished to frustrate the colonel then I went the other way because we slaves gets the most of things by sticking to the side of our general, so you may understand I persisted either way, and stuck up to my conscience, and held on to the proper things.

es Yes principals said James giving a good hard bite into a chickens neck(whether the chicken likeed it or not), what is principals good for anyway if we slaves are not persistent I want to know now. There Annie you may have a few of these legs- I cannot eat all of this.

James's audience listening to his words with open mouths appeared so interested that the boy could do nothing else but proceed.

" No matter about persistence fellow slaves" said James with the air of one enter ing into a very interesting subject' ain't always found in everybody or otherwise not of us us kids would ever be slaves. Boy Now you see when a boy or girl stands up for a thing one day and night, and have it maicheontrary the next, and naturally enough they do this, when he or she is not persistent, neither is she or he brave and natural----hand me a piece of that corn kake Annie. But let us all look into it. I hope the ladies and gentlemen present will excuse my using an unusually sort of comparison. Here as we know the nationals are trying to set us free; and to tell the long and short of us have to fight - blood, war for it. well one general is trying to lick a Glandelinian army, and another is running away from it. Suppose I'm that emperor Vivian. Here I see Manley and his armies, and am trying to get around to his rear. well I sends a big force force of christian dogs beg pardon I mean christians around to the left,, but Manley knows my plan and repulses me but it don't say I'm licked because I don't try there no more, but sends a big attacking force around the right, then ain't I persistent. I'm persistent in wanting to win the battle, to get my army around a way to flank the Glandelinian army; don't you see what I mean all of you,!!!"

" It is the only thing a person could ever be persiste persistent in god knows said Annie. " but sometimes persistence itself don't even gain you anything, and not even perseverance either. I know from experience.

"Yes indeed I know that " said James, rising v full of supper and glory, for a closing effort. " Yes my fellow slaves, both girls and girls and boys in general we should all have pr perseverance, I have principals and perserverance both, I'm proud to have them - for they'll do me good some day. We are all slaves but in secret it is our duty before God to stick for the nationals only, and I sticks to them like leeches--just let any christian spy be persued by Glandelinians and I'll be glad to detain the persuit, I'd do it if the Glandelinians burned me alive- I would walk up to the stake I would and say, here I come to shed my last blood for the cause, for my christian country, and for the freedom of all slaves. Now if it had not been for me and annie to day Angelinia Aronburg would have been taken a dozen times . was it not I and she who purpos e purposely e started off the horses this morning, and kept them chasing near till dinner time. and didn't I cart the colonel and his column of men night twenty miles out of the proper road this afternoon or else he would have come up with the spy girl as easy as a cat after a mouse. These is what I call principles and all also providences."

" Well " said Annie" let's all of us get to bed to night for otherwise e'll Not eat anything like any sleep. "

"Slaves all of you " Said James waving his big straw hat with great dignity I give you all my blessing, go to be ted again now, and be good boys and girls."
And with this behedi ction the assembly all retired.

CHAPTER FOURTY, ONE....

AN ORDERLY AND H..IS ANGELINIA ARONBURG FINDS A PLACE OF REFUGE FOR HERSELF AND THE CHILD
SHE TOOK FROM GENERAL DARWIN. JANNIE GOES OFF WITH THE ARMY UNDER MYLETZE.
HOW THE GENERAL TREATS HER.

The light light of acheerful fire shone on the rug and carpet on a cosy parlor in a large brick house in the two ni of san Salvador, and glittered on the sides of unusually handsome te cups and well brightened, tone teapot, as a colonel of a christian c cavalry of dragoon s was slowly drawing off his boots preparatory to in e inserting his feet in a pair of nea handsome spurred shoes, which his orderly had put justthe lined for him before he came in from his scouting tour. It was pi nouring rain on the outside and his orderly looking the very picture of unusual delight was superintending the arrangements of the table, ever and anone mingling admonitory remarks to a number of frolicsome children who were shooing off in all those modes of untold cunnel and mischief that even have astonished all mothers, even though they were rescued child slaves.

" John do not show yourself outside to night---there are dangerous Glandelinians near. Mummie, don't pull the cats tail, poor puff pussy. Jim you must not go near that window--no, no a Glandelinian soldier will see you. You don't know sir sir what a stranger it is to us all to see you here so soon to night." he said at last when he found a moment to say something to h the officer.

Yes yes, I just had a run in with the Glandelinians and so I thought I'd would make a run in or run down to here to h order the soldiers to leave the town as soon as possible as some great Glandelinian army is near and I think I know who it belongs to. I'm tired to death, and my head aches from my long hard riding in this dreadful storm but we got to go or we'll all be taken prisoners. The army will reach here to morrow."

The orderly cast a glimpse at a medicine bottle, which stood in a half open closet and appeared to mediate an approach to it, but the colonel interposed.

" No no Hendro, no doctoring now. A cup of good hot coffee, a little brandy init, and some of our good home living and the like is what I want before I depart with my division. It's a tiresome business this retreating and halting and fighting with a superior force."

and the officer smiled as if he rather liked the idea of considering himself a sacrifice to y his country and his cause,

" Well said a captian who was in the room with him after the business of the tea table was getting rather slack" And what is the Glandelinian army doing so close to this town."

Now it was a very unusual thing for any of the colonels officers ever to trouble his head with what was going on within a near by Glandelinian army, very wisely consider ing that he had enough to do to learn other things besides his own. The colonel therefore opened his eyes in surprise, and said;

" Not very much of importance. So far Myletze and his army is merely advancing. No bi christian army had come within sight to oppose him yet. But it is his purpose to strike a blow at Angelinia Agathia."

" Well but it is true, and if so it is is it also true that Myletze had passed a law in contrarybto Manleys will forbidding all slaves owners to leave their slaves outside th army so that he can exchange the slaves for every christian prisoner that he wishes to retain to obtain his own. I heard some one talking of such a law but I did not think general Myletze had the nerve to pass it when he would get into a quarrel over it with Manley, and his confederates."

" why captian, you are getting to be an inquisite complex all at once."

" No nonsense. I would not give a rap for all the Glandelinian generals generally but I think Myletze alone is one of the few Glandelinian generals who is not down right cruel and unchristian. I hope sir that Myletze has passed such a law. He is freeing them entirely and he does not know, it."

" There has been a law forbidding all slave owners to keep their slaves out of the army sir, so much of that thing ha has been done by the reckless slave owners that other fairly good Glandelinian generals are very strongly excited, and it seems very necessary, and no more than christian and kind, that something should be done by Myletze to quiet theexcitement. But nevertheless as he is fighting for a cause that is wrong nevertheless if he knows the true nature of things."

" and how far goes his law. I hope it don't forbid the non combatants of a town to shelter these poor little creatures a night does it, and give them something comfortable to eat and some clothes, and send them quietly to the christian lines if the if they happened to run away does it!"

" why in that case yes, the Glandelinians would be charging the town folk with aiding and abetting you know, and if slaves were found sheltered in the town, the town would be laid in ashes. It's dangerous t do so if a Glandelinian army is near."

There was one slave girl waiting on the colonel who was a timid blushing little girl of about eight years of age, and with mild blue eyes, and a rosy complexion, and the gentle lest and sweetest little voice in all the world, but from her treatment at the hand of harsh masters she had as little courage, that a goose or a duck could get her to rout at first sight, and a dog of any size, whether timid or vicious would bring her into subjection by mere appearance or sniffing at her feet. Her fellow slaves who were rescued with her were to be taken to a christian army as soon as one could be found. I tell you " I tell you what" said the colonel as this girl brought him some water" As brave as I am I was scared this evening. A party of Glandelinians came on at me and my scouting party and in such a manner that I thought they were insane men dressed in uniforms, and my whole troop was whipped and sent on a total rout before I could get over wondering what had come about, and I tell you boys I'll never go so near a Glandelinian camp again. All of Myletzes cavalry are the dangerous " WHIRLING OF or gargoylian Kurds."

The captian now rose with very red cheeks which quite improved his general appearance and walked up to his colonel, with quite a resolute air for there was one thing that that was capable of arousing any abbleannian officer, and that provocation came in on the side of his unusually sympathitic nature; Anything in the shape of cruelty or an unusual engagement would throw him into a passon passion which was the more alarming and inexplicable in proporation to the general softness of his nature. Generally the most indulgent and easy to be entreated of officers, still his men had a very reverent remembrance of a most vehement sho once beatered on a Glandelinian because He found him leagued with several other graceless and wicked soldiers stoning a defenseless child.

As the captian approached the colonel he said in a determined tone;

" Now my dear brother, I want to know if ou think Myletze and his army will arive here to morrow morning!"

" You won't shoot a me now Jack if I say I do."

" I Never thought he would advance up so far in a hostile country. But do you think that because he claims he does not favor slavery that He thinks He is right and christian yet because he will fight against the Abbleannian Government."

" No that can't be. No matter what a Glandelinian officer might do otherwise I said before he is wicked nevertheless. But it ain't my luck to oppose him when he has such a big army and I only a large company guarding this small town."

" I never thought you would abandon the town, John; you did not intent to when you were ordered to do so!"

" Even so I have to as I am ordered to do so my fair brother."

" No matter what the Glandelinians are they ought to be ashamed, colonel. Poor hi homeless creatures, poor dying child slaves. It's a shameful wicked abominable cause the glandelini Glandelinian armies are fighting for, and some day Emperor Vivian will break this rebellion of Glandelinia the first time he get's a chance, and I hope the chance is not far away too. Things have got to a pretty pass, if a non combatants of a christian town can't give a warm supper and a bed to a poor starving creature of a little slave, just because they are slaves and have been abused and oppressed all their lives since they were stolen from their parents poor things. And the innabatents are cowards if they give in and obey the wicked law of a Glandelinian Tribunal. Rather let the town be burned than let a runaway child slave be t retaken."

" But captian, just listen you me. Your feelings are all quite right sir, and very interesting, and I love you my dear brother for them, but then we must not suffer our feelings to run away with our military plans, you must consider military things too, that when ever it is our opportunity we can and will rescue all slaves within our reach, and therefore let the town folk do what they please on the matter. Of course I do not know anything anything about general Myletze or his army as I have never been in it, but I can and do read my bible, and there I s see that no matter who awe are we must feed, the hungry, clothe the naked, and comforte the desolate, and that bible we abbleannians mean to follow if we have to fight the bloodes bloodiest war on the earth to follow it. It might involve a great evil of course concerning the nature of the Glandelinians, but we never need fear no evil of any kind when obeying God; for it is always safest all arround, and brings good merits and otherwise to do as He bids us no matter what we or others suffer for it. N the slavery of children ranks first in that law more than any thing else as you know the words" " Whatsoever ye do to the least of these, my little brer brethern ye do it unto me" or" any one who should harm any of these little ones in any way that believeth in me it were better that a mill stone be tied to his neck and he be drowned in the depths of the sea. I can state to you a very clear argument to show-

" I know it all colon l and we would do anything right. I put it to you John would we for the sake of a dirty scoundrel of a glandelinian turn away a poor, shivering, hungry child slave from our camp, or from our door, because he or she was a runaway slave. Would we now? no never."

Now if the truth must be told these abbleannians were men who had a peculiar and particularly humane and accessible nature and turning away anybod from his camp that was a little slave and in trouble never was their way, and what was still more stranger a person risked his his life to enter a christian camp to reclaim a runaway child slave. He would be considered the same as a spy who entered to li learn the plans of the officers and it was the firing squad for him if caught. F For a time the colonel coughed, took out his big red pocket handkerchief, and begin to wipe his eyes. The captian again said;

" " I should like to see anyone who would do that Colonel------ really, should. ither turn an escaped child slave out of doors in a to cold weather, in a blizzard for instance or maybe take her and put her in jail untill her old wicked master comes to reclaim her. I would like to see any no who would make a great hand at such things. Why I'll and of course the reader may understand what he would have finished in saying.

" " Of course it would be a painful , a very painful duty for the Glandelinian cause" said the colonel mockingly.

" Duty, colonel-- If you love me brother do not say that word. I hate to hear it. Abbleannians all know it is not a duty--it can probably be a duty at that but only for the wicked, the servant of the devil. No matter who they are no Glandelinian has o en any ra right to keep a slave , not even the right to make a child a slave, for the children belong to other nations and their own parents, from whom they were stolen for just such a purpose, and if there is any one who treats the slaves well so they do not run away then he is not really a glandelinian. If I could rescue a thousand slaves a day I'd be happy. I tell you children do not run away anyhow if they have a master whom they feel sure is a christian spy in disguise using them for his confederates in sec et like many do within the glandelinian camp, and when they do run, poor little creatures, they suffer enough with cold and hunger and fear, and what not, without everybody turningagainst them and no matter ho how this war turns out, whether the cause is lost or won I never will see a child t. be a slave within my si ht, so help me God..."""

" Br ther, brother. The Glandelinians have no reason. You know glandelinia is a nation gone mad,"

" Yes madness from sickedness, oppressing innocent children, pi killing them with work and brutal treatment. Some of us believe it is right no more than you do, and as many slaves h as have been rescued by you God alone can count them. And the many risks you have taken. There's a way us abbleannians have of coming round to a plain good thing, and you have always been not headed against child slavery, and jus used to storm to mother about it sh n you was home. The abbleannian night riders know you well enough brother and therefore you are getting more recruits every day."

At this this critical juncture the orderly entered and saluted at the door, and begged the captian to quickly come into the kitchen, and the colonel then looking after his brother with amusement and respect, seated himself by the chair staircase, and began to read over a dispatch he had himself wri written which was a warning to the angelinia against government of Myletzes advance. After a moment his brother's voice was at the door was heard at the door, in a quick earnest tone" John, johh. Oh dear brother I do wish you would come here for just a n moment."

He quickly put away his dispact dispatch, and went into the kitchen, and started quite amazed at the sight that presented itself, a young and slender little girl in a Glandelinian uniform of a girl scout, but with garments torn and partly frozen, with both shoes o gone, and the stockings torn torn away from the cut cut and bleeding feet and with blood flowing from her lef leg and sh u shoulder was laid back in a b deadly swoon upon two chairs. ut there But there was the impress of the Abbleannish face in her face and she had a mourning ful mournful and pathetic beauty with its strange stony sharpness, its cold fixed deathly aspect, struck a solemne chill over him. He drew his breath short and stood in long silence. His brother and the orderly were busily engaged in restorative measures, while a soldier had got the little boy on his nee, and was busy pulling off his shoes and stockings, and chafing his little cold feet.

Indeed if she ain't a sight to behold' said the orderly very compassionately. "It appears like her wounds had made her faint for she had been struck by something sharp on the leg and in the shoulder. She was tolerable pert when she came in, and asked if she could not warm herself here for a spell, and I was was just asking her from where she came and how she come to be wounded, when she fainted right down. She is a National spy I guess from the papers I found in her possession, and by the looks of her I believe it is the famious Angelinia Aronburg."

" Poor creature" said the captian, compassionately, as the little girl slowly unclosed her large dark blue eyes, and looked vacantly at her. suddenly an expression of agony crossed her face, but not thinking of her own wounds she sprang up slowly saying, "oh the little boy I took away with me. Have the Glandelinians retaken him!"

" The boy at this jumped from the knee of the shoulder and running to her side put up his arms. oh ' oh I'm glad she he is here' she exclaimed."

Standing in the same room was Jennie Turner who said to the officers;

" we got here safely. We conduct us to the christian lines, so the Glandelinians won't get him."

" No one shall get him here girls' said the captian, encouragingly' You are even safe with us, so don't be afraid."

" God bless you" said the girls, and Gertrude covered her face and sobbed, while the little boy seeing her crying tried to get into her lap, while Jennie comforted her, by her efforts Gertrude was rendered no e calm. a temporary bod was provided for her on the settle near the fire, and there her wounds were dressed by Jennie herself, and then Gertrude fell into a heavy slumber with the boy who seemed no less weary, soundly sleeping in her arm, for the girl scout resisted with nervious anxiety, the kindest attempts of the soldiers to take him from her, and even in sleep her arm s encircled him with an unrelax unrelaxing grasp as if she could not even then be beguiled encircled him with an unrelax unrelaxing grasp as if she could not even then be beguiled of her vigilant hold. The captian and the colonel had gone back into the parlor; where strange as it may appear no reference was made as to the proceeding conver sation, but the captian busied himself with some military work while ordering a soldier to go out to start the breaking of camp, and the colonel proceeded or pretended to proceed I on the writing of another dispatch.

" I wonder who and what the little boy is she was with her" said the colonel at last, as he finished.

" When she wakes p and feels a little rested, we shall see, as I do not wish to question her companion" said the captian.

" I say brother" saidthe colonel, after musing in silence over a map.

" Well John.?"

" She couldn't wear one of the cast off boy scout uniforms could she, for she seems l rge large enough to wear one belonging to my son."

A quite perceptible smile glimmered on his brothers face, as he answered;" Yes sir."

There was another pause and the colonel broke out again.

" I say brother."

" Well colonel. what now."?

" Why there's a big Con centinian cavarly force, that you ordered here on purpose to raid some child slave plantations last night coming over here again to night before we march off, you might as well have them escort the girls with the lad. They need their protection since she i is so badly injured."

" At this instant the orderly looked in to say that the wounded girl scout was awake, and wanted to see the colonel and his brother. Both officers went again into the kitchen followed by the child slaves and the lieutenant. The wounded girl was now sitting on the settle by the fire, and she was looking steadily into the blaze, with a calm expression both defiant and yet exxi excited, very different from her former agitation.

" Did you want to see me little miss?" said the captian in gentle tones. " I hope you feel better now, poor girl."

The only answer was a long drawn sigh, but she lifted her dark blue eyes on the officers with an expression of trust and gratitude, and with also an expression that brought the tears into their eyes.

" You need not be afraid of the Clandelinians now, we are friends here, poor girl. Tell me where you come from, and what you want." Said the captian.

" I come from the Clandelinian army under Mylotze."

" When!" said the colonel taking up the interrogatory.

" To night. I came with my companion."

" How did you come?"

" I crossed I on the broken bridge across the river?"

" Crossed on the brother bridge, what are you doing trying t kid us!" said every one present.

" Yes " said Jennie herself " she did. God helping her she did, And she shot down all the Clandelinians who tried to overtake Her, and I helpled her across the rest of the way."

"Good Good Lord Mise" said the lieutenant" the river is full of broken ice, nand has a very strong current, and all the bridges are broken up by my men so the rebels can't cross in a hurry, and the fragments are tetering up and down in the water. Surely you must be dreaming it. Why a ghost would not dare such a stunt."

" I know it was dangerous, I knew it was nearly suicide" said Gertrude earnestly" but I did it. I did not believe I could, --I did not th nk I should get over, but I did not care. I was determined to get away with the lad, and rather drown than fail. God and is His blessed Mother helped me, indeed no one knows how much god will help a person through any kind of peril till they try. I've been through Hell and escaped and am here to tell it" said the girl with a flashing eye. " The Clandelinian colonel will remember me to his dying day."

" Were you a slave?" said the colonel.

" No sir, but this little boy was. He belonged to a mean master in Mylotzes army."

" Has any of the Clandelinians ankind to you my lad" asked the colonel.

" Yes sir, the colonel was My master, and the little girl took me away as he was going to beat me because I told Mylotze on him."

" and was it your mission girl to take the boy!"

" No sir, I do my deeds seprately from orders. I am one of the girl guardians of th Vivian Girls'"

I see, and was this boy your friend'"

No sir, this isthe first time I have ever seen him but I know him just the same.."

You being a girl, what could induce you to leave a strong christian army under the Emperor than, to run down all the way here, perhaps over eight hundred miles away, to go through dangers to take away a child slave!"

Gertrude looked up at the colonel with a keen scrutinizing glance.

" Colonel" she said suddenly" Have you ever lost a child because the Clandelinians stole him or murdered him!"

The question was unexpected, and it was a thrust on a raw wound, not that he had really lost his own child but because he had seen children whom he cherished as if they were his own brutally murdered before his very eyes, and he had his brother and his companions.

the colonel turned around, and walked to the window, and the captian had tears in his eyes, but recovering his voice, he said.

Why do you ask that? No we have not lost any of our own but we have seen those we loved so well massacred. "

" Then you will feel for what I is to tell you. I have seen parents by the thousands lose all, left to die in the heat of the sun, to burn to death in flaming buildings, and I had seen things that would make your blood boil. I never slept a night that I did not see these horrors in my dreams. Then I lost my sister. She was my comfort and pride, and sir the Clandelinians took her away from me and it is rumored they killed her but I do not believe it. Besides seen many slaves sold to brutal masters, and such things I cannot stand. I knew I should never be good for nothing for the Abbleannian cause if I did, and every time I have the chance I raid a camp and get away with some. I entered Mylotzes army this morning and took thisolittle boy off; and came off in the night, and the colonel this little boys wicked master chased me, and some of the elder slaves too, and they were coming right behind me, and I seen them. I recieved them more than they expected and then jumped right onto the bridge; firing as I did so, and how I got acrossacross I don't know but first I knew my friend Jennie was helping me up the bank."

Gertrude did not sob nor weep. She could not weep but the two officers and the soldiers and even the rescued child slaves was in some way showing signs of hearty sympathy! The child slaves had thrown themselves disconsolately into a bed wh were there they were sobbing to their hearts content; while an orderly was ejaculating;

" Lord Have mere, on us, with all the fervor of a bitway in Church, a lie the lieutenant had his face fairly hidden in his hands, while the captian rubbing his eyes very hard with his sleeve was making an uncommon variety of wry faces ,occasionally res ponding in the same key with great fervor. The colonel had turned his back to the company and looked at of the window; and was particularly busy in clearing his throat, n and wiping his eyes, peculiarly blowing his nose in a manner that would have excited suspicion had any one observed critically.

" How came you to tell me general Mylotze was kind to child slaves." he suddenly exclaimed gulping down something very resolutely Some kind of rising in his throat and turning suddenly upon his brother.

" He seems he is something of a kind master, I'll say that of him, anyway; bu He but he can't help what others do if he is ignorant of it! "

" How did you come to get the kiddeway?" he asked of Gertrude.

" I am as you see disguised as a Clandelinian girl scout, and there was some way I can't tell now, that I had a hold on the lad and the soldier not at first knowing me esto obliged to give me their will. I listened to the colonel in secret and heard him telling his officers that he was going to see sell his slave this little boy here to Manley because the lad told something about him to Mylotze, and heard the officers Manley because the lad told something about him to Mylotze, and heard the officers begging and pleading for the boy; and he told them he would not change his mind for all this hell and that the papers were all drawn, that he would not keep a snitcher in the camp; camp and then it was I took him and left the camp and escaped. I knew it was no use of the little boy trying to live if they did it to him, and so I took him."

" Have you no father?"

" No."

" any relatives whatever!"

" Yes general Concentinian Aronburg is my uncle."

The quiet tone in which the girl spoke might have led any other observer to think that she was entirely apathetic, but there was a calm settled depth of angi anguish in her large dark eyes, that spoke of something far otherwise. " Yes " she said again" the colonel was real hard to the poor lad, and as he threatened to sell him to general Manley and as it was likely his father would never see see him again I took him away.."

" and where do you mean to go to my good girl scout."?

" To Emperor Vivians; or my Uncles army, if I only knew where the latter's is. Is to the captians face.

"Poor thing" said the captian involuntarily.

" Is my Uncle-s army a great way off!" said Gertrude earnestly.

" No one even kn ws where he is, poor child" said the captian" but we'll try and get communication with emperor Vivians army. Here orderly make her up a bed in your own room cl se by the kitchen, until we make preparations to move off from the town before morning. Then we go through the town in flames. Never fear girls, put your trust in God he will protect you and bring you success in your undertaking."

The two officers re-entered the parlor. The captian sat down in his chair before the b fire while the colonel strode up and down the room grumbling to himself; while th the colonel strode up and down the room grumbling to himself; when at last thestriding up to his brother, he said;

" pish. shaw. Confounded awkward business," at last thestriding up to his brother, he

" I say Jack, we'll have to get the girls away from here this very night, and its best therefore to break camp and move off right away. A big force of Clandelinians will be down on the scent bright and early to-morrow morning. If it was only the two girls, they could remain because I know them and they are a terror to the enemy, but that little chap will not be kept still by a troop of horse and foot, I'll bet, and he'll bring the troopers to surround the place by popping his head out of some window or door.

a pret pretty fair, pen and fire it would be for us too, to have the town surrounded by Glandelinians with us here. no the troops will be off to night and the children too."

" To night. How is it possible---to advance in the dark, ---and where to, and the town is surrounded by an impassable swamp full of mud holes and bottomless bogs."

" Well I know just what to do and do it I shall" said the colonel beginning to b put on his boots, with a reflective air, and stopping when his leg was half in, he embranced his knee with both hands, and seemed to go off in some kind of an unusually deep thinking.

" Of course its a confounded awkeard ugly business and very dangerous" said he at last, beginning to tug at his boot straps again" and that's a fact." After one boot was fairly on, the colonel sat with the other in his hand, profoundlystudying a figure on a the ceiling. " As dangerous as it is, it will have to be done, though for aught I see---hang it all" and he drew the other boot anxiously on, and looked out of the window.

Now the captian was a discreet ##### officer a man who never in his life said " I told you so" and on the present occasion though pretty well aware of the meditations of his brother, he prudently forbore to meddle with them, only sat very quietly in his chair awaiting orders, ready to hear his superior officers intentions when he should think proper to utter them.

" You see" he said " There a strong force of nationals has come up from the north, and had taken up position seven miles up the river here back in the woods and swamp, where no one dared to go at night time, unless they go on purpose to be caught and buried in a bog, and the safe places are not found in a hurry. But my whole command can make it there safely, and there the three children and these rescued slaves would be safe enough, but the pledge of the thing is, no one could lead an army safely into that dangerous swamp to night, but me."

" Why not. Your other chief orderly or side-de-camp is an excellant swamp toad."

" Ay,ay but here it is. He has been shot in a skirmish to day, and is wounded, and to get to the proper part of the swamp without disaster to my command the confounded stream has to be crossed twice, and the second crossing is extremely dangerous, unless one knows it as I do. I have crossed it a hundred times on horseback since I've been occupying this town and know exactly the turn to take. But every soldier will have to carry a torch to light the way and you see there's no help for it. The cavarly must be dismounted and the march must be made as quietly as possible and we'll take the two girls over, and then to give color to the matter, my command must carry its march for Columbus creek so that I can get back to my proper brigade. I shall get into business bright and early in the morning. It's very dangerous to try this but I can't help it."

" Your heart is braver than your mind in this case John" said the captian laying his hand in his. " Could I have ever lovec loved you, had I not known you better than you know yourself." And hisbrother looked so handsome with the tears sparkling in his eyes, that the colonel thought he must be a decidedly clever fellow to get his brother into such an admiration of him, and so what could he do but give him an order to break camp, and then walk off soberly to see about the evacuation of the town and also its necessary destruction. And at the door however, he stopped for a moment and then coming back he said excitedly;

" Jack I do not know how you feel about it but you'd better get some raincoats for the girl girls but "

" Why John is it raining!"

" Now not naturally; it's coming down like a cloud burst."

So saying he turned quickly on his heels and shut the door after him.

The captian opened his own bed room door adjoining another room and taking the candle set it down on top of a table, then from a small recess he took a large key and put it thoughtfully into the lock of a drawer, and made a sudden pause, while two of the slaves who child like had followed close on his heels stood looking with silent significant glances at the officer. The captian quickly opened the drawer. There were uniform coats and raincoats, and rows of socks and leggings . under oh Mother or a father who may happen to read this has there never been in your house a little loved one now gone. Ah a happy mother one has not her child a slave in a far away country. For once this house too had been occupied by a family for there were little coats and dresses of many a form and pattern, piles of clothing, and eve pairs of litle shoes. There was toys abundance abundance, memorals gathered with many a tear and many a heart break for the parents who lived here had died of a broken heart because of the loss of these dear to them. The captian sat down by the drawer and leaning his hand hi head on his hand over it could not help but weep at thinking of it, wept till the tears fell through hi his fingers into the draw r, then suddenly with nervous haste he began to select the three raincoats, to place over the girls and the boy.

" Captian " said one of the slaves who was a ten year old boy gently touching his arm' Why not give away some of these things for child slaves who might be free."

' My dear boy" said he softly and earnestly' There are many little slaves who died who will be king down from heaven and will be glad t have me do this. I could not find it in my heart to give them away to other children---to any of them that was now happy, but I'd give them to slaves more sorrowful than others are, and I hope God will send his His blessings with them.'

There might be found in this world, many kinds of blessed souls, whose sorrows may all spring & into joy for others, whose earthly hopes hopes laid in the graves with many tears, can be and are usually the seed from which the healing flowers spring, and which shall are balm for the desolate and the distressed. Among such could be the very Abbieannian soldiers and officers, especially this captian who sat by the light of the candle dropping also t tears, while he prepares the proper articles for the two fugitives who had rescued the outcast from the Glandelinian camp. after a while the captian opened a wardrobe, and taking from them de three raincoats but which were too large for the two girls even she sat down busily to a table, and with needle scissors, and thimble at hand, he quietly commenced to make them the proper sizes, and continued busily at it until the clock in the hall way struck eleven, and he heard the galloping of horses near the house of which several stopped before the door.

" Jack" said his brother, coming in, with his raincoat dripping water" You must wake them up now, and be quick about it, for it is reported a big horde of glandelinian cavarly double our number are approaching the town and we must be off before they arrive."

The captian hastily handed him the raincoats and then while he held them proceeded to call the two gir girls. They appeared, and the raincoats were handed to them which they put on and then arranged thus, they appeared at the door, with the little boy in their midst. The colonel hurried them toard the troopers, and the two girls mounted, while the little boy was placed in front of Gertrude for the colonel felt sure she could protect him more than even he could. The colonel then hurriedly mounted his horse, and the captian his. Gertrude Angeline and also jennie Turner rode up to the colonel and put out their hands a hand as soft and as beautiful as probably a person of the celestial regions. They fixed their large dark blue eyes full of earnest meaning, on the colonels face, and appeared to speak. Their lips moved--they tried once or twice, but there came no d sound and Gertrude pointed upward; with a look never to be forgotten; and then she and Jennie took took their places in the column, and the whole party now lighted by the glare of scores of buildings afire rode on with a number of wagon trains behind.

What a situation for a patriotic Abbieannian who had entered the war for the purpose to spur on the movement of his native citizens to pass more stringent resolutions against the child slave horror, and to refuge escaping child fugitives and to reward their harborers and abettors.

This good colonel in his native state of Abbieannia had not been exceeded by any of his brethren brethern at Angelinia Agathia or elsewhere in the sort of brave and unusual noble eloquence which had already won for them imortal reknown. How sublimely he rode on his gray horse and scouting all sentimental weakness of those who would put the welfare of a few miserable fugitives before great Glandelinian interests..

He was as bold as a lion about anything he accomplished or tried to accomplish and " mightily convinced" not only himself but everybody that heard him--but then his idea of any child slave fugitive was only, an idea of children running away from the infernal region itself and the magic of the real presence of the distress which he often witnessed--the imploring childish eye, the frail trembling human hands,--the disparing appeal of helpless agony - these had tried his heart too much. He had never thought however that any Abbieannian girl scout would be bold enough to enter a rebel camp and bear off one of those little beings of suffering, a def nseless child rescued by a scout--like the ones she was escorting to proper places now, and so the colonel was steeled to a purpose, he was a man a soldier, and a down right good hearted one, he was as every one of our readers must known and understand in all cases of his patriotism. As you may feel to exult with him; good brother of the christian countries; for we have some idea that many of you under similiar conditions would not do much better. And even many others; and even the author himself have reasons to know that in many of the Glandelinian armies; and even the most wicked, there are a few noble and generous hearts to whom never was tale of suffering and woe told in vain.Ah good reader is it fair for you to expect of the Abbieannians services which your own brave hearts would not allow you to render were you in the colonels place.. place.!

But be that as it may the colonel might have been a sinner in his day but nevertheless he was in a fair way to atone for it by his night's penance. There had been a period a long period of continuous rainy weather like usually always occurs for an april months, and the swamp had more water in it than usual so that the rich rich soft earth of the Aranturga Run Stream especially near San Salvador as I want to have the reader understand is admirably suited to the right and proper creation of the most beautiful thing a driver of a w. wagon likes to curse most about and that name is mud,--with a capitol MUD.

" and pray my friend what sort of a swamp may that be?" says some stranger who had been accustomed to connect no ideas of a real swamp. Known Know then fair reader that in tog benighted regions of some Calverinian and Angelinian rivers, where they run through almost impassable swamps, where in many places the mud is of most unfathomable and sublime depth, and where any one caught would be buried alive; and probably never find bottom, long road like bridges of ten feet of width and even more are usually made of planks and coated over in their pristine freshness with earth turf and whatever may come at hand, and then the people call it a road, and straight it would be light to walk or ride thereon. But at night no one cares to even enter this beautiful "HeVeN" of bog bogs, lakes, and disease and bottomless quicksands and peak imagination and the like... And in process of time, the rains wash off all the turf and grass that are placed on these log and plank roads, and sometimes things occur which even make these roads unsafe as the planks or the logs logs are moved hither and thither in picturesque fashion and positions, up down and crosswise with diver chasms and ruts of black mud intervening about three feet below the bridge like roads, so that to cross one in black darkness is funk and absolute suicide, and the most dangerous of these bogs is the gray and brown quicksand into which one goes without much hope of rescue so quick does he go through almost like an if it were water.

Over such a dangerous road as this the cavarly colo column was riding along but every two or three of the men had flaring torches and some moved on foot cautiously. The colocolumn rode carefully and succeeded in getting across without mishap the wagon train proceeding along much as follows:---bump. bump. bump. slush; down in the mud horses go the drivers reversing their positions so suddenly as to come without any accurate adjustment against the seat on the other side. The horses stick fast in the mud , while the soldiers ing the accident rops the animals and after various ineffectual pullings and twitchings, just as the colonel is losing all patience, the horses are pulled out of th more and the wagon suddenly rights itself with a bounce, the road crashes in and the two front wheels go down into another abyss and the drivers are thrown out into the very bog itself, and it takes about ten men with ropes to pull them out before they sink bef beyond rescue. Oh Then there is a scund of a shot from somewhere and something hits the colonels hat which instead of knocing it off m jams it over his eyes and nose ite unceremoniously and he considers himself fairly extinguished, as more shots are heard from somewhere the little boy starts crying and shrieking, and some ne outside d livers animated addresses to the sicking horses, an a score of men tug on ropes and lines to draw them out of the bog, but they almost hinder their rescue by floundering and straining and sinking deeper. The wagon goes out of sight in the bog s just as the horses are pulled out. T Then it was evident to get the wagons over the bridge must be repaired and this is done by means of using planks from another road heap lots of work and dangerous toil but finally it is accomplished. Then the train starts across more shots are fired from somewhere, something gives way and a wagon almosts topples toard the edge of the road, and the two drivers fly over on the back seat, one of them encountering the ans hat with his elbows, and both the feet of the other man being suddenly jammed into his comrades abdomen, while his hat flies off in the concussion.

After a few moments with the loss of two wagons the first "bottomless slough" is passed, and the horses of the wagon stop panting,--the drivers rescat themselves, and on goes the column bracing themselves firmly for what is yet to come.

For while only the continuous noise of horses f horses hoofs and the grids grinding of wagon wheels intermingled ast by s of variety with diver side plunges of the vehicles and compound shakes, and the soldiers began to flatter themselves that they ere not so badly off after all.

At last they come to another road across another mud bog and then things commence to happen anew. The horses of the first wagon mistep and with a mare plunge are in the mire, and there is much commotion as soldiers strive to rescue these but this time fail as the horses quick sink beyond sight and are gone forever, the wagon being pulled in just in the drivers ot off in time to save their lives. Finally a lieutenant rides up to the colonel.

He saluted and said" Please sir this is an awful bad spot sir, and part of the r ad is gone ahead. I don't know how we are to cross here sir. I'll think thinking we will have to unload the wagons and have the soldiers carry what they can and use the boards of the carriages for a bridge."

The colonel despairingl dismounts, being being too close to the edge of the bridge, he picks gingerly for some firm foothold, down goes he foot an immeasureable depth.- he tries to pull it up, loses his balance and tumbles over into the mud, and is finished at just in time in a very despairing condition by about six men. But let'r forbear out of sympathy. Soldiers moving through an almost impassable swamp and who had beguiled the night hour in the interesting process of pulling down rail fences and breaking up some wagons to repair a broken road, and then to work desperateing hard to rescue horses and men out of bottomless mudholes, will have a respectful and mournful sympathy with our unfortunate aNational heroes. So lets drop them a tear and pass on.

It was very late in the night when the column emerged and dripping out of a swamp stream and formed column on the bank of at last some solid ground, to now wait for the approach of day as to travel further in such darkness would mean the perishing of all.

For opposite the solid ground there stretched a nothing like a black void that went off to join the darkness of night. Here there was no means of crossin anywhere and the col lerschad said;

" Swamp bog of dangerous mud like quicksand.No passing here."

It took n inconsiderable perseverance to form some kind of a camp here but at last the soldiers were camp by the edge of this bog for the rest of the night. The colonel wh was a tall bristling or e orsen of a fellow full six feet and seven inches rode up to have a place made for the two girls and their young charge. Maybe it is best to give some discription of the colonel here before I go on. He has a very heavy mat of black hair t neatly combed, and a beard of great length the same colole color which gave the worthy colonel an appearance to say the leastnot particularly prepossessing. He stood for a few minutes bef re a tall tent while some soldiers held the torch aloft, anxiously and blinking on the fugitives with a dismal and mystified expression that was truly ludicr us. Yet having nothing of the bearish nature about him but just the skin, in being gifted by nature with a great honest just heart, quite equal to his honest brave heart of frame rather, he had seen since he entered the army witnessingwith most repressed uneasiness the workings of the Glandelinian armies. At last me day the colonels heart had swelled altogether to too big for him to stand the scenes any longer, so he had made it that he to belonged to the dreaded " Night riders" soldiers who in the dark of night make a raid on a child slave plantation or place and force the owners to give up the slaves or receive no quarter.

" Are you sure the Glandelinians will not be able to follow here?" said Certrude as she looked at the red light in the sky which showed the direction the burning town was.

I rather think I am" said the colonel, with some considerable emphasis.

" I thought so " said Jennie urmer. But how can they be prevented?"

" Since we are not across the men are to destroy all roads across the bogs, and if the Glandelinians do somehow come just the same" said the colonel stretching his tall muscular form upward" why I'm here ready for them; and I've got a command of six hundred good sharpshooters, and they'll be ready for them. Give our respect to them" said the colonel" It is no matter how soon they'll come--makes no difference to us; they'll only bury themselves in the bog" added the colonel running his fingers through the shock of hairthat tatched his head, and bursting out into a great laugh.

Weary, jaded, and almost spiritless the two girls dismounted from the horse in front of the door of the tent; and a soldier took down the child. The rough colonel held th torch to her face and uttered a kind of compassionate grunt compassionate grunt, and ushered them into the tent, and placing six guards around it went in. He took a lantren from a wagon and lighting it set it upon a small table and then addressed himself to the girls-

" Now I wish to tell you both of you girls, that you need not be a bit afraid; of any of the Glandelinians coming here. I'm expecting that sort of thing, and I guess you can tell by the explosions you hear the men are blasting the bridges so the rebels not get over. And most Glandelinians that know me and my men know it would not be very safe to try to follow my column to get a slave that has run away or been rescued, and if the Glandelinians do attack my camp because of that I'll take no prisoners; I'll give no quarter. So now you just get some sleep now, as quiet as if your own mothers were rocking you" said he as he went out.

" Why to think of it they are uncommon pretty children" he said to the captian. "Ah we " Ah well handsome girls has cause to be girl scouts, and has the greatest cause to rescue child slaves sometimes if they have any kind of feeling such as decent children and women ought to have. I know all about that."

The captian who had seen many pictures of Angelinia Aronburg and Jennie urmer and had heard much about them in a few words explained briefly their history.

" Ah Now I understand" said the good colonel pitifully. " That's nature for them the brave little girls they are, saving those that are hunted down like a deer or a rabbit, just for having natural feelings, and they did and therefore are doing what the best of men mothers would be doing. I tell you what these terrible things makes me come near swearing, now most than anything." said the colonel as he wiped his eyes with the back of a great freckled n tanned hand. " I tell you waht brother it was months and months before I thought of joining the army, cause I never thought things were really so bad and therefore I never joined the army untill I observed some of these horrors with my own eyes, and then I took right hold, and joined the army and became a colonel ididdnnow and I did not and it is a fact" said the colonel who had all this time been uncorking some very frisky bottled cidar which at this juncture he presented.

I guess it's better t put up camp here untill bright daylight" said the colonel heartily. " Then when we resume the march I'll show you a road that will allow us to cross through the swamp better than the two corduroy roads we came on. Those roads very rain worn and might brisky."

" Have th guards take charge of her carefully " said the colonel briefly.

" Ay,ay" said the captian, with equal conciseness. They saluted, shook hands, and parted for the night..

The early April morning looked gray and drizzling through the window of the main Glandelinian general's headquarters.....it looked down on many dian cast faces, the images f mournful hearts inside the tent of the child slaves. The mes m ss table stood close by the big cook stove, covered with a ragged table cloth, and there were many who were just eating their breakfast,, while Annie was looking over the belongings of the two comer Jannie. Carefully she folded everything with scrupulous exactness, very now and then raising her hand to wipe off the tears that were coursing own her cheek Jannie sat near by eating h r first breakfast in Mylstzes army, with a little bible close beside her on the table---but neither spoke. It was yet very early in in the morning and a few of the child slaves, especially, those who were very young lay asleep still though it was far beyond their usual hour of rising. Jannie who had, to the full, the gentle domestic heart of any little christian child got up and walked over to the sleeping children.

" It's far past the time that they should get up" she said. " If they did this in Manleys army they'd been killed."

"Annie did not answer. only continued folding up the clothing and putting them carefully away and finally finishing with a despairing plunge she sat down to th the breakfast table but instead of eating she lifted up her voice and wept...

" I suppose we must be resigned, but oh God how can we. If I only knew where my brother and sister were going from Manleys army as I've heard or how they'll be treated I could stand it. Mylette said that if he can not locate them to redeem them, but no one ever lives long as a slave in Manleys wicked army. The Glandelinian soldiers kill them. I've heard of the way they work them in the fortifications, trenches and the like. Why don't the confounded christians win this war and hurry up about it?"

" There'll be the same god the place they go, Annie, as there is here or at Manleys'es" Said James her friend who had followed her in the pursuit of Angelinia Arunburg.

All" Well" said Annie" I know there will be---" but God let's the most dreadful thing of all happen often without putting a stop to it. It does not give me any comfort that way. What right have they to make us slaves anyway; just because the wicked Glandelinia nation h had placed other christian nations under her power."

" We are all in the hands of the blessed Lord" said James" so there is nothing that can go any further than he will allow it---and there is one thing we could thank him for and that we are in Mylettes army, and not in Manleys..If we were to be resold to Manleys officers then it would be worse. But here we are safe, sometime we,ll be exchanged for glandelinian soldiers held prisoners in the National army,--and what comes then will be the best, and the Lord God He'll help us all--I know he will, he always has. I heard Mylettes has a record of 25,000 slaves already passed from his hands into the Nationals for the return of prisoners, and that is a great number."

Ah what brave manly hearts of these little boyslaves--smothering their own sorrow and longing for the face of their parents and freedom, to comfort the friends and fellow slaves. James spoke with a thick utterance, and with a bitter choking in his throat;p--but he spoke brave and strong."

" Let's think on god's Mercy and love for us for he loves us more than those who do not suffer" he added tremulously as if he was quite sure he needed to think very hard on themindood.

" God's mercies." said Annie" don't see no such thing. No matter what this slavery of children is for it ain't right; it ain't fair; it's wicked and cruel, and why should God allow it to be so if he love He loves children as much as the bi bible says. The National National armies never ought to l allow it so they get beaten so often in the battles. . we deserve the same freedom as all other children have, and we deserve it twice over. Nothing can take that idea out of my head. All those that sells heart(Hearts love and hearts blood, and pars children from their parents, to make money, the Lord will pay them back in a way they won't like."

" Annie, now if you love me as you say you do, you won't talk so, when perhaps some thing good may come bye and bye. And I,ll tell you Annie it goes against me to hear one word spoken against the christians. Was it not they that won many battles in the past, and won't they win in the long run. ? It's nature no natural I should think a heap of them. and th y they can't be expected to lick the glandelinians everytime theres a battle no matter how righteous the cause. and Manley is a much better general than any of the christians in dilitary ways, and naturally the National generals don't know that yet. Set John Manley alongside all Glandelinian generals next to Mylettes---who had the best military training in his younger days. and the wivians would never have let this come could they have foreseen it. I know they wouldn't."

" Well there's something wrong about it somewhere" said Annie in whom a stubborn sense of justice was a predominant trait. ' " I just can't make outwhere it is but there's somet; something wrong somewhere, I'm sure of that. Maybe they,ll never win."

" You ought to ask God to help us--He's above all there is not a sparrow that falls without Him knowing it."

" That does not comfort me any, but I believe it ought to" said Annie. " But there is no use talking, I must eat my breakfast cause otherwise I,ll never be able to work."

In order to ace appreciate the woeful sufferings of the child slaves in Manleys and other glandelinian armies it must be remembered that the feelings of so many child slaves are unusually strong. They are even naturally daring and int rprising, even though n me loving and affectionate and when grown to a better age and seeing the opportunity they won't hesitate on insurrection and when thousands of slaves rebell they become like save savages and give no quarter. But add to this, all the terrors with which ignorance invests the unknown, and add to this the feeling that sellinghto the wicked glandelinian armies isset before the child slave as the last and worse severity of pu punishment out side of capitol punishment for running away and for rebellion . Therefore the threat that terrifies more than whipping, death, or torture of any kind is the threat of being sold to a wicked and cruel master. If we were among them we too could hear this feeling expressed by them; and seen the unaffected horror and terror wi with which they will sit n in their leisure hours and tell frightful stories of the wicked glandelinian armies where slaves are sent to and--

" That dreadful Glandelinian army from whose ranks, no child slave lives to see another day"

Many of the soldiers of the Nationals recieving runaway slaves into their campstold the officers o of escaping from unusually brutal masters, and that they were induced to brave the perils of escape in almost every case by the very desperate terror and g horror with which they regarded being sold to a wicked Glandelinian army, under wicked cruel generals - a doom which was hanging either overthemselves or brothers and sisters. This nerves the child slave, naturally patient, timid and yet interpriseing, with most heroic courage despite their age and leadsthem to suffer hungr hunger, ; cold, pain, sickness, the perils of the wilderness, the dangers of being caught in unknown bogs and quicksands, and the more dread penalties of recapture which is " burning at the stake".

Annie was now eating her breakfast, but the poor little soul had expanded all her little energies on this feast, had filled and dressed a captured chicken, and prepare prepared her cornecake with unusual exactness, justto her own taste and for the taste of others, and brought out certain mysterious juces of jars, some preserves that were never produced except on extreme occasions.

" Goodness James" said jack the bobbed haired boy" ain't we got a good breakfast" atthe same time catching a fragment of a chicken. Annie gave him a piece of pie also.

" There now don't say you never got nothing."

" Thanks Annie" said Jack gently.

" Well I can't help it' said Annie hiding her face in her apron" As we all share the same sorrow, and the same hardships, it is our duty to share our best between ourselves."

The other child slaves stood quite still looking first at James and at Annie, while the youn or ones began an imperious, commanding cry.

" There" Said Annie wiping her eyes and taking p one of the youngest of the slaves. " we don't look at me that way it breaks my heart--all of you do stop pining and eat something. This here is my cleest nicest chicken a soldier found it during a forage and was kind enough kind enough to give it to me. Every body shall have some, you poor things. Some day may come when you'll too have masters who are sicked and cross to you."

The slaves needed no second invitation and went in with a great e zeal for the meals and it was well they did so as otherelse they would have fasted a o more than it was necessary for them to do.

" Now " said Annie,bustling about after the breakfast" I must pt Jannie's clothes in our wagon. 'o t Just as not your future master may come and take them away. I know many of these glandelinians they are as mean as the very devils themselves. Well now your skirt is folded in this corner of the trunk, so be careful, because you may never have another like this. Then here's your winter and summer underwear, and they are new shoe. I took off your stockings last night which you forgot to remov and mended the holesin them. But the Lord will take care of you so never fear. But if you are taken from Mylettes army who then will take care of you?" said Annie again overcome laid her head on the table, and sobbed. Tothink if you get in the hands of a cruel master no one will take care of you sick or well. I don't see any reason whatever why us child slaves should be good at all."

The boys and girls having eaten everything there was in the breakfast table but the dishes began to tin think o of the case themselves, and seeing the girl and some others crying and jannielooking sad began to whimper and put their hands to their eyes. Jannie had a smaller kid on her knees and was letting the child enjoy herself to her hearts content scratching her face and w illingther bobbed hair and occasionally breaking out into clamourous expesions of delight evidently arising out of her own I internal reflections.

" Yes cry away poor baby" said Annie" Your time will come too by and by, you'll live to see your friend sol sold or yourself to a wicked master like my sister has seen, and every one of us will be sold a dozen times I just as like as not before the christians win th- war, and it ain't no use in child slaves having anything at all."

Here one of the boys called at out" There is general Dargin coming in."

" He is only a glandelinian general and what good can he do us, so what has he a right to come for!" said Annie.

The General entered. Annie set a chair for him in a manner decidedly gruff and crusty, but the general did not seem to notice the action or the manner. He looked pale and anxious.

" Annie" he said " I come to tell you-----" and stopping suddenly, and regarding the silent group, he sat down in the chair, and lookedout of the tent apparently with an indifferent look.

" please general please don't---don't " said Annie as she saw the general had tears in h his eyes and bursting out in her turn, and for a few minutes they all wept in company.

they all kept in company and in all those years they stood together, the general and the lowly little slaves melted away all the strong heart burnings and anger of the oppressed for they saw that in Mylletze's army at least there were human Glandelinian general Glandelinian generals who could and would at least feel for them. Oh you who could have visited the oppressed child slaves dear reader know that everything your money could buy given with a cold averted face is not worth one innocent tear shed in real sympathy.

For one has been witnessed done to slaves of these kind in the Glandelinian army even the coldest and most cowardly Anne Angelinians have taken great risks to save one even if they had to go through" hell " to do so.

" My dear Annie" said general Dargin " I can't give you anything to do you any good, and no one can locate the sister of yours to bring her here to Mylletze's army. But I tell you solemnly and before God that soldiers of this army and even of the Nationals will keep trace of her for I released some dozen national soldiers with pictures of your sister in their possession and when they reach the National lines will get in touch with the Gemini and they will bring her back if she ain't killed, and till then trust in god."

Here the slaves sailed out that the colonel himself was coming and then an unceremonious kick pushed pon open the door, Colonel Holden stood there in very ill humm humor having ridden hard the night before and being not at all pacified by his ill success in recapturing his prey.

" Come you brat are you ready" Ol child slave sire said he taking off his hat and saluting the general.

" There are no such things as brats in this army" said Dargin: " Ne t Next time please omit that word. I'll take the little girl to general Dargin myself. You can go y to your quarters."

Annie ordered the trunk and getting p ,looked gruffly on the colonel her tears seeming suddenly turned to sparks of fire. Johnnie rose up meekly to follow the general while Annie and a number of slaves trailed onbehind the colonel scowling but going off as he was commanded. A another officer walked up to the general and detained him for a few minutes talking with him in an earnest manner, and while he was thus talking the whole hundred of child slaves proceeded to a wagon that stood ready harnessed at the tent door and general Mylette was on horseback beside it. A crowd of child slaves of all ages and sizes stood gaz thickly around it to have a look at the new slaves.

" Why Annie she is a little beauty, and looks better than we do" said one of the girl slaves who had looked at her freely, yet noticing the gloomy calmness with which Annie stood by the wagon.

" She certain is" she said l king grimly after the departing colonel she was still within sight believing if we had the chance hewould have run off with Jannie himself to see her in the place of the boy she was stolen from him. " But I'm glad she is going to be Mylette's slave."

" Get in" said Dargin to Jannie as he strode through the crowd of slaves, who looked at him with some respect. Jannie got in, and Dargin drawing out from under the wagon seat two heavy blankets made them fast around Jannie so she would not get cold or wet as it was raining. A smothered cry of surprise ran through the whole circle, and the voice of the colonel at a distance spoke}

" Your Excellency I assure you that such care of a slave is entirely unnecessary."

" Don't back about that" said Dargin. ' You have lost one talked of two thousand dollars from this here camp because you do not know how to treat them, and therefore it is better to mind your own business."

" What else could that brutal colonel expect of him" " said Annie indignantly," I'm glad I played that trick on him so he never captured that Aron Arenburg girl and the boy. It serves him right."

" I'm sorry" said Jannie that " Adele Dee Fob happens to be away."

Adele-de Fob had been taken away by another slave owner who happened to be a christian spy in disguise and having departed early in the morning before Jannie's sale had ben been made public and therefore had left without hearing of it.

" Give my love and friendship to Adele-De-Fob" she said earnestly.

Dargin whipped p the horse, for it was seen the whole army was on the move, and with a steady, curious look on her face, Jannie was whirled away, Dargin being given orders by Mylletze to watch her carefully. General Mylletze had resumed his advance. He had bought Jannie under a driving necessity, to get her out of the power of a Glandelinian general whom he respected---yes respected as a woman does a rattlesnake, and his first feeling after the success of the bargain had been that of relief. But general Dargine reflections about Annie's sister awoke something else in his mind, and Annie's deep sorrow increased the sympathetic side of his feelings so that he was determined if possible to find her sister and either buy her or take her which ever way it was possible. He said to himself that he had a right to do it, --that every body on owned slaves in Monleys army treated them worse than mats, and that all did it without the excuse of any necessity whatever--and therefore he could not be satisfy his own feelings until he secured the girl, and that he might not witness the unpleasant scenes he decided to quickly resume his advance, but fighting in his heart that he had ever been torn under the Glandelinian flag, and cursing heaven first having made him an under another, but he had to serve flag, and cursing heaven first having made him an under another, but he had to serve no gland linia and there was no way out of it, whether he liked its cause or not and serve no gant. Jannie and Dargin rattled on along the dusty road, with the army moving alongside in long columns, moving past very familiar spot, until the bounds of the familiar camping ground were fairly passed, and they found themselves out in the open pike, and the joint army was forming out in wider columns and long, with a long train of wagon trains and artillery and cavalry forces wherever you would look. After they had ridden about a mile a portion of the army halted until the van would move on again, and therefore general Dargin suddenly drew up his horse beside the door of a country blacksmithe shop, when riding up into the place he decided to have a little attention given to his horses shoes.

" See if the shoes are coming off" said the general, pointing to the house. " You might be a national but nevertheless as I won't allow the army todo anything wrong around here. I hope you will at least shoe my horse. I'll pay for it."

" No I'm a glandelinian " said the blacksmith. Goodness where did you get that little slave. Bin jan just came by her with a general some time ago. He ain't sold her nowcto you han he?"

" She is sold, but to Mylletze" said Dargin.

" Well if that ain't a surprise and Manley wanted her so bad" said the smith" Who would have thought of it. Why you do not make the slaves walk like Manleys generals do. You have them ride in wagons."

" Yes, a yes " said Dargin" But we do not want to risk our slaves a running off. Them stupid rascally generals of Manleys army in does not care what happens to their slaves, and don't care for nothing, never dan expect them to stick by, but when they got good masters masters they hate, it like sin to run off unless of course they are exchange to the Nationals for a prisoner."

" Well" said the smith, feeling among his tools" Them Glandelinian armies under under the Manleys general is not put the likely place any any child slave as never been there want's to go, they die tolerable fast in Manleys army and elsewhere don't they?"

" Well yes, --tolerably fast, but a little faster than you think, but their dying comes from hard work, undernourishing, ill treatment, being killed outright, and according to the nature of the climate and other things, and one thing as ben being murdered, indeed they die so fast as to keep up the child slave market up pretty brisk" said Dargin. " That is why Mylette hates Manley, and blames him for the ferocity of the nationals who gives no quarter to child slave holders and traders."

" Well a fellow can not help thin king that it is a mighty big pity if little girl yonder would go down to be fairly ground up in one of those Glandelinian army armies."

" Well she got a fair chance as a general brought her all the way from Manleys to save her from him. Mylette promishes to do well by her and I know he will as he treats all his slaves almost as if they were his own kids. ' he" He'll exchange her to the Nationals the first chance he gets, and then she'll be free anyway."

" Does she have any brothers and sisters anywhere?"

" I do notknow if she has any or not."

Jannie was sitting very quietly on the outside of the shop watching the movements of the various divisions of the army as they marched by with interest and some curiousity. Suddenly he heard the quick short clip clip click of a horses hoof behind him and before she could fairly awake from her surprise young Adele-De Fob sprang up to her in the covered wagon threw his arms tumultuously round her and was sobbing with energy.

" I could clare it is real mean. I do not care what they say, any of them. They can't find Annie's sister and Manley has frustrated them. It's a nasty mean shame. If I am a man some day and this war continues I'll run away and join the christians" said the boy with a kind of subdued howl.

" Ded De Fob it is good you come' said Jannie. " I could notbardly bear to go off with out seeing you. It does me real good and I'm glad you are here. "

Her Jannie tightened the blankets around her and the boys fell on them.

" What good care the general takes of you" he exclaimed. " I wish I could goalong with you that I have to go away to night. I'd like to knockmy master down I would."

" No you would be foolish De Fob and you must not talk so no loud. They say he is a christian spy in disguise and therefore you will change your good luck to anger him."

" Well I won't then if that isthe case---but only think of it ain't it a shame! They never sent for me nor sent me any word, and , if it had not been for James I should not have heard of it. I will you I told them all some thing I did."

" That was not right I'm afraid De Bof Fob."

" Can't Can't I cannot help it. Look here Jannie' said he turning his back to the shop and speaking in a mysterious tone. " I've brought you a pessity."

" Oh I could not think of taking it Adele-De-Fob as it would not be right" said Jannie

" But you must and shall take it" said the boy----Look here I told Annie I'd do it and will move.

But you must and shall take it" said the boy----Look here I told Annie I'd do it and will move d

He don't act Foolish ade-De-Fob for surely it will not do me any good."."....."

mmmmm'll I Well I won't for your sake jannie" said The bo, buming placing the bunary around her little knock" but there now button your jacket tightly around it, and keep it, and remember that every time you play on it t at I'll come down after you some day and if you are not free yet get my master to buy you. Annie and I have been talking about it. I told her not to fear, I'll see to it, Itll I'll tease my masters life out if he does not do it."

" Oh laddie you must not talk so about your new master when he is a christian spy in disguise. He did not buy for to be a slave even though you'll work. I'll bet he'll make a spy out of you too."

" Good Lord Jannie I do not mean anything bad."

" Ain't and now ad le-De-Fob" said Jannie" when you are far away with your new master you must be a good boy, and remember how many hearts will then be good for you. Don't be getting into any of them foolish ays ways boys has of tting to big to mind a master who turns out to be a friend and who will only use you seemingly as a slave as long as he and you are within the Glandellinian camp. Tell you what De Fob the Lord gives many good things many times over, but he either don't give you your parents twice or even a good master twice and one who turns out to be a christian spy. You'll never see your freedom if you live to be a hundred years old if you do not do the right thing.

A christian expects gratitude lad so now you hold on to him, and be a comfort and a help to him, that's my own good boy---you will now won't you."

" yes indeed I will, Jannie dear" said Adele-de-fob, seriously.

' And be careful of your speaking when you do work for him, is Fob. Remember young bo, boys may forget themselves and accidentally betray their good master when he is a spy. But I hope you'll never let fall words that will cause his arrest. You ain't offended my boy."?

" No indeed Jannie dear, you always gave me good advice."

" I know best you know" said the girl stroking the boys fine curly hair with her little little hand.but speaking in a very voice as tender as an angels. ' And I see all that is in you. Oh De Fob you'll have everything when you are with him, and you'll grow up to be a great learned spy and soldier, and all the good nations will be proud of you. Be a good boy like you were when you were in the tent with me, and to a christian like your new master now master. Remember your Creator in the days of your youth, De Fob."

" I'll be a real good boy, Jannie I tell youSaid " said De Fob' I'm going to be the best of all, and don't you be discouraged. We'll see each other again. as I told Annie this morning, I'll have a place builded for you some day. Oh you'll have good times yet. I've heard the Manleys are winning nothing at all. We'll all be free soon."

General dargin now came at the door remounting his freshly shoed horse.

" Look here general' said the lad as the general got p" You'll take good care of Jannie won't you? "

" You are welcome to anything you ask" said the general. ' I almost wish she were mine instead of a slave."

" I should think all the Glandellinians should be ashamed to buy children like that and chain them up like cattle. I shoul should think they'd feel mean.'

' Well so long as Manleys armies do it, there is nothing to stop them. " said Dargin. " We buy to exchange, and that is better than selling and buying like Manley does. Our buying and trading is ransoming them you know."

" Well good by Jannie; and keep up your courage as Mylelze will be good to you" said Ade-De-Fob.

" Good by my good boy' said Jannie looking fondly and admiringly at him. " God almighty Bless you. ah there are not many child slaves like you' she said in the fullness of her heart as the frank boyish face was lost to her view. away he went and Jannie took a until the clatter of his horses heels died away. yet over her heart there seemed to be a warm spot where the boyish hands had placed that precious gospel. Jannie put up her hand and held the crucifix close to her heart.

" Now I'll tell you wha what' said general Dargin, as he came up to the wagon. ' We Glandellinians mean to start good and fair with you as we generally do with our slaves, and I'll tell you how to begin with, you treat us fair, and we'll treat you fair, as we are now never hard on our slaves and never work them. Calculates to do the best we can for them. Now you see you better just nettle down comfortable, be cheerful, and you'll have good times with us, and some day, you'll be exchanged, and if you don't it ain't no fault of our's."

Jannie assured general Dargin that she had no intentions of any sinister misdemavior or of running of. in fact the exhortation seemed rather a superfluous one to a man or to a slave rather who was to be so trusted by a Glandellinian general, as this never happened to her in months away from which she came. But general Dargin had got into the habit of commencing his relations with his stock of slaves with little exhortations of this nature, calculated as he dreamed, to inspire cheerfulness and confidence in the slaves and prevent the necessity of any unpleasant occurrence. and here for the present we take our leave of Jannie, to pursue the fortunes of other characters in this great big story.

CHAPTER FOURTY TWO.....

IN WHICH A FUGITIVE GETS INTO AN UNUSUAL FRAME OF MIND, A SELECT INCIDENT FOR MYLETZE IN THE ADVANCE. AN INCIDENT OF BUYING MORE SLAVES. THE ARMY ENCAMPS AT SAN PEDRO.

IT was late on a drill drizzling afternoon during a distant battle that could be easily heard raging around San Salvador with frightful fury, that a strange traveler at the door of a small house a farming establishment some distance north of P San Pedro town in the angelinia state. In a bar room he found assembled quite a miscellaneous company of Glanuelinian officers whom stress of weather, and other duty had driven to this place and yet the place presented the usual scenery of a such reunions generall specially when a battle was raging somewhere. Great tall raw boned glandelinian officers at I attired in splendid uniforms and trailing their loose joints over a vast territoy ith the easy military lounge peculiar to the race, rifles stacked away in the corner, shot pouches, game bags, officers of staffs, and some child slaves were the characteristic features in this picture. At each end of the fire place sat two great stout general officers with their chai rchairs tipped back, their hats on their heads, and the heels of their muddy riding boots rested reposing sublimely on the mantle piece----a position I must inform my readers decidedly favorable to the turn of reflection incident to the nature of Glandellinian officers. The stranger who entered, and who stood behind the bar was of great size, good natured, yet loose jointed like the glandellinian officer officers I with an enormous amount of hair on his head, and a great tall hat on top of that. In fact every Glandellinian officer in the room bore on his head this character istic emblem of soldiers sovereiginity, and being alik alike they reposed with true military haughtiness. In truth it appeared to be the characteristic mark of every offic r in the room. But some were them tipped recklessly to one side----these were your soldiers of fortune, jolly, and easy free Glandellinian soldiers, some had them jammed down over their noses, and looked like hard charax characters, thorough men who when they were their hats wanted to wear them, and to wear the them just as the had a mine to, there were those who had them set far over back--wide awake glandellinian officers, who wanted a clear prospect, while careless officers, who did not know or care, how their hats sat, had them sinking about in all directions.

The various Glandellinian hats though all alike and tolerably high like black stove pipes with big flumes in them in fact were quite a Shakespeurian study indeed.

Divers child slaves, in half naked conditions however, were scuttling about, hither and thiter, without bring to pass any very particular results, except expressing not to great a willingness to turn over evetything in creation for the benefit of master and his guests. Add to this picture a jolly cracking rollicking fire going rejoicingly up a great wide chimney--the outer door and every window being set wide open and the windo curtains flapping and snapping in a good stiff breeze of damp raw air, to add to the distant tones of the battle, and you have the idea of a the jollities of the last tavern pirated by a Glandellinian civilian.

The motley Glandellinian soldier of general Mylelzes army migh might be a good illustration of the doctrine of transmitted instic instincts and peculiarities. Most of them before the outbreak of the war, or rather all ofthem so to speak were mighty hunters, and the like---men who lived in the woods all their lives, and slept under the trees, and under the free open heavens, with the very stars to hold their candles, and now they have to act as if the house or tent was his general camp, compelled to wear his hat at all hours, to keep all the doors and windows open if he in is in a captured city winter and summer, that he may get enough air for his great lungs, calls everybody or a new coming soldier of his side a " New body," with nonchalant bonhommie, and is altogether the frankish easiest, most jovial of the Glandellinians living, though terribly ferocious in other aspects and the probable most dreaded of all Glandellinians known and the most most numerous, and inexhaustive.

Into such an assembly of these free and easy, yet dangerous Glandellinians, our new and mysterious stranger entered. He was a tall thick set man, carefully dressed indeed very loudly dressed, but his countenance was quite rather good natured though stern and high spirited, and he was something rather fussy and particular about his appearance. He was very careful of a valise he had and also his umbrella bringing them in with his own hands, and resisting pertinaciously all offers from the various child slaves to relieve him of them. He looked around the bar room with rather an anxious air and retreating with his possessions to the warmest corners, disposed them under his chair sat down, and rather keen suspiciously and doggedly up at the north Glandellinian General whose heads made their meeting at the end of the mantlepiece and was spit ing splitting from right to left with a courage and energy rather alarming to gentlemen of weak nerves and peculiar particular habits.

" I say stranger how air you" said the aforesaid officer firing an honery salute of tobacco juice in the dire direction of the new arrival.

" Well I reckon I am all right as far as you are concerned but please keep your tobacco juice to your own side of the place" was the reply of the other, as he dodged with some dieglist the threatening honor. " I'm not used to be spit at and its not safe for even a man in a unfire mto do so to me."

" any news?" said the respondent taking out a strip of tobacco, and a large hunting knife from his pockets. " Any news about the National troops coming this this way."

" Not that I know of" said the gentleman. " I'm surprised you don't call them christian dogs."

" well as far as Mylstze's concerned they are not. Do you want a chew"?" said the first speaker handing the stranger a piece of tobacco the size of a mans hand with a decided decidedly brotherly air.

" No thank you it don't agree with me not at least chewing" said the man refusing it. " But I smoke cigarettes." and he quickly produced one lit it and proceeded to smokinb smoking as if he intended to first consume it by fire and then swoll swallow the remainder smoke and all."

" Don't chew but smoke eh." said the general easily and stowing away the morsel morsel in his own mouth in order to keep up the supply of tobacc juice, for the general benifit of his taste. The stranger uniformly gave a little start when ever his long sided Glandelinian acquaintance fired, in his direction, and this being observed by his uniformed companion, and the fact that he was drawing out a long knife with a threatening look he very good naturedly turned his artillery fire of tobacc juice to another direction and proceeded to storm one of the child slaves who sat near by with a degree of military tarlet fully sufficient to take a city, and to cause the youngster to quickly get up and go elsewhere with some slight complaint as to " Look out where you are spitting mister Mister I or I'll tell my master."

' what's that?" said the stranger observing a mb of the officers and even privates framed in a group around a large sign or hanub ll handbill to get your fill.

" Child slave to be advertized" said one of the officers, briefly looking quizzicly quizzigly at the stranger. The stranger therefore rose up and after carefully adjusting his vales and umbrella and ordered six of the slaves to guard it with their very lives proceededly deliberately to take out his spectacles and fix them on his use nose, and this operation being performed, read as follows.

" Taken away from a abbleannian girl spy or taken away from camp by a abbleannian girl spy by the name of Gertrude angelinia Aronburg or gertrude Angelina or some name or other, my child slave boy Hendro Galls. Said slave is six years old, only less than four feet in height, very white for skin, has black curly hair and has a slave brand on his chest, arm, hand and in back of neck. His a kidnapper is a very intelligent christian spy, speaks handsomely, can read and write, like a man, and knows every military way about both the christian dogs and the glandelinian camp. Being disguised she will probably try to pass as a Glandelinian girl scout, has been wounded on shoulder and leg. I will give fourty thousand Pesatoes dead or alive and an extra sum for full proof that she and the slave are dead."

THeAnd The stranger read this advertisement from end to end in a low voice as if he were studying it. The long legged Glandelinian general who had been besieging the child slave so that she ran away, now took down his cumbrous length with a considerable crash, of his heavy feet that shook the floor as if there was an earthquake, and rearing aloft his tall form as if he was some unusual story tale giant, he walked up to the advertisement in only one stride and to the surprise of all all very deliberately spit a full discharge of tabocco juice on it.

" That's what I think about that" said he briefly briefly, and then sat down again with force as if he expected the chair to hold a piano.

" By your excellency, for why did you do that" said the man who tended bar. " are you a christian dog in disguise?"

" Whether I'm a christian dog or not, I'll do the same to the writer of that paper if he was here" said the long man coolly resuming his old employment of cutting tobacco. any officer who allows a christian girl scout to get away with a child slave so easily and even who can't find any better way to treat him deserves to lose him. Such papers as these are a shame to the Glandelinian nation, that's my mind right out, if anybody wants to know, and as to me being a christian dog sir you'll find yourself placed under arrest if you do not keep your trap shut. I a christian dogs. I'd fight them in hell anyday. the slave stealers."

" Well now that's a fact" said the proprietor as he made an entry in his book. " But all christian dogs are opposed to child slavery, and seeing you spitting at the bill board made me think you was so."

" That's enough about that" said the general. " I'm not opposed to child slavery at all and will fight to keep them even when I'm in my grave" said the long general bringing his fist down on the table with a resounding bang. " I've got a big gang of slaves in my part of the camp and I just tell them' Boys girls " says I Runaway if you like. dig pur anytime you wish to get away to the christian lines just when ever you want to. I never shall come to look for you whether you die out in the fields or not. That's the way I keep mine. Let them little brats know they are free to run away any time and it n just makes them afraid to even want to run a mile though the National army may be only that far off. More than all that I've got papers for them all recorded, in case I get killed in the fights and they know it, and I tell you stranger there ain't a glandelinian general in all general Mylstzes army gets more of out of their slaves than I do and Mylstze will tell you himself. The papers I have prevents anybody else, glandelinian or christian from getting them. These papers bring them into adoption in families in Glandelinia states and frees them so they are no longer slaves when I die. Why my slaves have been sent with messages within various christian lines, and brought me back the dispatches all straight, time and again. It stands to reason they should. Treat them like rats and you'll make sneaking vicious rats out of them, treat them like little humans what they are body and soul, and you'll have friends out of them. I do not allow one single slave of mine to do any work. They are just property that's all." and the honest Glandelinian general in his warmpth endorsed this moral sentiment by firing a perfect feu de jois at the handbill from where he sat and hit it too...

" I thighk think you are altogetner in the right friend" said the stranger--- and " and this girl who took away this little boy slave is a fine girl I'll tell you, no mistake about that. Though I have no company with her, and though I have never seen her I've heard so much of her that I know she is a great kid. She has a sister who sister she it is claimed is dead but which the Nationals believe is mysterously missing and she was an ingenious child too, who invented plans that no one could forsee, a really valuable affair, its gone to use however in many Glandelinian armies for the rebel cause instead of the Gland-linian as it is expected. General Johnston Jackuss" AHEM I mean Jacken Manley has the patent of the plans."""""""

" I'll warrent you" said the general" Manley holds it and makes good the efforts of his own armies out of it, and yet turns around and causes the mysterolous disappearance of of that brave girls sister. if I had, fair chance, great a general though Manley is, I'd sure mark him, I reckons, no that he'd carrybit forever not only all his life but to the infernal regions where he should have been long ago the old butcher..."""

" These knowing christian girl spies, especially like the Vivian Girl Princesses and the like are always aggravating and saucy to our holy cause" said a course looking Glandelinian officer from the other side of the room" That's why they always place themselv thems-lves in such grave danger. if they behaved themselves they wouldn't. Of course if they come around our armies it won't be so bad but they'll be rank fools to keep pestering the Manleys."

" well to say the Lord may have made them that way and its a hard squeeze getting them to stop their dangerous work as long as this a quarrel with the Abbleannian and Glandelinia governments continue" said the general dryly.

" Bright christian girl spies are too great an advantage to the National cause" continued the other, well intrenched in a course unconscious obtuseness from the contempt of his superiorvofficer and opponent in arguments" what's the use of Manley and his generals having good armies, tarlets and all these things of military use, if they can't keep the Vivian girls from meddling with them. ? Why though they don't lead in battles, and do no actual fighting in them themselves, they are the leaders of the nation all the National generals are under them well even their father and uncle so to say. So what use can the Manley generals make even of the patent he stole of Annie Aronburg when her dangerous sister sister and these Vivian girls and the wild cat Jennie Turner interferes with his plans. if I had an of those professional girl kid spies I'd just sell them to the maddest and insanest Glandelinian child owner there is on the whole earthe. They must be captured some day, or down goes glandelinia and her cause, like a man sinking in quicksand."

" Id if you think that much about them better try and capture themselv them your self and get the reward Manley has offered for their capture dead or alive" said the general scornfully. " You talk a lot but you don't mean anything, and yet what they usually do to the Manleys is good for them at that."

Here the conversation was interrupted by the approach of a galloping horse. The horse appeared to be a fiery steed and a well dressed " Glandelinian boy scout" sat in the saddle, with another lad riding alongside of him. The whole party of generals and other Glandelinian officers examined the new comers with the interest, yet with some little anxiety and suspicion with a air which any Glandelinian still usually examine every new comer they do not feel sure of. The lad who arrived first was of twelve or less years of age with a light spanish complexion, fine expressive gray eyes, and long bobbed hair also of a girl say blackness. He had a well formed rolling nose, straight thin lips and the ad admirable contour of his finely formed limbs and arms impressed the whole company instantly as if the lad was something very uncommon. He and his companion with some haught, suspicious and defiant air walked easily in among the company of officers and man and with a nod indicated to some of the slaves where to put his knapsack, saluted Glandelinia style to the officers, and with a large round hat in his hand walked up leisurely up to the bar and gave his name as Francis Penrodie, Omarlu state Glandelinia.

Turning with a military air, he sauntered up to the advertisement, and read it over.

' Jimmie ' he said to his companion" seems to me we met a girl about something, like this with a little boy up at San Salvator, did we not?"

" yes Francis"said Jimmie ' only I'm not sure about the brand marks on the lad."

" well I did not have any time to look of course" said the other lad, with a careless yawn. Then walking up to the Landlord he desired him to furnish him and his younger companion with a strictly private apartment for the night, as he had some writing to do immediately.

The Landlord gave an order, and a relay of about eight child slaves girls and boys little and big were seen whizzing about like a covey of partridges bustling and hurrying treading on each other s toes and tumbling over each other in their zeal to get the room for the boys ready at once, while they both seated themselves easily on chairs in the middle of the room and one of the lads entered into conversation with the man or officer rather who sat next to him. The stranger whose name we'll say was known as Lorde Hendre akille from the time of the entrance of the two boys had regarded the tallest with an air of disturbed and uneasy curiousity. He felt sure he had met and been acquainted with him somewhere before(in some christian camp) but he could not remember to save his life life.

Every few moments when the lad had spoke or moved, or smiled, he would start and fix his eyes on him, and then suddenly estimate them as the bright dark gray eyes encountered his with such unconcerned coolness. At last a sudden recollection seemed to flash upon him for he stared at the strange boy scout in gray with such an air of blank amazement and alarm, that at last he arose from the chair and walked over to him.

" Mr Akillic, I think" said he in a tone of recognition, and extending his hand, " I beg your pardon I did not rege recognize you before. I see you remember me, Master Penrodie of Glandelinia, Emaria State."

" Ye---yes ---y s my lad" said the stranger, like one speaking in a dream. Just then a child slave entered, and announced to the two boys that their room was read ready.

" Jimmie" see to the trunks" said his elder companion negligently, then addressing himself to the man Mr Akillic, he added" I should like to have a few moments conversation with you on some important business, in my room if you please."

Mr Akillic followed him, as one who walks in his sleep and they proceeded to a large upper chamber where a large new made fire was crackling, and various child slaves flying about(maybe they had wings) putting the finishing touches to the arrangements. When all was done, and the slaves had departed and the boys companion had returned, the elder boy deliberately locked the door, and putting the key in his pocket faced about, and folding his arms on his bosom, looked at Akillic full in the face.

" Joice Vivian" said the man.

" Yes and you are Hendre Durgar" said the disguised girl!

" I could not have thought it."

" I am so near pretty well disguised and as you see I fancy' said the Princess with a smile. Just got here this morning on a train which I rode very often changing from from one to two of them. A little walknut bark has made my white skin a genteel brown and I've died my golden hair black with shoe ploish so you see no one is able to recognize me at all."

" Oh but Joice this is a most dangerous game you are playing and so far from your own army. I could not have advised you to do it."

" ' I did it on my own responsibility" said Joice with the same proud smile. " This boy here is my companion Marco Penrod."

We must remark that Joice Vivian was by her fathers side of a strange Spanish descent and so were her sisters. Her mother was one of the highest bred of her race marked out by by her own unusual and p regional beauty to be a queen queen and the mother of children who were to see through the greatest war ever known. From one of the best of Kingly families she and her sisters had inherited a set of fine Spanish new European features and a high indomitable spirit. From her mother she recieved the same unusually white complexion of her skin amply compensated by its accompanying rich dark blue eyes. The tinge of her skin and the golden hair made her look altogether different than other persons of their races and as gracefulness of movement and girlish manners had always been perfectly natural to her yet she found no difficulty, in disguising even her very manners andwalk and playing the bold part she had adopted--that of a Glandelinian boy scout traveling from camp to camp with a companion.

Hendre Durgar a good natured but dangerous Abbieannian spy ambled up and down the room much tumbled up and down in his mind and divided between his wish to help Joice and a certain confused notion to keeping something else for its own good, so as he shambled about he delivered himself as follows;

" Well Joice I suppose you came a long long way, leaving your own protecting army and sisters far bey. behind(I don't wonder at it) at the same time I'm sorry Joice and decidedly decidedly---I think I must say that Joice----it is my duty to tell you so."

" Why are you sorry sir' said Joice calmly.

" why to see you as it were, putting yourself so far off from your own protecting army and placing yourself in such danger even for the sake of your country and cause."

" Placing myself in such danger" said Joice with a strong and bitter emphasis emphasis"

" What right have I to fear any peril whatever when the Glandelinians wishes to deprive me of country home, and even a grave. What country have I should the Glandelinians win this war. I'd rather be in the grave than see the war won by the insurgents."

" Ah, Joice dear, or Princess it won't do---no ---no it won't do this way of talking is rash. Joice You've got a hard harsh enemy--in fact Glandelinia is--well she conducts h rueld wickedly---I can't pretend to hate her. But you know how the bible says" those that seek danger shall find it."

" I know all what the Bible says" said Joice with a flashing eye" don't for I too am a christian, and we mean to be also, but to quote bible to a girl in my circumstances when I know it as well as you do and more is enough to make me laugh. The bible does not say anything a s against what I or my d sisters do. I Appeal to God Almighty when ever I'm going out on a dangerous design, for whatever I do I'm willing to go with the cause to Him and His blessed Mother, and ask the intercession of the Holy saints, and ask Them and Him if I do wrong to seek to do the work for my cause and Country to free if possible those little slaves who work and toil and die when they should be free."

" These feelings are quite natural, Joice" said the good natured man blowing his nose" Yes they are natural but it is my duty not to encourage them in you. Yes my dear Princess I'm sorry for you e now it is a very bad case---exceedingly dangerous- and it's like a case of suicide to me. It's easier farm easier to come here all that distance than it is to return even d though we submit to the indications of providence Joice----don't you see."!

" I wonder general Durgar, if the Glandelinians should come and take your child and want to keep her all her life or as long as she'll live though slavery if you'd think it your duty to abide in the condition of the timid and not try to reclaim her at the risk of all peril. I rather think if you fo n found your child that you'd think the first stray horse you could find would also be an indication of providence---- shouldn't you!"

The disguised Gemini leader stared with both eyes at this illustration of the case, and though he was much of a reasoner he had the coarse in which some logicians on this particular subject do not excell- that of saying nothing whatever where nothing could be said. So as he stood carefully stroking his umbrella and folding and patting down all the creases in it he proceeded on with his exhortations in a general way.

" You see dear Princess, you know now I have always been your best friend and chosen adviser, and whatever I have said I have said for your good. Now here it seems to me you are running an awful risk for something or other. You can't hope to carry it out you are running an awful risk for something or other. You can't hope to carry it out me you are running an awful risk for something or other. You can't hope to carry it out without help or other. If you are taken prisoner and your character and office and dignity is known it will be worse with you than if any one else was taken for the same reason, they will only abuse you, and half kill you, and sell you too to a mean master as a slave."

" General Durgar I know all this" said Joice. " I sure do run a risk, and a great one, but I believe you know me and knew me long ago----" she threw open her overcoat and showed two pistols and a long bowie knife. " There sh " she said I'm ready for any Glandelinian to come and take me. To be a slave I never shall on their account. No if it comes to that I can surely earn myself at least easy easy least over four or five of free soil--the first and last I shall ever own in Abbieannia if we lose the conflict."

" Why Princess this state of mind is awful, it's getting really desperate Joice. I'm concerned. Going to take the same risk for your country which a soldier should do in your place. It' it's unusual."

" There you go again. I have a country, you have a country, Glandelinia has a country, but what country have the child slaves, or any one of them stolen from parents far away in other foreign countries and even from Abbieannia to boot. What laws are there to protect the slaves. We ourselves, s Abbieannians cannot make them to protect even a sin single slave, even do each we consent to them, we have to seem to have nothing to do with them for all the Glandelinians do is crush the little slaves and keep them down. Have I not heard the speeches of Glandelinian generals. Did you not tell my sisters and I too that the Glandelinian government derives its wicked and tryinical power from the forced consent of the child slaves. Can't a fellow think and understand who hears such things! Can't he put this and that together and see what it comes to!"

The Gemini's mind was a clever one however. He really sympthized Joice with all his heart and had a sort f string perception of the style of feeling that agitated her but he deemed it his duty to go on talking good to her with infinite pertinacity.

" But Joice listen to me , this is bad ver, bad indeed. I must tell you as you know us a friend, you'd better not be meddling with such notions, they are dunberous dangerous Joice, very bad and dangerous for young girls in your condition and age, very indeed." and the general sat down to a table, and began nervously chewing the handle of his umbrella.

" See here now general Durgar" said Joice coming up and settling herself very determinedly down in front of him" Look at me now. Do you don't I see sit before you, every way just as much a human being as you are even though I'm just a girl. Look at my face, just as much a human being as you are even though I'm just a girl. Look at my face, look at my hands-- look at my body small as it is." and the girl drew herself up proudly

Why ain't a child slave as free an and as happy as I am. They ain't because of no fault of their's. This war is fought for their freedom, My Father the Emperor of Abbieannii, leads the armies, why not then should I not be by his side. " Well general I can tell you something. I saw what child slavery is through and through. I saw when spying around a such places many such little slaves belonging to fathers and motyers in far away countries put up at sheriffs sales. They were sold, brothers and sisters separated before our very eyes, one by one to all different masters,, and I almost fancied the way I felt that I was one of them sold before the eyes of my very mother. One little girl came and fairly kneeled down before a Glandelinian officer who had bought her brother and begged him to buy her with him that she might at least have her brother with her, and he kicked her away with his heavy, hot, thick of it a child. I saw him do it the scoundrel, and the last I heard, was her crying and screams, when I saw the lad tied to a horses neck, and carried off to his masters place."

" Well then!"

I followed him secretly disguised as a Glandelinian girl scout, and saw the master then trade with another man, and buy a girl and exchange the boy for another slave of younger age. The girl I found out was a pious n child,---a member of the Good Olf Old Catholic Church--and I believe as handsome as I might think of myself. I know she had been well brought up and had good manners but I feared for her as I did not like the looks of her master. I was soon right in my suspicions. Sir that very first day I saw her I stood at the door and heard her whipped with a lash with iron points at the end when it seemed as if every bol blow cut into my naked heart, and I could not do anything to help her then, and she was whipped sir for wanting to live a decent christian life, such as the Glandelinian laws give a slave no right to live, and at last I saw her chained with a trades gang, to be sent to market in glandelinia city--sent there for nothing else but that---and that's the last I knew of her. Well after that I continued my work among the slaves, I sometimes pretened to be one of them with no father, mother, no sister, not a living soul except the slaves that cared for me or the others more than a dog, and I too got nothing but whippings and half starved. I had to stand it to learn details, and the slaves who knew who I was called me a fool, and said;

" We know who you are Princess. Wh why do this for us when it'll do us no good. You can't free us for all that. Get out and be wise." But I didn't untill I had to. Why sir I can tell you I have been so hungry that I have been glad to take the bones they threw to their dogs, and yet when I lay awake whole nights and cried about it all, it was not the hungerm nor the whipping I cried for for I could have avoided that if I wished to by beating it when I had the chance. "No sir, it was for them, little boys and girls s parated from boys brother and sister, from mother and father,--it was because they did not have a friend to love them on earth, little outcasts. They never knew what peace or comfort was, never allowed to play, never allowed to hear music, never given anything for Christmas and other holidays, but get up four o'clock in the morning, work like horses till ten at night and beaten for every little mistake or that. I never had a kind word spoken to me either except from the slaves themselves. They treated me well, they encou encouraged me and admired me for what I suffered for them, and knew that in secret I wrote messages which through a mysterious friend I conveyed to the christian lines, and God knows how grateful they were to me for it for I brought them their freedom by causing the " Night riders to surround that child slave camp and camp capture it. Then sir one of these poor boy slaves found his sister, you would hav been surprised if you had seen her----you would have been surprised to see how beautiful she was. When he found one was his sister, he could scarcely believe he was alive, he was so happy, and sir she was as good as she was beautiful. But then you sh what happened. Why now came his wicked Glandelinian master, took the lad away from his work, and his friends, and all he liked and sent him to a more wicked master to be ground down into the very dirt as if he was nothing less than a rat. and why? Because the rascal said the lad was becoming a " Christian Dog" and he was going to teach the lad that he had no such a thing as a soul. After all and last of all, he came between the boy and his dear sister, and says he shall have to give her up and be seperated from all boys too. And all this the laws of wicked glandelinia gives a Glandelinian slave owner peer to do in spite of God and man. General Dargar looked at it. There is not one of all these horrid things done to the little slaves, that have even broken the hearts of my own sisters and mother to see and myself, but the wicked Glandelinia law allows, and gives every Glandelinian man or woman power to do, and none can say to him nay. Sir these slaves are worse off than a man without a country, and they have no country no more than a man to sit at a home of parents. But if we Nationals can't it they are going to have one these children have parents are going to be abbieannian citizens. I don't want anything of the wicked Glandelinian country except to see them forced to free all the slaves, to allow them to go freely and peacefully out of it, and when they are brought to fair abbieannia as where the laws will love and protect them, that shall be their country, and its holy laws they will obey. If any have parents of other nations still living they'll be traced. But if any Glandelinian tries to stop me and my sisters, let them take care for we are desperate ant. anything. I and my sisters even will fight for the libert, of the slaves to the last breath I breathe. You say that you read in History that in other big countries especially America they fought for the freedom of Negro slaves. If it was right for them it is right for me to do it for the little slaves, who ought not be slaves under any conditions whatever. To hold one child a slave is a mortal sin. To hold ten thousand slaves is 10,000 or twenty thousand mortal sins."

This speech delivered partly while sitting at the table, and partly walking up and down the room--delivered with tears and flashing eyes, and despairing gestures--was altogether too much for the Gemini Leader to whom it was addressed, who had pulled out a great army purple handkerchief, and was mopping up his face with great energy.

" Blast them all" he suddenly broke out" Have I not always said so the infernal Glandelinian skunks. I hope I ain't securing now. Well go ahead, Joice dear go ahead, but be very careful my dear Princess, don't let any of the Glandelinians shoot you and don't shoot them, Joice, unless you have---well you'd better not shoot unless it is safe to do so I reckon at least, I wouldn't hit anybody around here you know. Where are your sisters Princess?" he asked or added as he nervously arose, and began walking around the room.

" In the emperor Vivians army as I came alone."

" And where is Angelinia Aronburgs sister I did did you say?"

" Gone sir, gone, the Good God only knows where---probably gone after the North Lights, and when they will ever meet, or whether they meet at all in this world, no great ur can tell."

" Is it possible, astonishing. How could the Glandelinians get away with that?"

" so far as I see Glandelinians usually get away with anything now a days, and the laws of the Glandelinia country allow them to sell every child to pay even its masters dept depts" said Joice bitterly.

" Well, well" said the Gemini leader, fumbling in his his pocket. " I suppose perhaps, I ain't following my judgement---hang it I won't follow my judgement" he added suddenly, " so here Princess" and taking out a box of cartridges he offered them to Joice.

" No my kind good sir" said Joice" You have done a great deal for me, and this might get you into serious trouble if this is discovered as you too are in dangerous ground. I have money enough I hope to take me all the way back to my sisters. I start on to night as my mission has been finished."

" No, this is not money but cartridges that will protect you Princess, cartridges that explode by violent flinging on a hard object. These cartridges are a great help help help help help----can't have enough protection if you are doing this kind of work. Take, it, do take it my Princess do take it now do my girls".

" on condition sir, that I will be able to repay you at some future time" said Joice taking up the box.

" And now Princess how long will it take you to travel back to your army in this way-----not long or far I hope. It's well carried on but too bold. And this boy with you---is it another girl in disguise or really a boy?"

" A true boy friend of the Baron Penrod who came to our country more than three years ago with general greatheart. He heard after he got here that a big war was on and there for joined the boy scouts of abbieannia. He too is trying to find clues for us to where Annie Aronburg is and get a chance to get her away from the Glandelinians for he too f does not believe she is dead."

" Has he got her?"

" no, not yet, we have been both on that mission believing she was hidden somewhere as a child slave in general Mylatzes army, and we have been hanging about the child slave camps for a week disguised as rebel girl and boy scout, but found no chance yet as we found none that we could recognize by her picture. One a whose name is Annie is a cook but her last name is not Aronburg, and she has a sister who a slave in Munlay army, Chunshile he is to return with me, and then we will send more of the Gemini and professional military secret agents to find her if pasible."

" So Dangerous, very dangerous" said the Gemini leader. " More dangerous an undertaking than I even am making."

The Vivian Girl princess drew herself up and smiled disdainfully. The gemini general eyed her from head to to foot, with a sort of innocent and yet strange wonder.

" princess, something has brought you out wonderfully and mainly I know why. No matter how mean the Glandelinians have been to you, nor no matter how much good the Nationals have done for you, and no matter how much you have been petted and loved and respected and no matter what has been given to you you are impossible, yes impossible to be spoiled. The same with your sisters. You hold up your head, and speak and move like a princess of heaven. You are not natural that's true" said Dargar.

" Because I'm born that way" said Joice, proudly. " Yes sir and because I have made many a slave more than I can count free already. They are free, and many more will be free."

" Take care, you are not sure----you too may be taken and made a slave."

" I'll slave so they'll be free if it comes to that' General Dargar" said Joice. " I have the ability to escape any time I need to and get away with slaves too."

" I'm perfectly dumbfounded with your boldness, and your righteousness and sympathy for those not more fortunate" said general Dargar. " You and your sisters must be war saints to come right here to the nearest Glandelinian army and under Mylatze."

" Your Excellency----it i is so bold, and this tavern is so near to the advancing Glandelinian army under Mylotes that they will never think of it, if they have been hinted that I have been within their lines the Glandelinians will look for me far ahead, and even you yourself at first did not know me and stared and stared as if I was a beauty shop or something. Penrod is not known in these parts, and no one could recognize him here. Besides he has recieved a lot of training from his friend called the " Rattlesnake " and therefore it would not be particularly safe for any Glandelinian to be looking for him and no one will take me for a girl I believe."

" But you might have some sort of identification about you that will or betray you." " said the general.

" There is no danger" she said drawing forth one of her small but deadly looking pistols. " That is a parting proof of my " cracksmotedness" she continued proudly. it's also a proof of Jack Lyons regard of my safe keeping. A few fortnight ago he took it into his head to give it to me, because he said he believed if I'd try to make a long dangerous journey me of these days and I might run into unusual danger. But I met with no adventure except pass one of those big floods caused by the Glandelinians and one forest fire. This little gun looks interesting, does it not?" she said placing it back in its holster.

" O Yes but I do say my blood runs cold when I think of it,---you only a little girl, and yet the ri risks you take" said general Dargar.

" Mine Mine Mine has run cold since I was born " said Juice " from the sights I have witnessed even before the outbreak of this conflict general Dargar, but at present I t is up to the boiling point. Well my good sir," continued she, after a few moments silence, I see you know me, I thought I'd just have this talk with you, lest your surprised looks should accidentally bring curious curiousity among the Glandelinian officers in this tavern and bring trouble for us both as I too recognized you at the same time. I leave earlyto night, before the moon rises, by to morrow night, I hope to sleep safe in Angelinia Agathia to where I'm going to warn of Mylotes advance. I shall travel only my night till I get there, stop and sleep only inside box cars as a child tramp, eat as a tramp and ride trains as a tramp so as no one will get wise as to I am. As I have no bobbed hair they cannot identify me as a slave. Be good by sir. and if you hear that I am taken you may know that I'm dead."

Juice stood up like a statue and put out her hand with her princesely air. The general shook it heartily and after a little shower of caution, he took his umbrella and fumbled his way out of the room. The princess stood thoughtfully looking at the door, as the general closed it. Then suddenly a thought flashed across her mind, and hastily stepping to it, and opening it she called.,

" Mr Adillo just one word more."

The general who was as I believed I said before disguised as an old man snuffled in once more, and Juice as before locked the door, and then stood a few minutes looking on the floor resolutely. At last raising her head with a sudden effort;

" Your Excellency, you have shown yourself a true servant and christian in your treatment of me- I want to ask one last deed of christian kindness of you."

" Well Princess.!"

" Well sir what you said is true. I am running a dreadful risk, probably a greater danger than any yet in my whole life. The return won't be so easy, as the coming. and within enemy territory there is not on earth. a living soul to care if I or my sisters even die, may they would be happen to hear of it," she added, drawing her breath hard, and speaking with a great effort' I shall be kicked out and buried like a rat or left to rot like a rat, and no one will think of it a day after, except my poor sisters. Poor souls they'll morn and grieve, and in case you hear anything happened to me and you'll only contrive general, to send this little pin to them, and this note, to my father, and this hair band to my mother. She gave it to me for a Christ Christmas present, poor wom mother. Give it to her and tell her I loved her to the last. and these to my sisters. Will you' Will you!" she added earnestly.

" Yes certainly my brave girl' said the general taking the articles, with watery watery eyes; and a melancholy quiver in his voice.

" Tell them each only one thing' said juice it's my last wish, if they can get to me in case I survive my adventure to go to Angelinia Agathia and wait for me there. No matter what they need to do at Emperor Vivians army, no matter how much they love the army, beg them not to go back unless I am safe. Tell them to bring a full regiment of boy scouts and then they won't run such peril as I may have to on my return. Tell them this, general will you!"

Yes Princess, I'll tell them, but I trust you'll see your adventure through without any tragic ending, take heart- and trust God, you are surely a good girl, unusually good despite your beautiful features, which is merely as a worm compared to your unusual character. I know you trust in the Lord Juice. I wish in my heart you were safe through,. and not have come on this dangerous adventure, that's what I do."

" I hope you will do what I desire for the child slaves first" said juice in such a tone of bitterness as arrested the generals words. " oh I've seen things in my young life life that have made many feel that there is no God they have bitterly told me so to my face. They say to me" you Christians don't know how these things look to us who slave and die that our wicked masters may live in ease and luxury luxury. There's a God for you but is there any for us poor slaves? oh general I tell you what I have seen is terrible, too terrible for words."

" Oh now don't p----don't my princess' said the general almost sobbing as he spoke, Don't feel so please' There is, there is, clouds and darkness are about him, but righteousness and judgement are the habitation of his throne. They'll soon believe there is a God princess, they'll believe, it , trust in him, as you are sure he'll help you . Everything will be set right---if not in this life, in another."

The real piety piety and benevolence of the general invested him with a temporary dignity and authority as he spoke. juice stopped her distracted wo walk up and down the room, stood thoughtfully for a moment, and then said quietly;

Thank you for saying that general, tell tnina good of it."

" In roman there was a voice heard,----weeping, and lamentation, and great mourning; Rachel weeping for her children,, and would not be comforted..... "

On rail margin and panel , jogged onward in their wagon with the other slaves while the army marched on the road beforehand tward gan galvardor which had been abandoned by the nationals, each for a time absorbed in their own reflections. Now the reflections of child slaves and a Glandelinian general sitting on the seat, and inside the wagon are a very curious thing, having the same eyes, the same hands, ears and organs of all sorts, and to see pass before their very eyes the same objects---indeed it is wonder wonderful what a variety we small find in these same reflections.

As for example general Dargin, he thought first of Jannies age , age and size, breadth and height, and how she came to be sold to general Mylotes. He thought of how when the army stopped at gan Salvador he should make out a nice gang of slaves, he thought of the respect respective merit value of certain men boys and girl slaves who were to compose of it there, and other kindred topics of the wicked business, then he thought of himself, now himself a glandelinian general he was, that sincere other Glandelinians of other armies chained their slaves hand and foot both, while in Mylotes army neither were fettered, the slaves being left the use of their hands and feet as long as they " Behaved " self and he signed to think how ungrateful human nature among other Glandelinians was so that there was even room to doubt whether Jannie and the other slaves appreciated his mercies. He had been taken in so by " Child slave Brats" whom he had favored but still he was astonished to consider how good natured he yet remained.

As to Jannie she was thinking over some verse of an unfashionable book which kept running through her head again and again as follows;

" whatsoever ye do to the least of these, " MY CHILDREN" ye do it unto me."

These words found in the Holy Bible have through all time kept up somehow a strange sort of unusual power over the minds of child slaves who had the chance to live christian lives lives. They stir up their souls from their depths, and rouse as with the bugle call courage, energy, and enthusiasm, where before was only the blackness of despair.

General Dargin had pulled out of one of his uniform overcoat pockets a Glandelinia news paper and began looking over their advertisements with unusual interest. He was a remarkably good reader and this is what he gave the once over; executers Sale gan Salvador City------Child slave slave Brats. --Agreeably to order of Glandelinian Military court will be sold pril the 20th before the courthouse door of said captured town six child slaves, one aged, twelve, the others from six to ten. Sold for the benefit of the creditors and cause of Glandelinia.

I must look into this as soon as the army halts near gan Salvador town said he to Jannie who was rising on the seat before him for real sent of some one to talk to." Maybe I can exchange them for prisoners and prevent them from being sent to wicked masters."

You see I'm also going to get up a prime gang to talk along with you Jannie; it will make it plea- pleasant like---good company, will you know. We must drive with the wagon train right to gan galvador first and foremost before the main army gets there, and then I'll clap you and your fellow slaves in an internment camp under guard, while I does the business. and as long as you behave yourself the soldiers may allow you to roam about the town we have captured."

Jannie and the other slaves recieved this news quite meekly, simply wondering in their own hearts how many of these doomed slaves had fathers and mothers, sold far away, and whether their fathers and mothers were still living in their own nations, and whether they would look as sad as she did in leaving her own father and mother.It is also to be confessed that the native air and information, that they were to be placed into a internment camp in the city by no means plus produced an agreeable impression on a poor child slave who had always been free otherwise. However the day were on, and the approach of evening saw the town in Glandelinian possession, and Dargin and the slaves comfortably accomodated in gansalvador by the Glandelinians, the general in a splendid tailoring, and the slaves in a strictly plainer child style of coat of tents.

About eleven o clock the next morning while the town was in possession of the militia military and was in the city hall general Gilstate had taken up his own head quarters a large throng of Glandelinian soldiers and officers was thickly gathered around the steps of the city's courthouse, the only building naturally that escaped the flames, smoking, chewing, swearing, blaspheming and the like, and conversing according to their respective tastes and turns waiting for the military auction to commence as these slaves had been captured from the Nationals. The boys and girls were to be sold apart, and they were talking in a low tone to each other. The eldest of the slaves was a girl of regular German in feature and figure and quite beautiful. She might have been eleven years of age but looked older than that by hardwork and disease, was totally blind in one eye, and somewhat disfigured in the leg by an injury, and was devoid of a finger on the right hand. By her side stood a young boy a bright looking little fellow of five. The boy was her only brother her other two have been sold somewhat sooner to a southern Glandelinian slave market. The girl held on to her brother with both her shaking hands, and eyed with intense trepidation every Glandelinian officer or soldier who walked up to examine the lad.

" Don't be afraid girl" said an old officer" I spoke to general Dargin about it and he believes he'll be able to buy you both together."

" please do not let them sp seperate us " said she lifting her trembling hands. " and I'm able to work yet, for I can scrub floors, clean horses, and can cook'in worth buying even if I do come cheap---tell him that please, tell him all you!"

General Dargin here forced his way into the group, walked up to the girl, pulled her mouth open and looked in, felt of her teeth, made her stand and straighten herself, bend her back, and perform various movements to show her ability, and then felt of the boys arms, straightened his little hands, and looked at his little fingers, and made him jump to show his agility.

" Please don't let him be sold without me" said the poor girl with passionate eagerness" Let him and I go together, I'm real strong yet general, and can do heap of work, please take me too general!"

" If I have enough money!" said the general, and as if satisfied with his examination he walked off and looked and stood with his right hand on his staff, his cigar in his mouth, and his big hat cocked to one side, ready for action.

" what do you think of the slaves" said an officer who had been following Largins examination as if to make up his own mind from it.

" hell! said the general spitting" I shall put in if I have the proper ammount of money for all of them."

" Do you think they will see sell the girl and boy together?" said the officer.

" Find it a tight pull, so why not buy her if possible whether she is worth her salt or not. She'll be worth enough to exchange for prisoners at least. If I cant buy her it's not her fault."

" you'll try it then?' said the officer.

" I would be a fool if I would not. she's half blind, crooked with accident, and if she is sold to some one else he might kill her when he finds he's been cheated."

" You but some buy an, slave and finds there a might more work in them than any no one would think' said the colonel reflectively.

" That's right too, I would not let any one seperate them if I can help it. Because its a pity not to buy her with her little brother,--she has her heart set on him--and they might fling her in cheap. I shall bid off on them both otherwise she'll take on desperate."

" I'm sure she will poor thing" said the colonel.

The conversation was interrupted by a loud man in the audience of soldiers and officers, and the auctioneer a tall bustling important looking officer, elbowed his way into the crowd. The girl drew in her breath, and caught instinctively at her little brother.

" Keep close to your sister, Jamie - close, they'll put us up together" she said hopefully.

" Oh sis I'm afraid they won't" said the boy.

" They must child, I can't bear to live one day if they don't" said the poor girl vehemently.

Suddenly the stentorian tones of the auctioneer calling out loudly to clear the way announced that the sale was about to commence. Therefore a place was cleared, and the bidding commenced. The different ones on the list two girls and a boy were soon knocked off at prices which barely showed a profit, but a good one in the market, and only one of them fell to General Dargin.

" Come now you brat" said the auctioneer giving the little boy a touch with his hammer" Come up here and show yourself now."

" Please put us up together, if you oh please do" said the poor girl holding fast to her little brother.

" Go to ---" said the man gruffly pushing her hands away" You gutter snips come last" Now little Jack and" and with the word he pushed the boy roughly toard the block, while the girl started to cry pitiously. The boy paused and looked back, but he was not allowed a moment to delay, and dashing the tears from his large eyes he was placed up in a moment. His fine little figure, short limbs, and bright handsome face, raised an instant competition and many a bid simultaneously reached the ear of the auctioneer. anxious, terrified, the poor boy looked from side to side, as he heard the clatter of the contending bids, now here now there, till the hammer fell. Dargin had failed to get him and man he did not like for his looks bro tought the lad. Dargin swore as the boy was pushed from the block toard his new master, but stopped one moment and looked back, when his poor little sister, trembling in every little limb held out her shaking hands to him.

" Buy me too Master, for the dear Lords sake---please buy me---I shall die if you don't"

" I don't care if you die in hell that the full and short of it" said the officer. " no you gutter snip" and he turned on his heel. The bidding bidding for the girl was summary. General Dargin bought her for a trifle; and the spectators began to disperse. The poor child slave victims of the sale, who had been once together since they first became slaves gathered round the despairing girl, whose agony was pitiful to see.

" The cruel men, why couldn't they leave me my brother. Master said I could have him they would not sell him" she repeated over and over in heart broken tones.

" Trust in God June" said the eldest of the slaves, sorrowfully.

" What good will it do; there is none"! said she sobbing passionately!

" sis,sis don,t don't, it's bluspheney" said her little brother. " They say general Dargin is a good master."

" I don't care, --I don't care. Oh Sammie, dear brother, you is all I have on earth. How can I help it."

" Come take her off, take the young brat off can't some of you" said the colonel dryly" don't do her any good to carry on that way the little brats."

" That word gutter snip, and also little brat" don't go very far for your good in this army" said general Dargin with a scowl!" Report to your general to night as under arrest. You don't get the boy anyway as I'll take Him and now, and with that he pushed the colonel back and grabbed the boy. " Here girlie is your sister. Your turning to the Colonel will lose the boy and also your commission for me using the sword brat, and gutter snip. Report yourself under arrest at once."

" Now " said general Dargin, pushing his six purchasers together" You are to go to the internment camp until the army marches forward again. Behave yourselves and you'll find yourselves within the christian lines sooner than you expect" and with that he ordered soldiers to take them to the internment camp.

A few days say nearly a week saw the first section of the Glandelinian army under Dargin with his possessions safely placed on one of the army transports boats going down the river toard san Pedro. It was the commencement of the Glandelinian advance as stated generally in other chapters, in two sections, one part by the banks, and the smaller section by boat and it was also the commencement of the gang of child slaves to be transported as the long line of great ships moved on by various other merchandize of the same kind, which Dargin and many other officers, had stored for him in various points along the shore.

The san Pedrolo boat was steaming gaily down the stream, under a brilliant late april sky, the glandelinian flag fluttering and waving overhead, the guards and decks crowded with soldiers and officers walking and enjoying the delightful day but also keeping cautious eye to the other shore. all of the soldiers and officers were full of life, enjoyment and rejoicing---all but the gangs of child slaves, who were stored with other other freight, on the lower decks, and who did not at all appreciate their various privilages as they sat in knots, talking to each other in low tones or also keeping up uneasy glances toard what the Glandelinians mentioned" The christian side of the shore."

" Now slaves" said general Dargin coming up very briskly" I hope you keep up a good heart and be as cheerful as we are under the circumstances. Now no sulks or pouts or sad looks you see, keep stiff upper lips boys and girls, do see well by me and my officer officers and we'll do well by you. You are slaves of course but are far better off than those who are in other Glandelinian armies."

The slaves addressed responded the invariable " YES sir" for ages the watchword of these poor slaves, but it is to be said in plain words that not one of them looked as cheerful as it was desired They have their various misfortunes in favor of brothers and sisters, and mothers seen for probably the last time---and though " They that wanted them required and mothers seen for probably the last time---and though " They that wanted them required of them mirth --it was not even forthcoming as when slaves are not feeling so they'll stand upfor a thrashing or a flogging rather than give their " enemies " a smile, for though they were slaves, they recognized no man as their " Master". They never say master but sir, or " general," or what ever rank their master has. nothing Lord.

" I've got a little sister" spoke out a little boy whose name was Hendro" and he laid his chained hand on Jamie's knee and she don't yet know a thing about this the poor girl. I'm running away the first chance I get."

" where does she live or where have they got her!" said Jamie.

" In an internment camp at - like down the river" said Hendro" I'd give anything to see her once more in this world." he added. Poor Hendro, it was natural, and the tears that rolled down his eyes as he spoke so sadly, came as naturally as if he had been some other rolled down his eyes as he spoke so sadly, came as naturally as if he had been some other boy whose mother had just died and left him an orphan. Jamie drew a long breath from his sore heart, and tried in her simple little way to comfort him. and overhead on the upper decks, and in the cabin, sat soldiers and officers carrying small banners colored other decks, like em so many butterflies and everything was going on quite easy and comfortable.

"Oh say my dear brother" said an unusually looking Glandelinian boy about six who had just come up from below" there's general Dargin on board with one his officers, and he had brought about fourty five or more slaves down there."

"poor creatures" said the other boy in a tone between grief and indignation.

"What's that" said a Glandelinian officer.

"Some unfortunate child slaves below."

"Yes and they are chained up like a lot of criminal prisoners" said the other boy.

"What a shame to the cause of glandelinia, that such awful sights are to be seen over in general Hyletzes army" said another officer.

"Oh there's a great deal to be said of the subject" said the officer who sat in his stateroom deer sewing buttons on his coat, while two small kittens were playing about him. "I've been in general Hanleys army, and I must say that I think the globus slaves are much better off here in Hyletzes army, than they would be to be in Hanleys."

"In some respects they might be well off I grant" said the elder boy whose first remark the officer had answered. "But the most dreadful part of the child slavery, to my mind is its outrages on the feelings and affections, first taken from their homes and parents, from other nations,s and then the seperation of brother and sister for example."

"That is a bad thing without doubt" said the officer holding up his coat to inspect the buttons and looking looking intently on its lace and gold trimmings" but then I fancy they get jaded to it for surely it don't occur often in general Hyletzes army."

"Oh it does too, and everywhere" said the boy eagerly" I've been in many child slave places in Angelinia and Galvurinia both, and I've seen enough to make any one's heart sic, sick, even what the " Christian dogs never saw. Suppose colonel Aberdeen you had two children and they should be taken away from you and sold."!

"There's a different thing in that question, but we can't reason from our feelings to those of the class of child slaves" said the officer, sorting out a new spool of gold thread. " If any one want's to make my children slaves here welcome to try it provid ing he has no use for life."

"Indeed sir you or others can know nothing of them at all if you say so" said another officer warmly and joining in the conversation. " I was born and brought up among the child slaves. I know how they do feel; just as keenly---even more so perhaps than even our own children would. Indeed as far as I can see, by this great war, God is already crushing this nation for the slave trade which all say is the most wicked thing on earth."

"The colonel said" Indeed call it wicked if you like as do it just the same" and he yawned and looked out the cabin window,and finally repeated for a finale the remark which astonished all present;

"I'd defy toten hell and earth and all living creatures above to bring about a successful termination of this war in favor of the " Christian dogs" to free the slaves."

"It's without the slightest doubt the intention of Providence that the child slave trade children of other nations who are christian should be servants only and kept in the lowest conditions" said a grave looking Glandelinian officer seated by the cabin door close to the colonel." " CURSED BE CANAAN: A SERVANT OF SERVANTS SHALL HE BE" the scripture says."

"I say Major parmer is that what the text means" said a tall man standing by. " I've read a bible through, a bible belonging probably to all christian religions - known and unknown sord of child slavery have I seen."

"Undoubtedly" Well I am not sorry anything about any of your old old bibles. It pleases glandelinia and her authorities for some inscrutable reason known only to us to doom children of all foreign nations to slavery and horror ages ago, and so must not set up our opinions against that bible or no bible. The bible anyway has nothing to say about us. Let it mind its own business, and we'll mind ours."

"Well then, we'll all go ahead and buy up the child slaves" said the Major" If that's the way of glandelinia law, won't we general?" said he turning to Dargin who had been standing close by lighting a cigarette, and intently listening to the conversation.

"You indeed,your Excellency,"continued the major" we must all be resigned to the degrees of christian nations in our poor must be sold to keep peace with us, must be sold to one master after another, and trucked around, cast to & fro, and suffer to our pleasure, and kept under, its what these christian children are made for. It appears this is a good argument on the subject ain't it general" said he to Dargin.

"I never thought anything about that" said general Dargin. "I could never say as much myself, as I ain't quite considerate on it. It is by the trade just for the support of regaining prisoners held in the National armies, if it ain't right I can't help it. We glandelinians must do as Glandelinia does. If it is wrong abbiannia will prove it to us in time you know."

"And then you'll save yours.If on the table won't you" said the major." See what is is not to you the loss of glandelinia and the loss of her states. If you only stabbled these days you had saved years if a awful lot of trouble. You could just have said" Cursed be--- what was his name please" nevertheless it would come out all right.' and the major sat down, and began smoking with a curious smile on his long dry face. A tall slender young glandelinian officer who also was a good deal general with a face expressive of great feeling and intelligence here broke in and repeated the words" Who you do the thus to the least of these you do to me" I shd suppose" he added" that is scripture as much as " cursed be Canaan."

"Be well it is quite as plain a text your excellency" said the major" but the bible does not concern us anyw and he smoked on like a volcano.

The tall young general paused looked as if he was going to say more, when suddenly the boat stopped, and as firing was going on down somewhere below the river, sounding like expl si exploding shells and cannon volleys the companies made the usual steam boat rush to see what was happening. As the boat stopped a camp was seen to be broken and a number of soldiers came running up and a little girl came running up the plank dartes into the crowd, and flew up to where the gange of slaves sat, and threw her arms around her unfortunate brother, and although and tears cried out that she wanted to go along with him, as he was her brother. But what need to tell the story; told too often in these volumes already- -every chapter probably told; outside of battles of heart strings rent and broken, the weak broken and torn for the profit and convenience of the strong military. It need not to be told more,---every scene can be telling it--telling it to the ear of one who is not deaf, though he He be long silent. The young general who had spoken to Dargin before stood with folded arms looking on this scene for soldiers were forcibly parting boy and girl. He turned and general Dargin was standing at his side.

"Your excellency" he said speaking with great vehemence" How can our government of Glandelinia, how dare it cry out, on such a trade and child slavery like this! Look at these poor creatures. Here are many of us officers who when on furlough can go home to wife and children, and yet the same military government is parting this boy and girl forever. Depend upon it God will bring us all into judgement for this. I'll bet any money against your Ten Pieces of eight that Glandelinia won't come out the victor."

"I don't doubt your word for it" said Dargin and he walked reflectively to the other end of the boat and started yelling at the soldiers" leave that little girl remain on the boat with her brother. She goes with him. Let her alone."

"I say now" said another officer, touching the generals elbow" there's differences f child slavery in this ain't there. 'Cursed be Canaan' don't seem to go with our army does it?"

"Well that ain't the worse of it" said general Dargin" Maybe with our own part of it it won't go down with the Lord, neither, when we all come to settle with him one of these days as we take slaves to exchange them for nationals."

"If I make pretty handsome one one or two more gangs, and exchange them to the nationals for prisoners" he thought" I believe I'll stop it, it's really getting dangerous for Glandelinia and her cause altogether." and he took out a note book, and began adding over his account as a per cess which many a wicked or not a wicked glandelinian general or other officer besides general Dargin have found a specific for an uneasy conscience.

The boat swept proudly away from the shore and all went on merrily as before. Officers officers talked, and laughed, smoked and read and in the boat passed on her way. The next day while the fleet was meeting with some opposition from concealed christian batteries on shore, and there was considerable firing all day long without pause and and while Dargins boat lay for a while near a small town which was also in possession of a regiment of Glandelinians waiting for a boat, general Dargin went up into the place on a little matter of business.

Jannie, and her companion slaves had drawn near the side of the boat and stood listlessly gazing over the railings. After a while they saw the general returning, with an silent step in company with twenty more child slaves, all of them girls one boarding in her arms a boy of two years of age. They were all dressed alike, almost like prisoners coin a pen would be. Yet the slaves came cheerfully onward, some talking to each other as they came but not a one word to the general, and so they passed up the plan int plank into the boat. Evening came, the soldiers crossing the river by pontoons had captured the annoying batteries on the opposite shore and therefore the fleet was able to proceed unite away.The bell rang, the steamer went off the engine groaned and coughed, and away kept the boat down the river with the rest of the fleet in the rear with their cannon still firing at the shore. The new slaves walked forward among the boxes and bales of the lower decks among which soldiers were kneeling down with rifles at the ready, and sitting on tot of firing. If fire from the shore were quiet. General Dargin made a turn or two about the boat, and then coming up seated himself between the slaves who had just arrived, and began saying a morning to them in an indifferent undertone. Jannie was the last new arrival and looked over their faces and that one of them was red rapidly, and with great vehemence.

"I don't believe it, I won't believe it." she heard one of them say. " You are just fooling with us."

"If you feel slaves don't believe me look here" said the general drawing out a long paper" this is the bill of exchange, and there is the names of the prisoners to be brought to us in your place, and paid down and for it too I can tell you,---so now."

"I don't believe good luck would come to us so, that some one is only cheating us to make us look cheerful. It cannot be true". said another, with increasing agitation.

"You can ask one of these officers here, that can read these writings. Here he said to an officer passing by "Just read this for these slaves won't you. They don't believe me when I tell them how it is. They think it is too good to be true."

"Why this is a bill of exchange for Mandellinian prisoners held here in the National army near San Salvador, signed by General Ignez Mylotz under a flag of truce this morning" said the officer looking over the papers "you are speaking the truth. It's all straight enough for aught I see, and won't Manley be mad when he hears of it. too. It's all straight enough for aught I see, and won't Manley be mad when he hears of it. too. It's all straight enough for aught I see, and won't Manley be mad when he hears of it."

The joyful passionate exclamations of the slaves collected a crowd around them, and the general and others briefly explained to them the close of the excitement.

"I thought we were to be slaves forever, that we were going down to Manley, that's what the soldiers in the camp told me them-if, and put it seems too good to be true." said one of the boys.

"But you are to be exchanged to the nationals for prisoners to night, my poor little kids, there's no doubt about it, and you'll be free" said a good natured Mandellinian officer who had been examining the papers" Mylotz has done it and no mistake. He always does this. That's all he does to slaves in his army."

"Then it is really true" said another of the slaves, suddenly growing quite calm and clasping her little brother tighter in her arms and with y tears of joy in her eyes she she sat down on her box, turned her back around and gazed into the water.

"But if Manley ever hears of this---" began another officer.

"I do not worry my head about, Manley at all" snapped Dargin. "this is not his command. He can go sit on a tack, and tell him I said so."

Jannie herself looked calm as the boat sect on with the fleet steaming forward in front and behind, and a beautiful soft April breeze like some compassionate spirit over her head---the gentle breze however which never inquires whether the bread is said or cheerful or that it fans. And as she gazed listlessly at the water she saw the lot of the last of the sunshine sparkling on the water in golden ripples, and heard gay v ices of officers and men talking around her-she, but her heart lay on it a great stone had fallen on it. She wondered why why she too had not been included in the exchange list. The little boy slave raised himself up against her, and stroked her cheeks with his little hands, and springing up and down cooing and chatting, seeming determined to try and arouse her. She strained him suddenly, and tightly in her arms, and al. ly one tear after another fell on his wondering unconscious face; and gradually she seemed little by little to lose some of her sorrow, t grew a little calmer and looked here if with tending and playing with him.

The child a boy of three years was unusually large and strong for his age, and very vigorious in his limbs. Never for a moment still he kept Jannie constantly busy in holding and playing with him, and guarding his springing activity.

"That's a beautiful little boy" said an officer, suddenly stopping opposite to him as he threw overboard a lighted cigar which he finished making near to the boat. Had "Has sold to her?"

"I do not know sir" said Jannie.

"Is he not your brother?"

"No sir. My brother and sister and parents are dead. They killed them when I was stolen."

The man whistled to the boy and offered him a part of a stick of candy and an orange Jannie, which the lad eagerly grabbed at but which Jannie refused, and gave it to the boy, and he had it in his mouth.

"A beautiful little boy" said the officer I wonder why'd his sister," and he whistled and walked on. When he had reached the other side of the big ship he came upon a Mandellinian officer who he knew was a slave trader, and who was smoking near the cabin. The colonel for such he was pulled out a match, high lighted a cigarette saying as he did so;

"Is that little Jannie that boys sister."

"Why I reckon not. There's his sister sitting there of the girls in the group that was chained and bl aing the smoke out of his mouth."

"Is he and her brother in the list of those exchanged yet?" said the colonel.

"The trader looked and said" Now and smoked on.

"What will she do, army field organizer, or field fortification?"

"Well- said the major" I'm willing her as one in the only one who wants to sold or

"Well- said the major" I'm willing her as one in the only one who wants to sold or I last her brother and I think I'll sell them both. They told me she was a good field worker knew how to help dig trenches, and keep camp and cook, and [illegible] at [illegible] generals b ts and sniff rm and [illegible] tent in order. She has the right [illegible] little for that. I'll sold her over, she'll all either way. I'll get more or little army to sell to Mylotz want's more [illegible] this mule [illegible] officer.

"They can't never as they are by my plantation army, field work in my [illegible] over" said the colonel.

"I'm going to sell him the first chance I get" said the major lighting another cigar.

"I suppose you will sell his mule [illegible] cheap" said the colonel puffing his cigar and [illegible] his cigarette as if it was made of tar paper.

"I don't sell any of my slaves cheap" said the Major That boy is pretty smart- straight and stick, fat, strong, fl sh as hard as brick or iron rather."

Very true all but the boy, and all in a moment he was cruelly [illegible] ther and separated from him in a army. They not sell him to a private citizen."

"Gracious" said the major sharply" All citizens nearly all about these regions are christian dogs and won buy any of the slaves. Yet these littlest kids can be raised as any any slaves we have in any native market, they ain't a bit more trouble than pulling small cats and dogs[illegible]. This little kid will be on working them with another year."

"I've got a good brother who has a place for raising all kinds of very small slaves and I thought of trying in some such slaves if [illegible]" said the colonel, [illegible] settling [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] child and [illegible] girl slave who wants a little brother or a little boy as a brother I took it would be all right enough for raising this one for her."

The colonel and the major smoked a long while in silence, neither seeming to be willing to touch the next question of the interview. At last the colonel remarked;

"How much do you want for the little chap seeing as how you wish to get him off your hands, anyhow. Ten or twenty dollars."

The major shook his head, and spit impressively.

"I can't work it that way at all" he said, and began smoking again.

"Tell Major please tell me frankly and squarely how much I do you want for the little boy, one"?

"Well now" said the Major" I could get that little brat raised, or raise him myself, he is uncommonly healthy and lively and he'd bring me fully two hundred dollars easy money six months hence or even less, and in a year or two he'd bring five hundred if I had him in the right of trade so I will not take a cent less that one hundred and fifty for him cash now."

"But Major that's asking way too much for a little kid like that, that's very terribly ridiculous altogether" said the colonel.

"Yes" said the colonel, with a decisive nod of the head.

"I'll give one hundred and thirty for him" said the colonel" but not a cent more."

"Make it fifty and I will" said the Major, splitting again with renewed [illegible] "I'll split the difference, and say one hundred dollars and that's the least I'll take it."

"Well, agreed" said the colonel after an interval of quiet.

"Sold" said the Major. "Whats your land."

"Near Gen Fiddler" said the colonel.

"Sam Fiddler" said the Major. "Take care for the christian dogs are still in possession that [illegible] army [illegible]. But we'll get there within a few days and [illegible] I'll sell him to you at dock when the ship is bound and ready, get him off on the quietly as possible [illegible] and if the child is any set [illegible], and starts squalling and flusters [illegible] throw her [illegible] and strangle strangle her." and so after a transfer of certain bills had passed from the colonels pocket book to the trader, he [illegible] another cigarette and offered [illegible] offered one to the Major.

It was a bright tranquil evening when the boat halted for a moment because it bucked battery was firing toward it from a hedge of the m. The girl whose brother was sold had been sitting with her little brother in her arms, was wrapped in a heavy sleep. When she heard the sound of firing[illegible] she hastily laid the little boy down on a pile of cotton bales [illegible] carefully spreading it under a cloak, and the[illegible] sprang to the side of the boat in hope that the Nationals might capture the boat and free her and all the slaves on board. In this hope she stepped forward to the front rails, and stretching out over them strained her eyes intently on the moving objects on the opposite shore, from which came undulating flashes and thunderous reports, and a crowd of soldiers and some child slaves pressed in between her and her little brother.

"Now's your time" said the Major to the colonel as a shell smashed with great noise [illegible] thread [illegible] like sheet lightning. And he took up the sleeping child and [illegible] handing him to the colonel. "Don't wak him up and start him to crying, now as it will cause a terrible squalling from the girl."

The colonel took the boy, carefully and was soon lost in the crowd that left the boat at small landing for a temporary [illegible] against the nationals on the shore. Upon the boat decks, groaning and puffing, with its long range guns firing had [illegible] slowly [illegible] as if along, the little girl turned to her old post. The trader was sitting there--the child of course was gone.

"Why, why where--" she began in bewildered surprise.

"[illegible] child trader [illegible] I told you all not to take him [illegible] to the new army you are going to and I got a good [illegible] sell him to a officer, that'll raise him better than you are able to."

The Mandellinian trader had arrived at that stage of sickedness and hatred for children of all christian nations which could never be commended by any of the other [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] that the poor little girl next on him might have disturbed one to his heart like a stab from a knife, but he was used to it, he enjoyed it to his hearts content and was sorry that he would not make her suffer more. Anyhow he had seen that same look hundreds of times and enjoyed it just as much as a man enjoys the dying struggles of a bed bug which kept him awake at night...maybe any man who might have a sinful nature such also get used to it and so the wicked trader only regarded the mortal anguish which he saw working in the little girls face, those clit clinched hands, and suffocating breathings, as necessary incidents of the trade, and decided if she was just going to scream chee, or get up a commotion on the boat, he would strangle her to death and throw her into the water.

But the unfortunate child slave did not scream. The dart of sorrow had passed too straight and direct through the heart, for her to cry or to even give asingle tear. with her head in a dizzy swim she sat down on the ships bench, and her hands fell lifeless by her side, her eyes looked straight ahead but she saw nothing. All the noise and hum of the boat, the grunting of the swiftly moving machinery, the noise of still continued cann on fire the waves blown elsewhere mingled dreamily on her to her bewildered ear, and the poor little dumb stricken heart could neither cry nor produce a single tear to show her utter sorrow and misery. Unusual for a child in sorrow she was unusually calm but a hatred for the trader rose in her breast.

And the wicked trader who considering his advantages was almost as humane as a blood thirsty tiger gone for a month without prey seemed to feel called on to administer such things called for to make her afraid to cry out.

"I know this was going tocome heard for you Alecia" said he" but if you are a smart sensible girl you won't give way to it. You see it is necessary I get to get money for the canes and it can't be helpless.

"Leave me a lone you brute you beaster" said the girl with a voice like one that is smothering.

"you are a little fire head for a kid" he persisted "I'm going to sell you to general Munley for that remark, and get you a nice hell hole of a place down in his camp and you'll soon get plenty---"

"if you don't leave me alone Iall call for some of mylesse soldiers" said the little girl in a voice so weak and yet with such living anguish that even the Dlandelinian trader felt that there was something at present in the case unlike his style of slave operation. He got up and the little girl turned away, and buried her face in her hands. The trader walked up and down for a time and occasionally stopped and looked at her.

"The little brat takes it more natual than I even expected" he soliloquised" but also she is defiant, but let her suffer awhile, she'll come right by and by and if she don't I'll kill her when no one knows it."

Jannie had watched the whole proceeding from the first tothe ending and had a perfect understanding of its results despite her young age. For to I her it was something unusually horrible, sickned and cruel and her very s ould bled soul bled within her for what was to her the s the wrongs of the poor little sufferingthing that now lay like a crushed rose tued on the piled up bales, the feeling livin, bleeding yet mortal thing which the wicked Dlandelinian law ously clasps with the thrash of bundles, and the like among which she was lying. Yet Jannie had seen inthis an inscident of every day trade among the wicked Dlandelinians a trade which is the vital support of the wicked Dlandelinian rebellion.

Jannie drew slowly near, and tried to say something, but the poor girl only grouned and wished her to go away, with tears running down her wan cheeks, Jannie did her best to tell her of a Heart of il love in the skies, of a pitying loving Jesus, and an eternal home but the little girl overwhelmed withanguish was deaf to every word and her angered and crushed Heart could not feel, and only blamed Him for the whole thing saying within itself,

If He was or is what they say He would not allow this to happen."

A dark and stormy night came on, and as the wind blowed and howled, the boat glinded on glided on, and far in the distance in four places could be seen red glows as i of big fires. One after another the voices of the soldiers had died away, all on the boat except the guards were sleeping and the dashing waves, and rolling thunder were plainly heard and the lightning was blinding, Jannie had stretched herself on a bench and there as she lay h she heard every once in a while a smothered sob of cry from the prostrate child slave--

"Oh what shall I do, how I know, I'll end it all. I'll never allowmyself to me be a slave any longer. If the christian dogs do not free me I'll go free.. and ever and anon until) the murmur died away in silence.

At midnight with the storm at its worse Jannie awoke with a sudden start, something in a girlish form had pushed quickly by her to the other side of the boat, and then a moment after h she heard a spla splash in the water. There was no one else around who had seen or heard anything at all. Jannie slowly raised her head---the place where the little girl had lain was vacant. She slowly got up, and sought about her but in vain. The poor bleeding little heart was still at last and the waves of the river washed past with the speed of race horses as if it had not closed above the little form.

Patience, dear reader. Patience, even all you stone hearts swell with sorrow or indignation at such wicked and cruel wrongs like these even true or not true. There is not [illegible] to be [illegible] one slave, but one to be [illegible] appreciated, whether real slave or not, that is [illegible] must be seen by the Man of [illegible], the Lord of Glory. In his [illegible] patience [illegible] he sees the end of the whole world. Poor like him in patience, and [illegible] for more in He in God the year of his presence" shall come. The trader [illegible] of [illegible] and general Dwight into [illegible] bright and [illegible] of [illegible] like slaves. It was now his turn to look [illegible] quality.

"Now in the name of [illegible] Gloria and her little brother?" he said to Jannie, Jannie who had learned through other sorrows the wide wisdom of keeping counsel did not for [illegible] night yet to state her conversations and suspicions, but said she did not know.

"the gaboly would not have got off in the night during such a storm for the boat never [illegible] night I say and she I remember, and on the look out, whenever the boat [illegible] sth. I never do trust those things to even the guards. They never watch carefully enough."

This speech was addressed to Jannie quite confidentially as if it was something [illegible] would be very interesting to hear. The general stardoned the boat from stern to [illegible] on some boxes, bales and [illegible] barrels, and around the cabin and state rooms and [illegible] in the night but in vain.

"I say Jannie be fair and honest about this work you please" he would shout after a fruitless search he came to where Jannie was sitting. "You know something about this, for I know you do. I know the little girl which brother talking to you and then she and all the [illegible] about night talked weeping about something, and she was not still there at [illegible] twelve, and still that between one and two and then at [illegible] thirty she was gone and you know you was sleeping there all the time. Now you do know something about it. you cannot help it. She was listened with the twenty others to be sold aged for the price on this swing and [illegible] when the boat reaches Port Leland."

"I will said Jannie" tend calmly, I have seen this [illegible] very swiftly and [illegible] all, if some of the time, and then I heard a splash and then I woke up [illegible] to the little girl was gone. That's all I know of it." but then she proceeded to tell also [illegible] how the trader took the little boy and sold him to another soldiers.

The general was shocked, as we said even though he was used to a great many things the trade child he had with on including all kinds of operations of child slavery. Even the total [illegible] of Death in battle had no effect upon him. He had seen Death in his [illegible] both his father, any time almost him even in the way of child slavetrade, child slave trade, and was well acquainted with him, but to lose a slave on account account [illegible] and above all. But he knew that the man was a sneak, a thief, and that [illegible] willing [illegible], and that if [illegible] entered on this way he should, not be able to exchange a single child slave to the Nationalists in the trip. Therefore he considered him [illegible] he [illegible] and [illegible] but there was no help for it, as the little girl had escaped into a state which all [illegible] give up of captive. not even at the demand of the [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] published. The general therefore sat discontentedly [illegible] such [illegible] little account book, and put down the missing body and soul under the head of losses.

"I can only [illegible] the Dlandelinian child slave trader who caused this to be not" said Dwight to the officer she sat near by. " So unfeeling. It's dreadful really. If there was only to slightest clue I'd have him petrused and if caught shot."

"I do [illegible] anything of these kind of traders. They are universally disliked. Never received into any decent society, probably belongs to general Munleys command."

"but eh?" said another Dlandelinian officer" who makes the child slave traders? Who do you think eh is most to blame of it all. The [illegible] soldier, the civilian the factory owner, or the [illegible] enlightened cultivated man who supports the wicked system of which the trader is the real result, of the poor trader himself he all make the public sentiment that calls for his very trade, that debauches and deprives him, to all but [illegible] in money in it, and in what are we Dlandelinians better than he is. Are you [illegible] and he ignorant, you high or he be, you refined and he coarse, you tarlented and he simple. May if there is any such thing as a future judgement these very considerat [illegible] will make it more tolerable for him than for the cuyer."

In contemplating these little incidents of the unlawful Dlandelinian child slave trade we must beg all the readers of the world not to think that all Dlandelinian soldiers are entirely without any humanity as might perhaps be unfairly inferred from the great efforts made in the National body of Dlandelinia, to protect and carry on this species of mortal wicked traffic. Like in old times trading negros from Africa and making [illegible] slaves dear reader is so horrid. It is never to be thought of again. But taking [illegible] white christian children [illegible] from civilized nations just because you hate our lord [illegible] and making them [illegible] living [illegible] life of [illegible] and a deal of suffering in another [illegible] thing, you [illegible] one [illegible] really ever starts into being. I cannot and will not go on very long.

For this part of the story the scene that rises before us now, is quiet indeed. From this point let us look into a large [illegible] neatly pat painted kitchen, with its [illegible] and [illegible] with varnish, and without [illegible] article of dust, a neat well picked contains stove rows of shin. shining tin the suggesti ve of everything you may observe in any good old fashioned kitchen and in the chair swaying back and forth her eyes bent bent on some small writing book sat our well known frien friend angelinia gronburg, the girl heroine of our story. Yes dear readers th re there she is2 paler and thinner the girl heroine of our story. Yes dear readers th re there she is2 paler and thinner than when she was last seen in the National lines from which she came, with a world of quiet sorrow lying under the shade of her long eye lashes, and marring the outline of her gentle mouth. It was plain to see the change and hue firm the little girlish heart had grown under the tinge of neavy sorrow. and when ever and anon her large dark eyes were raised to follow every move of her little boy companion whom she had taken from the rebel camps she was sporting like some butterfly hithervand thiter over the floor, she showed os showed a depth of firmness and steady resolve that was never there in her earlier and happier days. By her side sat Jennie purner with a large bright tin pan in her lap into whic which she was carefully pealing some apples. She might be ten or eleven but she had one of those faces that time seems to brighten and adorn. Her face was round and rosy, with a healthful softness suggestiveness of a ripe peach. Her hair golden of color was parted smoothly to each side and her eyes were defiant. and brave, and yet were loving and of a gray hue, you need only to look straight into them to feel that you saw the bottom of a heart as good, brave and as true as ever trobbed in a little girls bosom. So much had been said and sung of beautiful little or big girls, why don't somebody wake up and write songs about beautiful and brave children whether boy or girl.

If any want to get up an inspiration under this head, we refer them to either our good little friend Jennie purner, just as she sits there in her little rocking chair, or to Gertrude Angelina, or to vivian girls.So old was the chair however that he had a turns for squaking and squa squeaking-----that chair had(either from having ta e taken taken cold in its earlier life or from some asthamatic affection or perhaps from somesome nervious disorders) bit as but as she gently swung backwards and forwards the chair kept up some sort of subdued" creeony creachy" tnat would have been intolerable in any other chair..

" and so you think you' better go back to general Concentinian Aronburge army Gertrude? she said as she was quietly looking over her pappies apples.

" Yes Jennie" said gertrude firmly" I must go onward. I dare not stop, and neither would your Myletzes Glandelinian army will be in possession of this town to morrow."

" and what will we do when we get there to find emperor Viviens army? You must think about that Gertrude dear."

" Gertrude dear" came naturally from the lips of Jennie Turner for here was just the face and form that made it seem every little girl in the world was a sister to her.

Gertrudes hands trembled, and some tears fell on her book, but she answered firmly;

" We shall do anything possible to get there. I hope I ca can meet inwith some advancing army, Viviennnes for one."

" Maybe we can stay here and go with the troops in charge of this town" said Jennie.

"That may be tn true" said Gertrude" but" she pointed to the little boy" I can't sleep nights I can't rest. last night I dreamed I saw a party of Glandelinians coming into the house" she said shuddering.

"Poor Gertrude" said Je nie wipingoner eyes" but you must not feel that way. The Good Lord had ordered it so that never had a fugitive been stolen from me or you. I trust your little charge will not be the first."

The door opened and a t l tall young aoddieamian officer stood at the door with a cheer cheery blooming c face like a ripe apple. He was in the uniform of a colonel and wore a large scarlet hat.

" Colonel Holt" said Jennie purner coming joyfully forward for she knew him" now is the colonel to day?" she said heartnily taking both his hands.

" Good and hearthy" said the colonel taking off off his big hat, and dusting it with his handkerchief displaying as he did so a round little head, on which his hat had sat with a sort of jaunty air despite its shape. certain st a stray locks of decidedly co el curly gray hair had escaped here and there and had to be coaxed and cajoled into their proper place a gain, and then the new comer who was sixty years of age, turned from the small looking glass before which he had been making t wee arrag arrangements and looked well pleased----as people who looked at him might have also been- for he was decidedly a wholesome, whole hearted good natured old man as ever gladdened anothers heart withal.

" Colonel Holt, this is my friend and constant companion angelinia gronburg, and this is the little boy she rescued from the enemy camp of which I told you of."

" I'm glad to see you very glad indeed angelinia------very" said the colonel taking her in his arms as if Gertrude were his own daughter when he return he had long expected. " and this is thy dear little boy companion she had been rescued----I brought a nice cake for him" he said letting her down and nodding out a little canny heart to the little boy he came up gazing through his new beautiful black curls, and accepted shyly.

" ah re is thevgeneral Jennie" said the colonel . " as this is his headquarters I expected he was here."

" oh no's coming he's gone out to have a view of Myletzes army and see how near he is by now."

,tthis At this moment the door again opened and a middle sized officer dressed in a generals uniform, and with large brown eyes, came in.

" ah ha " said Jennie coming up and saluting the general How good he looks and as he does looks him."

" To be sure everybody does" said the bustling general as he took up the little boy and kissing him heartily set him on the floor to collect his thoughts. The boy now a mad quite used t this mode f proceeding and was soon absorbed in his own reflections while the general seated himself, and taking out a small geography began to stay study it while he gave some order to an orderly, while his orderly cook took a kon kettle to the river and soon reappearing, placed it over the stove where it was soon sparring and steaming a sort of censer of hospitility and good cheer. The apples moreover in obedience to a few gentle whispers from Jennie purner were soon dispositted, by the same same hand in a stew pan over the fire. Then she took down a snowy moulding board, and tying on an apron proceeded quietly to making some buscults, first saying to the orderly" I think you had better get a piece of cooked ham ready." and he disappeared accordingly.

" And how is the Glandelinian army under Myletzes getting along" said Jennie as she went on with her buscults.

" Oh it is getting along very fine" said the general" I was close to it this morning and made a good tour of the outskirts of the camp, and was pursued by the Gargoyllian cavalry for ten miles before I escaped. Myletzes got an army large enough to fight any big christian army any day he chooses, and I engage we'll have to abandon this town but I'm going to have some spirited fight first."

" We may as well head for general Aronburge army to morrow, or otherwise the glandelin landsmight burst in pon us and make us prisoners and take the boy again" said Jennie.

" Ah that will be a wise move" said the general" I heard" he added" that Beppo Evans is advancing with another army glandshare and will join Myletzo at the proper time. Colonel John purner was up in ar that region last night, and says that you two girls for your safty better go to morrow northwestward."

" I guess it is good advice" said Jennie" we'll be moving to morrow but here comes lieutenant Saunder. "

Then came the tall straight muscular general in overcoat and yellow pantaloons and broadbrimmed hat entering with the lieutenant.

" O How are you girls?" he said warmly" as he spread his broad open hand for their little palms" and how is the little boy."?

" Oh the little boy is fine and happy now" said Jennie cheerily.

" Any news general" said Jennie as she was put putting her buscults into the oven.

" Colonel Stebbins told me that the Glandelinian army is coming tward this town by river and by land, and Iam concentrating my troops to resist the advance all along the shore at every step" said the general significantly as he was washing his hands at a neat sink, on a little back porch. We have placed b " we have placed batteries but they have done no damage to the fleet so far."

" indeed" said jennie looking thoughtfully and glancing at Gert Gertrude.

" Did the boy your name was Angelinia Aron a Angelinia Aronburg" said the tall gen, to Gertrude as he reentered.

Jennie glanced so quickly at the smaller general sitting by the table as Gertrude tremulously answered " Yes" her fears and excitement ever uppermost, suggesting that possibly there might be persuers or advertisements out for her and the little boy.

" General Holt" said the tall general, standing on the porch, and calling the short middle sized officer out"

" Yes sir" said the latter and he went out on the porch.

" General Vivi nnnnas big army seeming and a part of it will be here to night" said the tall general.

" How are you sure about that? Asked the smaller general who was really the superior.

"It's really true. Th. Vivian girl princess Joice and Penrod also are in this town for one of the soldiers was down to their the small hotel yesterday and there he found a tall man and one girl and boy and and said his name was Joice Vivian and from what he told of his history, I am certain it is the Vivian Girl in disguise with a boy companion and I'm certain she even so is. He is a bright likely little fellow too as shrewd as his girl companion.

" shall we tell Gertrude now?"

" let's tell Jennie purner first." said the other. " Here Jennie dear---come here."

Jennie had first to see how the buscults were, and then was on the back porch in a moment.

" Jennie what do you think?" said the tall general" Joice Vivian and her companion Marco penrod is in the town and will be here to night."

A burst of joy from the little girl heroine ing interrupted the speech. She gave such a bound from the floor, as she clapped her little hands and shouted and sang for happiness that her hair fell over her face.

" gush dear Jennie" said the smaller general, quietly" gush Jennie,. Tell us shall we tell Gertrude now."

" Yes to be sure----this very minute. Why now suppose if she my sisters, how should I feel. Do tell her right away. It will do her good. She'll feel safe with the Vivian girl here."

" You have rightly learned how to love thy neighbor Jennie" said the general looking with a beaming face on the little girl heroine.

" To be sure. I is it not for that we are made. If I did not love them I could not love the poor child slaves. Come now, let's tell her so." and she laid her hands persuasively on the generals arm. Take her into thy bedroom there, and let me fry the ham while you do it."

The general came back into the kitchen, where Angelinia was sitting and opening the door to his bed room said gently-

" Come in her with me my daughter for a minute, for I have news to tell you."

The blood flushed in Gertrudes pl pale face, she rose trembling with nervious anxiety, and looked toward the little boy.

" Now, no" said Jennie, darting up and seizing her hands. " Never fear Angeline, it is very good news----go in, with the general, go in." and she gently pushed her to the door which closed after her, and then turning round she caught the little boy slave in her arms and began kissing and hugging him.

" You'll soon see a beautiful little girl and a good brave boy, little me. Do you know I it. a Princess and her boy companion is coming" she said over and over again, as the boy looked wonderingly at her. Meanwhile within the door. another scene was going on. The general had drawn Gertruda tward her and placing his arm around her gently said;

" The Good Lord had mercy on these daughter of Abbieannia, Juice Vivian is coming here, and her boy friend Penrud."

The blood flushed to Gert des cheek in a sudden glow, and then went back to her heart with as sudden a rush. She sat down pale and faint.

" Have courage, child of Abbieannia" said the good general laying his hand on her head. " They are among the troops here which is hundreds of thousands strong, and a squadron of dragoons will bring them both here to night. They know you are here and are come to leed you to the emperors army."

" To night" Gertrude repeated. " To night " the words lost all meaning to her, her headwas dreamy and confused, all was mist for a moment.

When she came to she woke to discover herself tucked up on a bed but in a moving wagon with a heavy blanket over her, and Jennie Turner rubbing her hands with camphor and apply ing smelling saults to her mouth and nose, providing she did not drink it too) She opened her eyes and gazed around in a sort of dreamy manner, feeling a sort of delicious delicous lanquor such as one or other who had been in a long deep sleep or one had been bearing a heavy load and then feeling relieved of it, had a good long rest.. The tension of the nerves which had never ceased a single moment since the beginning of her flight from general Myletzes army had finally given way, and a strange feeling of security and rest came over her, and as she lay still with her large dark blue eyes wide open, she followed as if a quiet dream the motion of the wagon as it swayed gently to and fro and listened to the so sound of horses and men outside, and other sounds about the w wagon. She saw the canvas covering in the rear of the wagon open, saw some one look in,, saw a distant mountain with its snowy top, heard the dreamy murmur of the breezes in the tall trees saw Jennie Turner moving back and forth inside the wagon with dishes and kitchen utensils and ever and anone stopping to put a little piece of cake in the little boys hands to pet his head, or twine his long curls around her snowy fingers.. She saw the ample fatherly form of the general himself as he ever and anon came to the beside and smoothed and arranged something about the bed cloths, and gave a tuck here and there by a way of expressing his good will and was conscious of a kind of sunshine teaming down upon her from his large clear brown eyes. She saw another officer come in saw him speak to him and commence whisperingvery earnestly everand anon with impressive gesture, pointing his finger tward the matress upon which wounded Ge trude Angeline lay upon. She saw him with the little boy in his arms, setting down beside beside her, and then looking out through th the opening she saw a long column of su soldiers in purple marching, under the shadow of a forest of immense fir and pine trees, there was the tramp of feet, the low murmur of voices, the distant of near shouts of command, gentle tinkling of bells on cavarly horses or the bell like buttons on the rims of the hats, and the rattling of artillery wheels and noise of distant shooting and explosions and a musical clatter, of something that sounded like cups and saucers outside, all mingled into a delightful dream of rest, and Angelinia Aronburg relieved of the pain from her wounds, and fear of the lad being retaken slept as she had not slept before since the fearful midnight hour, when she took the little boy and fled across the broken bridge.

Then she dreamed of being back in Emperor Vivians army that it was advancing through a beautiful country, a land it seemed to her of rest, green shores, pleasant islands, and beautifully glittering water, and then she dreamed the army stopped its march and then in emperor Vivians headquarters which kind voices told her was to be her home, she saw her sister sleeping, a free and happy child. She heard her uncles afootsteps, she felt him coming nearer, his arms were around her, his tears falling on her face and she awoke suddenly with a start. It was no dream. The daylight had just begun, the little boy she had taken from the Glandulinian camp lay calmly sleeping by her side, a lantren was burning dimly and hanging from the ceiling of the canvass covering, and general Concen tinian Aronburg was stooping over her speaking with emption to another General.

It was Concentinian Aronburgs army moving northward. The next morning and a cheerful one in this vast Glandulinian camp. The army had halted in its advance and had laid down in immense camp and all the soldiers were up making breakfast and the wagon in which Gertrude slept was surrounded by busy soldiers and who all moved obediently to the generals orders for a breakfast in the Abbieannian armies was quite a great one ine indeed. While therefore some of the soldiers ran to the creek for water, and others sifted the corn meal for making baked corn cake, and others cooked their coffeeover the camp fire, or cutting up chickenand the like other work continued throughout the camp. and while all other preparations were going on one of the generals stood in his shirt sleeve before a big camp fire close to the wagon engaged in the art of shaving having a small hanging glass hanging on the front part of a tree. Everything went on quietly and socially so quietly so harmoniously in the camp--that it seemed very pleasant for every one to do what they were doing and there was such an atmosphere of confidence and good fellowship everywhere, even the men were singing rung time songs, and knives and forks seemed to join in with the gaong, and chicken and ham n hom a joyful fizzle in the many pans as if they rather enjoyed being cooked by the soldiers than otherwise, and when Angelinia Aronburg and Jennie Turner were helped at of the wagon and the little boy was brought along they met such a hearty rejoicing welcome by every soldier and officer within sight, that it was no wonder it still seemed to her like a dream.

At last the two girls and the boy was seated with general Concentinian Aronburg and others at the breakfast, while to her surprise a beautiful little b girl stood at an big camp fire baking griddle cakes which as they gained the true golden brown to tint of perfection were transferred quite handily to the general and the girls with a hearty good greeting of welcome and love to Gertrude. Jennie Turner hself herself never looked so truely happy as now, and there was so much friendliness and full heart heartedness heartedness even in the way she passed a plate of cakes or poured a cup of coffee that ly s it seemed to put a spirit into the coofee or food she herself also cooked, and offered.

It was the one hundredth time however that Angelinia Aronburg had sat down on a mud torne at a meal with a Abbieannian general and she sat down as willing as the others but close to her uncle. This meeal was general Concentinian Aronburgs army, which had arived within the reach of the town without being known of its approach, and a stronger confidence in God, and trust in his providence began to encircle her little heart, as with with a golden cloud of confidence, and success, dark, p misanthropic pining, doubts as to the cause, in and a fierce despair melted away before the light of this scene and of a living Gospil Gospel breathed in every living face, preached by a hundred thousand acts of kof love and good will, which like the cup of cold water given in the name of a disciple will never lost its reward.

" Father Time could not have seen a better a scene than this.

" Oh Uncle why do you not go and fight general Myletze" said Gertrude as she buttered her corn cake.

" I'm so sorry but the emperor has ordered me to his support." said the general quietly.

" but what if general Myletze is to follow you!"

" I should worry about that. It would be like the lamb following the lion."

" But what if he sends after you a battle!"

" Couldn't I get the permission of Juice Vivian over yonder to fight him!" said general Aronburg smiling. " Her permit would be the same as the emperor's."

" The Princess can do almost anything, as we are all under her" said another general. she was Gillman. but is it not a shame that the Childs slave question could not be settled without such a bloody war."!

" You must never speak evil of our own Cause general" said the great man gravely.

" It is the good Lord's will that Glandulinia be touched a good lession, and the efore he gives our nation armies big enough to surprise the world, that we may do justice and mercy and free the slaves with this quarrel with Glandulinia. If the wicked rulers require the settlement of the question in a peaceful way I'm glad to accept it if they choose to fight th guilt of the war is on their own backs, and therefore we must free the children held in bondage if we have to destroy the Glandulinian army and government to do so."

" well I hate those old Childs slave holders said another general.one felt a as uncreation as will become any modern reformer.

" I am surprised at you for that remark general" said Concentinian Aronburg. " We should never feel so for any enemy even if we are fighting them. I would refuge the enemy as well as the slave if the Lord brought him to my camp in affliction."

The general blushed scarlet but another only replied;

" We are all good generals but we must not be too good to the enemy or they'll be too good to us and won't fight."

Every one burst out laughing at this joke even Angelinia Aronburg conceived.

" I hop my good uncle your armies won't be exposed to any uncessary difficulties on my account with this baby boy I took from Myletzes army" said Gertrude anxiously.

" Fear nothing Gertrude for we can handle the enemy if he follows after us. If we would not meet trouble for a good and holy t cause then we Abbieannians are not worthy of our name."

" But for me" said Angelinia Aronburg I would not bear it. It is not myself I fear but for the little boy I took away with me. If they get him it'll be all the worse for the poor lads. I took the chances of rescuing him and I don't want them to regain him again.

" Fear not my dear neice it is not only for you and the little boy in whom I regon recognize as Roswell Pastor Johnstons son, but for you and the cause we do it. Said the general. and now you must lie quietly this day and both Jennie and the Princess while watch by you and cheer you, and to night as soon as the sun sets the whole army will again br ch the march. The persuers might be hard after you, and even sent spies into our camp and so I must not delay."

" In this case why wait untill evening!" said Jennie to herself.

The girl is safe here by daylight, for I have all guards on the outskirts on the camp closely watching so that no suspicious character gets in. The guard knows a certain pass word which has been given to all the men and no if any tries to come in and has not the pass word h is arrested right away. every one is watching, and not only that but it has been found safer to travel by night. I'm heading for big dirt knool. emperor vivian gave me orders to go there and recieve another army waiting for me there."

The great Amondaris has river. Indeed now as by some enchanted wand has its scenes been changed so far by the bloody war raging like two enormous fiery serpents along its banks and within its domain yet it was a river as mighty as the broad mississippi in America and just as large, rolling amid undreamed wonders of beautiful vegetation and animal existance and navigatable its full length down to its very mouth.

But as in an hour, this river of dreams and wild romances could have emerged to a reality scarcely less visionary and splendid. what or other river of the world bears on its bosom to the ocean or will bear, the bloody scenes of the past, or what are to come, the horrors and fierce interprises and disasters of each another country, a country whose armies are in throes with one another like two big hurricanes trying to oppose the others passage, and a million thunderstorms and tornadoes trying to interfere and batt in d with the tremendous spectacle.. those turbid waters, hurrying, foaming, tearing along, in spt resemblance of that neamless tide of of wars pain which is to be poured along its wats by a war and horror more vehement and energetic than any the real nations ever saw or ever will see. Oh would that they did not also bear along another awful freight, the tears of the many thousands, of oppressed child slaves, the signs of the helpless child slaves, the bitter prayers of poor innocent hearts to Jehovah seemingly senseless providence who seems to hear not, silent, apparent hardened to these scenes, but the will yet" come out of His place to save all the poor of the earth."

The slanting light of the setting sun of the april day, silvered on the sea like expanse of the mighty river, the shivery corn stalks of last fall, the tall dark trees of every description hung with wreaths of dark funereal moss glow in the golden ray, as the big fe fleet of heavily laden gunboats and transports steams onward, while on the shore to the left the big Glandelinian army under Mydetze marched silently and in grand and imposing array, only ten miles now of San Pedro.

The decks of the ships were piled with cotton bales and wooden boxes filled with sand up over decks and sides, that they, seemed in the distance a long massive blocks of grey and this was not cargo but as a defensive bulwark against the national rifle fire which was going on nearly every hour day or night with only a sort of interval between it being when some great confidtion army was following on the opposite shore. let we must look sometime among its crowded decks, or among soldiers firing toard the shore before we shall again find our friend Jennie, the poor child slave. Now below the piles of bales of boxes in a little nook among the every where predominant cotton bales at last we can find her.

JANNIE'S FRIENDSHIP WITH A NEW CHILD SLAVE. A FEW MORE DESCRIPTIONS OF GENERAL IZNAR MYLS MYLETZE AND OTHER IMPORTANT MATTERS. JANNIE'S MASTER AND HIS OPINIONS OF SLAVERY.

PARTLY from confidence inspired by general Federals full inspirations and representations and partly from the remarkably inoffensive and quiet character of the little slave Jannie had won her way far into the confidence of the most suspicious Glandelinian officer on the boat, a man who would never trust slaves in any condition whatever. At first general Dargin had watched her narrowly throughout the day, and never allowed her to sleep at night unfettered, but the waysshe seemed to be and as she never complained and was always very patient and contented, her manner led him gradually and quickly to discontinue these restraints and for sometimes already Jannie had enjoyed a parole parole of honor being permitted to come and go freely wherever she pleased on the boat. She was ever quiet and obliging and always was more than ready to lend a hand in every emergency which occured among the soldiers below or above, and she had won the good opinion of every soldier of every soldier and child slave and had spent many hours in helping the them with as hearty a good will as I ever a man would on a big farm of his own. And when there seemed to be nothing for her to do, she would climb down to a nook among the cotton baltes or bales of the upper deck and busy herself in studying over her bible--even if firing was going on, and even there is where we can see her now, like a little black haired fairy hiding from the grims scenes on shore.

For several miles around or about San Pedro the river is deeper wider and higher than the surrounding country, and rolls its tremendous levees or volo volumnes of water between massive levees thirty to fourty feet and even a hundred feet in height. The soldiers from the decks of the big ships as from some floating castle top overlooks the whole country for miles and miles around, and observes as far as his view can be immense wide and long gray columns of men, thick with a forest of bayonets, and flag, and along side in broken lines artillery and baggage wagons and cavarly squadrons. Jannie therefore for a time watching these scenes had spread out before her full view in plantatation after plantation and on roads and country a nation of soldiers all moving in one direction and the sight of it and the sight of another army on the opposite side nearly bigger moving the same way made her have a peculiar shivering feeling which she could not account for.

She saw the distant long lines of wagon and artillery trains, saw long lines of other child slaves marching with the army between the wagon trains; she saw far off small villages all smoke and afire, saw men in gray spread out in long fan shipicolumns through all the plantations within view distant from the stately mansions and pleasure grounds of the owners emitting smoke puffs and the like and as the moving picture of this scene passed on her poor fullwith foolish heart would be turning backward to her own home and parents, with its beautiful forests and country glens and mountain meadows to her fathers house with its wide cools halls, and near by her little playhouse overgrown with beautiful plants. There she seemed to see familiar faces of her little comrades, who had come often to play with her, she saw her brother and sister(now dead) playing games with other children orwherself, she heard their merryblaugh while at merry laugh smile at play, and the chirrup of the babi baby at her mothers knee, and then with a start all faded, and she saw again the plantations overrun by immense Glandelinian armies, and heard again the creaking and grinding wheels of wagons and artillery cussions the noise of tramping men, the shouts of commands, the sound of distant firing, all telling her too plainly that all that happy phase of life had gone forever, for if she was free to be free, yet her parents and brother and sister were dead and the baby too having been slain by the very Glandelinians who had kidnapped her.

In such a case the reader no doubt would write to some friend telling of the loss, and send messages to a relative, telling you have lost your wife and children home and all---but Jannie had no one to write to, could not write to any one as she had no one to write to---therefore the mail had for her no existance, and the gulf of seperation was bridged or embridged by even an unfriendly word or signal.

Would it be strange then that she would for a long time hide her face in her arm arm and weep silently, or that some tears would fall on the pages of her bible as she lay on the floor between the cotton bales and with patient finger thread her way from word to word traces out its promish promises. Having learned early in life through fellow slaves, Jannie was a fast reader for her young age, and passed on or from verse to verse with quickly but carefully. And fortunately for her was it that the book she was intent on was one which either slow or fast reading could not injure,---may one whose words like ingots of gold seemed often to be pondered upon seperatedly that the mind may take on their priceless value. Let us follow the poor little girl a moment as pointing to each word and pronoun pronouncing each half aloud she slowly and carefully read;;;

" Let not Let---not---your---heart---be troubled. In---my-----Fathers----house---
---there---are---many---mansions. I---go---prepare---a place---to---prepare---a place---for --- you."

Many an Angelinian when he buried his darlying and only daughter or son who might have been treacherlously slain by raiding Golandelinians has had a heart as full of honest grief as poor little Jannie---perhaps no fuller, for both were human, but these Angelinians even though they would or did pause of over such words of sublime hope and look to a future reunion, ten to one he would not have believed, for his sorrow would mak nim make him doubtful, only fill nim with a desire for revenge on both heaven and the enemy, heaven for allowing this to happen and the enemy for doing it. and would fill his head with a thousand questions of authenticity of manuscript, and correctness of translation. But to poor little Jannie, there it lay, just what she needed, so evidently true and devine that even the possibility of the slightest doubt or question never entered her simple head. It must be true, for it not true how could she live, even as a slave, when she had passed nearly five years in Manleys army since she was one y a year old.

As for poor Jannie's little bible it was a Catholic one, and it had been embellished with certain way marks and guide boards of Jannie's own invention, and which helped her to keep the places of mst importance in the book. When she did not know how to read it had been her custom to get the bible read to her by her masters learned slaves slaves, and then as she herself had now read she would designate by all kinds of colored ribbons the passages or pages on which were the passages which more particularly satisfied her desires or affected her heart. Her bible therefore was marked through from one end to the other with a variety of stylish little silk ribbons so she could in a moment seize upon her favorite passages, without the labor of turning over so many other pages before she came to it and while it therefore lay there v before her every passage breathing of some old home scene, and recalling some past enjoyment her Bible seemed to her all of her life that remained, as well as a promish of a future one, and a promishe of promise of her freedom.

Among the slaves of this boat on which she rode, was a young boy she bore the name of Herdrude Gloria..He had with him a little sister between fix and six years of age, together with an elder sister she seemed to claim a nearer relation to both, and to have the little as especially under her charge. Jannie had often caught smi glimpses of this little slave girl--for she was forced by her master to be one of those busy working creatur creatures, that can no more be contained in one place, that she is sent here to do that, sent there to do this, hurry up over here and get through you little brut, or what are you so slow about," nor was she one that once seen could be easily forgotten.

H "he had the perfection of childish beauty, but without its usual chubbiness and smoothness of outline, and was dressed only a in a girls undersear, and had on her bare arm an immense scar which was her slave brand mark. Yet there was about her form an undulating and strange aerial grace, such as any person might dream of for some yet stranger and mythitic and allegorical being. Her face was remarkable for its perfect beauty of feature, and for a singular dreamy sad and earnestness of expression, which made many look at her with a start, and by which the dullest and most wicked of the Glandslinian soldiers were impressed without exactly knowing why. The shape of her head and the turn of her kec neck and bust was unusually beautified, and the long bobbed gilden hair that floated like golden clouds around it the deep spiritual d graviety of her violet blue eyes, shaded by her heavy fringes of gold all marked her entirely out from other child slaves, and made every soldier turn and look long after her, as she was forced to work here and there on the boat by her master she seemed to be harsh with her despite her lovelimess. Nevertheless the little one was not shut any one would have called either a grave or a frightened one. On the contrary an airy and innocent defiance seemed to flicker like the shadow of suffer leaves over her childish face, her eyes would flash in return for every cross word hurled at her by her master and she would answer something which the others did not hear.

The master always kept her in motion, yet she worked with always a half smile on her face, though he kept her going hither and thir thither without a moments res . rest. Indeed her al master andcsister and brother were incessant in persuading her and no word of reproof from him would she pay any attention to and when abused she would soon again disappear from him and pursue her own way all over the boa vent when he was not looki looking. Always dressed only in the undersear she seemed at night t move like some fairy sprite through all sorts of dark places, without contracting spot of stain on her uniform, and there was not a corner or a nook above or below, where those fairy footsteps had not glinded and that visionary golden head with its deep blue defiant eyes fleeted along.

The officers on board the boat sometimes found those strange eyes looking wondering ly into the immense columns of marching troops on the shore on both sides, and fearfully and pityingly at them as if she thought both armies were doing something dreadful. But not one would give her so much as a simple smile and a thousand times a day rought voices cursed her, and blows of unwonted force and cruelty, fell upon her as she passed some rough Glandelinians, and when she tripped fearlessly over some dangerous places over the boat rought hands beat her, or mean boots and shoes struck against any portion of her body, perfect , kicks when they should have reached out haves to save her, or smooth out her her path. Yet Jannie an, had the soft impressible nature of her own race, ever yearing toward the slaves of her own kind, watched the little creature with daily increasing interest and sympathy, and often begged general Bargin to buy her from her brutal master but he had not the price of the money. To her the little new slave seemed something almost devine and when ever her strange g l golden head and deep blue eyes peered upon her from behind some door or looked down upon her over some ridge of packages during a li lull in the firing, she half believed it was one of the Vivian Girls she had heard of in disguise though she never knew what their size or age would be.often and often when fro from toil she would walk mournin mournfully around the gangs of other slaves and would glide in among them and look at them with an air of perplexed and sorrsful and yet defiant earnestness, and sometimes she would lift their chairs withnner slender hands and then sigh woefully, as she glided away saying;

" Why does go God allow children of other nations to be slaves "

Jannie and her fellow slaves usually would watch this little new slave very often, but so far Jannie or the others did not make any venturesome attempts toward quaintanceships or friendship, because some of the slaves, did not like her because she was not like them. But Jannie did, and though she was very young she nevertheless knew of many simple and small acts to invite the approaches of a new slave, and therefore she resolved to play he her part right skillfully. often for the fun of other slaves she had often cut cunning little articles such as baskets and faces out of peach or cherry stones, and made funny and ugly faces on paper, and formed funny and odd jumping figures out of pine tar, and she indeed was a very " Peter Pan" in the manufacture of whistles of all sizes. Therefore unknown to her master her pockets were usually filled p with all kinds of ist articles of attraction which he she had hoarded for the benifit benefit of other child slaves, and which she often produced with great commendable prudence and economy ons by one as overtures for ac, ac maintance and friendship.

The new slaveslave appeared to be very shy however for all her ways otherwise, and it was not easy to get her to come among the other slaves. So for a while she would be sitting on some box or b package near Jannie and her companions while she would recieve the little presents from her, and also take from her with a kind of grave bashfulness the little strange articles she offered her. but after about two days of this they became good friends.

" What is your name little Miss!" said Jannie at last when she thought it was safe to ask such a question.

" Francis Lillian' said the little slave' though all the slave owners called me--

The Brat. how what is your name little girl?"

" My name is Jannie Francis Lillian, but my friends usually only call me Jannie."

" Then I rather call you Jannie because you are the only slave that was friendly to me and so I like you" said Lillian. "

"" I belong to general Myletze' said Jannie," where are you going?"

" I don't know Jannie, My master is going to sell me."

" Don't know?" said Jannie.

" No I'm going to be sold to some mean master to some body because my master does not like me. He says I do not do enough work. But I don't know who'll it be."

" General Bergin or my master can really buy you" said Jannie hastily" and if he buys you you will have better times and may be even sent to the christian lines in exchange for prisoner and then be free. I'm going to ask him to this very day."

Thank you Lillian" said the little girl forgetting for the moment and calling Jannie by her last name.

The boat here stopped for several moments or so as the main fleet had halted and the ships in down at front were opening a heavy fire on some obstruction on the shore, and Lillian hearing her cruel masters voice, bounded nibly bi nimbly away. Jannie rose up and went forward to see what was causing all the excitement and soon was as interested and as excited as the rest of them as the ships down below were answering the terrific fire of a number of batteries on the shore. Lillian and her master were standing together by the railing to see more clearly what was the cause of the firing, when the ship began to start slowly, the wheel made two or three revolutions in the water, when suddenly upon the very deck of the ship there was a noise like thunder a shattering roar that shook the enormous ship from t stern to stern, and a cloud of smoke arose, while two smoke stacks and a portion of the cabin erupted into the air, and every one on board was showered with wreckage, and some cut by flying splinters. At the same moment the little slave Lillian was fl five others standing by the railing by the force and shock were hurled into the water, and a large piece of timber flung with her narrowly missed the head of the child as they went in. One of the Glandelinian soldiers saw the children strike the water and sink and calling loudly to others saw in after them in a moment. This fellow was a brutal cheated man and it was nothing for him to keep afloat in the water till in a moment or two the child Lillian rose to the surface and as the other men plunged in after the other children he caught her in his arms, and swimming to the side of the boat handed her up all dripped to the grasp of the first persons who clo crossed to the edge which as if they were all belonging to one man were stretched eagerly out to recieve her.

Her master who had refused to go to her rescue and saw that more efficient aid had followed his slave walked away cursing and swearing for he did not worry his head as whether she was drowned or not. A moment more and her rescuer quickly bore her dripping and senseless to the unwrecked cabin, and as one other came in with the others closed the door and started bringing the children to, while the ship was now replying fiercely to the battery which had sent the shell crashing across its decks. It was

It was a sultry close day, the next day, and there were ten immense fires burning in differe different directions that sent clouds of smoke rolling upward to a great height like as if ten immense volcanoes were blowing their insides out and seeing which could throw the flames and smoke the highest, and somewhere not know to the slaves, there was a terrific terrific salvoes of cannonading as the ships she was on drew near to San Pedro which also was aflame and from which also came the sound of explosions an and firing. A gent general bustle of expectation and preparation was spread throughout the big ship, in the cabin one and another of the soldiers were gathering their things together and arranging them with the purpose to go ashore as they heard general Myletze was sending large forces to attack the Nationals near the town and they did not want to miss the fight. Every one on deck were busy even the crew arranging the ship preparatory to a grand attack with its big guns, for the other boats down ahead were firing all their sherward guns with remarkable precision there being a million echoes from all the thundering noise.

On the lower deck sat Jannik-- Lillian with her arms folded not paying any attention to the exciting din and yet anxiously from time to time turning her eyes tward a group on the safer side of the boat. There stood Jannie listening as it seemed to the noise of the distant fray, a little paler from excitement than the day before but other wise exhibiting no trace of its effects upon her. General Dargin stood beside her, care lessly leaning one elbow on a bale of cotton, while a large pocket book lay open before him. It was quite evident at a glance that it was general Durgin all right.

He had a noble cast of head, large dark blue eyes, golden brown hair, yet the expess expression in his face was wholly different than from Myletze. T in the large clear blue eyes though in form and color exactly the same, there was wanting that crafty fierce like expression, even though w all was clear, bold and bright, but with a light wholly of his cause only and nothing else, the beautiful cut mouth had a proud and some what severe and sarcastic expression, while an' an air of free and easy superiority sat not ungracefully in every turn and movement of his fine form. Any one who saw him would have said; " sure general Dargins has the exact likeness of Augustine St Clare who bought poor U" Uncle Tom" for the sake of his little daughter " Evangeline St Clare." He was listening but with an impatient air, yet half comic, half contemptuous to Lillians Master, who was it seemed very anxious to sell her but wanted a good price for her in the bargain.

" All the moral mortals and christian virtues bound complete in slaves, I presume" he said when the little girls master had finished. " Well now sir, since she is a christian als slave what is the price you want for her. How much are you going to charge me for a slave who is become a christian. Out with it. Don't delay I'm busy and have not much time. I'll be called any moment so hurry."

" Well" said her master whose name was------was well our old time acquaintance" James Delden the worse of all Glandelinian slave drivers" If I should say one thousand six hund red dollars for the little bru-- I mean slave I should but justly myself, and make it a b bargain."

" You are quite expensive for slaves of your kind James Delden" said Durgin fixing his keen blue eyes on him mockingly. " But I suppose you would not let it down for any reason whatever."

" Well your little brat---- I mean little slave Jan i- Jannie seems to be regarding her and naturally enough."

" Oh certainly, certainly, there a call for some sort of benevolence, sir but as your in a portion of Myletzes army just now I'll request you to please leave out that word--

" B--e--A--T". Now as a matter for the Glandelinian cause as you say, how cheap will you afford to let her go as my property or Myletzes at least as I'm buying her for him, and to oblige a slave who is particularly desirable of her."

" Well now just think on it---"

" I have no time to do any thinking, I'll be called for duty" said the general impatien impatiently. What's the price."?

" Just look at them little limbs, look at her golden head beautiful as a sprite, she is a calculating b-----I mean slave that will do any kind of thing. I've marked her all up with identification lines so that she escapes no one. Now a slave of that kind is worth a considerable price, just as you may say for the work she can do, and the money she can make for her master, and also what she may do in the labor of the army such as trench digging, even though she's a stupid bru--- girl slave but come to put it in her calcul ating faculties and which many can show she is an uncommon bru---I mean child slave why of course it makes her come much higher. What that little slave managed my whole slave plantation as small as sh is. She has some gra great turlet the little--- bru--- I mean slave has."

" Bad, very bad knows a little too much for what you always try to call her" said the general with a mocking smile playing about his mouth. " I suppose you are so used to the word " brat" that you cannot forget it if a man was to shoot you. Never will do in the word world. Your smart slaves are always running off, giving away things to the Nationals, and causing the christians to raise the devil generally with us. I'll say you'll have to take a couple of hundred off for her smartm smartness and for her being a christian and a so called" brat".

" Well there might be something like that if it was not for her character, but I can show recommendations from her former masters, and even others, to prove that all hell cannot make her abandon her love of god and the Saints, that she is really a pious---the most humble praying pip pious brat any person ever did see. Why she might be an Evangelist some day."

" And I might use her for an army chaplin and convert Myletzes army so it'll fight on the side of the christians" added general Dargin dry. " That's quite an idea. Religion is not only remarkably scarce in our armies, but not nesslowed no more than it is in Manl ys so put that into your head Delden and smoke your pipe the other way I don't the smoke as your pipe is sour."

" You are joking now."

" How do you know I am Delden? Did you not just warrant that she is also a christian even though she's a little slave. And who examined her. Come hand over your papers. ot Not the bill of sale, the recommendation papers if you have them."

If Delden had not been sure by a certain good humored twinkle in the large blue eye that all this banter was absolute in the long run to turn out a cash concern, he might have been somewhat out of patience, as it was he laid down a big pocketbook on one of the cotton bales jumping as he did so when a shell crashed with an earsplitting noise overheard, and recovering himself though feeling somewhat hurt at Dargins laugh, began anxiously studying over certain papers in it, the young man that is general Durgin standing by the while looking down on him with an air of careless, easy drollery.

" General do buy her please, even no matter what you have to puy" shispered Jannie pleadingly softly getting up on a package of cotton. " You generals have money enough I know and she has a hard mean master. I don't like his looks. I want her for a companion!"

" What for gluvy' are you going to use her for a Evangelist and civili se sy army or what?"

" I want to take her away with me so we'll both go to the christian lines when we are exchanged."

" Oh I see, an orginal reason, but 1611 do it."

Here Delden handed up several certificates, signed by the slaves former owners, while the general took only one of them and glanced over it carelessly.

" A great gentlemanly hand" he said" and well spelt too but he's goo got too many of these words" 222 " CHRISTIAN DOGS" in the writing. Must have been a great hand at it. Well now I'm not sure after all about a christian child slave and the religion she'll spread through my armies" said he" the old wicked expression returning to his eye." We Glandelinians in Myletzes army are usually good to our slaves but will not allow any " Christianity " around here as there's a decree against it and if she does it she'll regret being bought here. The Glandelinia country is already ruined with so many of these, pious pious child slaves, such pious going goings in all departments of slave camps that it seems churches are needed, that a Glandelinian soldier does not know what's he going to run up again next. I have not looked in the av advertisement of the papers to see how slaves with the Catholic or other religions sells or how they got the religion in the first place. I did not even know Delden a man as hard on slaves as you are, that they die under your hand by the hundred a month would tolerate religion in a sinal single one of them. How many hundred dollars now sir do you put on for this religious slave child."?

" You like to be joking now" said the trader" but then you'll open your eyes soon. I know there's difference in religious slaves. Some kind are tolerably miserable, there is your nice meeting pious, there's your singing screaming roaring pious, there ain't no account on them black white or yellow but one like this little girl there is worth, for nothing, can tempt her to do anything they think is wrong, and you see in this letter what her old master said of her."

" I understand in one way and in another I don't said the general stooping gravely over his book of money" If you can assure me that I can really buy this pious child slave, and that it will settle my account in the big Book above and have God excuse me for fighting against the Abblicanniian Government I would not care if I did go a little extra on the price for her. What do you say?"

" Well really I can't do that" said the trader. " I'm thinking to myself that it is up to every man to look out for his own soul in that case, as I'm no confounded priest that pretends he can save souls."

" Well I never rather hard on a general that pays extra on a religious child slave, and fights for a cause he thinks right, and yet can't trade with it in the state where he wants it most is it not" said the general who had been counting out a roll of bills while he was speaking' There count your money Delden" he added as he had handed the roll to the trader.

" All right" said Delden his bull dog like face beaming with delight, and pulling out his fountain pen he proceeded to fill out a bill of sale which in a few minutes he handed to the general.

" I wonder how if the Glandelinian army will ever be divided up and fully inventoried" said the latter as he ran over the paper" how much I might bring for my comfort on the child slaves I usually buy for Mylestze. But some jennie h said and taking the hand of the little slave he stepped across the deck and standing before the little golden haired child said in his neutral natural way-

" Come along with me golden hair, and see how'll you get used to your new master. The little girl looked up. It was not in nature for a little slave girl she always dested and hated a Glandelinian general or a soldier to look into that gay young handsome face without a feeling of pleasure, and the little girl felt the tears start in his eyes as she arose and followed him and also said;

" God bless you Master."

" well I doubt h if he will because I'm fighting on the side that's not his. but what's your name. Lillian Francis or Francis Lillian. quite as likely to do it as for your asking my name from all accounts. Can you drive horses, clean wagons, carry horses, and take care of fellos slaves, Lillian."

" I have learned to do most any kind of work" said Lillian. " My last master made me take care of cavarly hos horses....."

" well I think I shall get you in coachy on condition that you won't run away more than once a week unless in cases of emergency Lillian."

The little girl looked rather surprised and hurt and said;

" I never had dared to run away master; I'd be burned at the stake."

" I've heard that story before, Lillian but there's no burning at stake here. If you run away you only do so at your own risk of facing starvation and the like because none of us will go and hunt for you, but then we,ll see. But it will be a special accomodation if you act wise and don't for your own concern as we exchange slaves to the christian armies for soldiers of our side they take in a fight. Never mind my golden hair" he added good nat edly naturedly seeing li hi d Lillian still looked grave. " I don't doubt you mean to do well."

" I surely will master" said the little girl.

" sDon't call me Ma ter, just plain general" he said.

" and you don't know Mylstzes army" said jennie' Here you'll have good times for the Glandelinian generals here are g od to every slave and other little children, only if slaves do not behaves he only laughs at them and that hurts more than any other punishment."

" General Dargin is much obliged to you for his unusual recommendation" said the general laughing as he turned on his heel and the two followed as he walked away, since the thread f of our unusual Glandelinian heroes life has now become interwoven interwoven with that of more higher ones it is necessary to give some brief introduction of him again is it is proper to do so. General Isner Mylstze was the son of a Baron who had lived in Angelinia Agathia but had turned against the Government and fled south but was too old a man to fight in the army. The whole family had its origin in Angelinia Agathia, the very place he was now moving, against to capture. His father very exact in temperment and character character had settled on a flourishing farm in southern Glandelinia while Mylstze has become the general he now is. The mother of the general was a saintly lady whose family had come to an gelinia ab Agathia from northern Abbleannia. Isner Mylstze and his brother John were the only children of their parents and both did not follow the foot steps of their mother. Having inherited from his father a strong body and a strong willed and determined nature he was at the advise of the Glandelinian government sent to take command of armies that were to oppose the first invasion of the National armies in order that he could check the trespass, which he and Black Brooks his helper accomplished as the early war shows.

In child hood he was remarkable for an extreme and marked sensitiveness of character, not like a sissy but a lad who is easily aroused for the slighrest remark against his person and fights as quick as a maddog with a cat. Time did not stop this roughness, and his tarlents were the very first order, and there was about him that tarlent for ddlitary life which was the common result of what he is now. Soon after the completion of his military college course in angelinia Agathia, his whole nature was kindled into one intense and passionate desire for adventure. At the outbreak of the conflict his hour came,---the hour that comes only once to makes ones who choice, his star rose in the horizon, that star that rises so often in vain to be remembered only as a thing in dreams, but it rose for him to a great success. To drop the figure-- he saw and loved or won the love of a beautiful young woman though only natural in features in Angelinia Agathia and they were affianced. He went to southern Angelinia to make some arrangements for their marriage, when most unexpectedly his letters were returned to him by mail with a short note from her father stating to him that ere the letter reached him the lady would not be allowed to marry him because he was not of the proper kind and wrongged his holy country by refusing to be a Catholic. Mylstze had strove for other things besides this, he had desired the means to obtain a chance to adopt orphan children and failed in this and now stung to madness he vainly hoped as many another had done to fling the whole thing from his heart by one desperate effort. Too proud to supplicate or seek explanation he threw himself at once into the Glandelinian cause, renounced all women and christian dom and his God, and in ten months from the time of the fatal letter had struck the first telling blows against his own country, and of course the government of Glandelinia rewarded him as a successful general and gave him a higher commies i n. Mylestze and his generals were enjoying and cel celebrating their victory, and entertaining a brilli nt circle of high rank officers from another rebel army in the captured town near Bri Bristle oe station when one day a letter was brought to brought to him in a well remembered hand writing. It was handed to him while he was in full tide of gay and successful conversatio n in a whole room of general and other Glandelinian officers. However when he saw the writing he turned turned deadly pale, but still managed to pr preserve his composure, and in a short time was missed from the company. In hi his own room alone he opened and read the letter now worse than idle and useless to be read. It was from his former sweetheart, giving a long account of a persecution to which she had been exposed by Glandelinian authorities, which prevented her marriage to him, and she related for how long a time, his letters had ceased to arive, how she had written time and again, till she became weary and doubtful. now her health had failed under her anxieties as to what had become of him, and how at last she had discovered he was a Glandelinian general fighting for the cause of Glandelinia. The letter ended with the expressions of hope and thankfulness, and profess ions of undying affections, begging him to give up the serv service to a wicked cause, which were more bitter than death to the unhappy glandelinian general. He wrote to her immediately;

" I have recieved your letter but it is too late, even though I believe all you say in your correspondence noti nothing now will change the course I'm persuing except death. I was desperate. I'm an enemy to all nationals now, no matter whether they be men women and children and creatures all living whether on the earth or above it; and all is over. only forget it all and marry some one else of your own side---it is all that remains for either of us."

and thus ended the whole romance and id al of a christian life for general MylstzeBut the real remained, the real, but a wicked unholy one. We often read in novels that over suc h such things peoples hearts break, and they die and that is the end of it, and in any usual story this seems not unusual, but in real life no one hardly dies unless its of murder. There is a most busy and important rounding eating, winking, dressing, it talking, visiting, buying, and the like and that all makes up what is commonly called living yet to be gone through, but a military life cause toolisner Mylstze. Had he had a good loving wife, she might have done something to win him back to his own countrys cause and to mend the broken threads of life, and wave again into a tissue of brightness. But he had no wife, renounced all women even of both sides of the whole world. There were only seven young little girls left out of his hatred however and that was the princesses of Abbleannia. He knew from the pictures he had of them, they consisted of unusually fine little figures, pairs of splendid eyes and almost supernatural beauty, and a preternatural goodness of their character, but they never were near him to bring him back to the cause he fought against, or to minsi minister to a man broken down in sorrow.

Afterthe disaster when Mylstze pale as death was found lying on the sofa and pleaded sudden sick headache as the cause of his distress, his staff officer recommended to him to smell of nartshorn and said he worked on his militarty plans too hard, and when the paleness and headaches came on week after week, they feared the general recieved a and he would not tell of but he only demanded of them to leave him alone. Yet from all he read about them Mylstze discovered that the seven beautiful Vivian Girl Princesses th before the war had lived their young lives to be caressed and waited upon had never could never be spoiled, but yet might prove quite a hard sect of mistresses to the enemies of their rightness and cause nevertheless. Yet though they had recieved every thing a chil child of even rich parents knows nothing about, they had always possessed an unusual capability of showing affection, and an extraordinary ammount of sensibility, and all that they had had been merged into a most intense and unconscious unselfishness, unselfishness, the more unusual that they who had the liberty to remain home in their beautiful country and have everything they could love and care for should leave all this behind, to run through suffering and peril for the slaves and for their county country and its righteous cause. From their infancy they had been surrounded with servants who lived only to study, their unusual capti caprices, and instead of treating them like servants took them as the best of friends, more than equal to themselves even in- stant perspective. Their father and mother the emperor and empress, whose only t divertors they were, besides having two good sons and one wayward, had never denied them anything that lay within the compass of humanity, but nothing could spoil them them and when they followed their father in the march of his armies they could have had of course all the eligibles and non eligibles of the other sex at their very feet, but instead they looked upon everybody as free and equal, and it was no doubt a most fortunate case that the Nationals had them. There is not on earth a more splendid scene to an to see than the Nationals had them. There is not on earth a more splendid scene t to an to see acquainted with such little girls and the more lovely they grew the more zealously they increased their g dness t the uttermost farthing, and therefore knowing them from description, he felt sometimes remorseful that he was fighting also against them, but the bl e he had received through only that mistake of believing the women he loved had turned him down hardened his heart, and he was in no way ready to resign his service to the cause he took sides with, there were an abundance of struggles, and small tempests with himself over the matter, there were discontents, pinings and upbraidings, but general Myletze was strong willed, as well as he was good natured, and self indulgent in the bargain, and therefore his strong will got the better of him and though he remained in the seri service and fought the ear to the ki knife and the sabre to the heart, he he fiercely vowed that n s ale not let a single single soldier of his army, name the Vivian Girls no matter what they did within his lines for he felt toard them a sort of tenderness&exemion he had n t for even the slaves that he did adore.

General Myletzes mother, had been a woman of the most uncommon elevation, and righteousness and purity of character and s had him father, and therefore the thing seem ed unusual that the man had turned against his country as he did. And as probably said in ther chapters the boy general Myletze did with the child slaves and been remarked with petulant provocation by general Johnston Jackson Manley, and his four wicked sons, and they regarded his exchanging child slaves for Glandelinian prisoners mole by the nationals with suspicion and dislike and petulant jealously, even though Myletze only done so when he had no National prisoners within his lines, and all this seemed to the onleys as if Mylotze was se secretly in league with the so called " CHRISTIAN D.GS" and all that was given of the child slaves to the Nationals seemed so much taken from himself. From the time that Francis Lillian became a slave - n she had only belonged to James Jelson untill Mylotze bought her through bargin, and from the time she had been his slave her health had gradually sunk. A life of sorrow, constant hardship, bodily and mental---- the friction f ceaseless beatings from her master, united to the ordinary weakness which attended a period of overwork, in course of a few years had changed this blooming blossom into a sad faced sickly child, s suffered six different diseases, and she was claimed by some of onleys highest generals to be the most ill used and suffering child slave that ever existed in his army !

There had never been any end t the various troubles she had and nearly every month or so she had been handly handled so roughly by her master that her injuries had confined her to her hut for nearly a week. Therefore she was exceedingly delicate, and therefore not wishing to destroy her entirely when a little money could be gotten for her, he had taken her all that distance to Manleys army, and then from there to Mylotzes and finally had persuaded general general Lorain to buy her and now she is on this boat with a portion of Mylotzes army whom we have introduced her to our readers , and now while the distant spires of San Pedro rise to our view, and while the firing of the ships in the lead are being intensified there is yet time for an introduction to the town itself.

If the reader could have ever traveled in this part of the Angelinia State, he will remember the cool houses, the large farm houses on the outskirts of the town, r ith their clean swept yards, shaded by the dense and massive foliage of every tree in existance (except what grows in the tropics) and remember the air of order and stillness, of perpetual and unchanging repose, that seemed to breathe over the whole town. Nothing whatever was lost or out of order, not a single picket loose in any of the fences, not a particle of trash in the big grassy yards, with their clumps of lilac bushes growing up at every point possible or proper and in front of the very windows. If the reader would go inside of one of these houses he will be surprised to observe the unusually clean rooms, where nothing seems to be doing or going to be done, where everything is once and forever rigidly in place, and where all the household arrangements move with the punctual exactness of an old clock. In the library the reader will al see the big book cases with its glass doors, and all kinds of books inside, standing side by side in great order, usually solemn and respectable. There cannot be not a single servant in any of these houses, except the mother of the children, with the study cap with the spectacles, or without who sits sewing every afternoon among her daughters or sons, as if she never would be done. The du kitchen floor never seemed to be stained or spotted, the tables, the chairs, and the various cooking an utensils never were out of place or disordered, though three and sometimes four meals are got there, though the family washing and ironing is performed there, and though pounds of butter and cheese are in some silent and mysterious manner thereby brought into existance.

In such a town, and in every one of these cleanly kept houses one third of a large army of Nationals had sp spent the f days there, and yet this beautiful and clean town was to fall int. posse ssion of a Glandelinian army. The christian general Frank Ophelinia had his own home here, had spent a quiet existance there since his child days had ended, when he entered the army to fight against the Traitor Confederates. The youngest of a large family yet he was still considered by his parents as the best of their children, and the proposal that he should enter the army to fight against the Glandelinian hosts was a most momentous one to His family circle.His old white headed father would have given anything to keep his young son home and the young mother in and the poor old mother inquired anxiously, if the Glandelinian nation was not such an awful wicked country then he such a would have com about.' It was known at the Church, and every other place that general Ophelinia was going off to war with the Abbieannian armies and f course the whole village could do no less than help this very important process of talking t out the matter. The priest of his church she inclined strongly against the s rvice of child sl ves; slavery was quite de central (whether such a step might not tend s mewhat t rec ncile the then teams to send f ff their young boys to fight the foe while the g neral s brother, an ex - s tesman , was inclined to the opinion that all those able to fight ought to go, to show the Glandelinians that there are plenty f rebellious t settle the child slave q stion. He was of opinion infact in fact th t in Angelinia States needed encouraging. When however the fact that he was resolved to go was fully before the public mind, he was solemnly summed out to a large party by all his friends and neighbors for the space of a fortnight; and her his prospects and pl ns daily canvassed and in dired into.

His old y ung r truth r also joined the party to help select his uniform s uld d ily co sultns of importance with regards to which the geter general was going t an no t to be ma , and some of the priests and counted out five hundred dollars and given them to general phellinia and told him to use it in anybody way for the duke of the cause as he thought best. As to the propriety of this extraordinary outlay the public mind was fully divided---some affirming that it was well enough all things c nsidered for one in on s life, and others stoutly a f affirming that the money had bette better have been sent for the benifit of the child slaves; but nevertheless all persons gr d that he deserved the money, and therefore as we might know he is the very one who was to try and defend the town long enough at least untill the old men and women and childr n got safely away.

n the shore as the boats are slo slowing down can be seen general Mylotze in his great white horse and you may behold him sitting erect with sabre against his shoulder, sitting before you in a shining gray uniform t ll square formed and straight. His face is like that of a handsome villain though rather sharp in its outlines, the lips are compressed, like those of a person who is in the habit of making up his mind for g for g od and all d finit ly on ll subjects and commands, while the keen gray blue y s show that some peculiar s arching devised movement, and took in everything that went on as if they were looking for something to take care of.

All of his movements were sharp, decided and very energitic ; and though he was never much of a talker his words were always remarkably direct and to the purpose when he did speak. In his habits he was a living impersonation of order, method and complete exact ness. In punctuality, he was as exact as a clus clock, and as inexorable as a steam engine, and he would in most decided contempt and abomination anything on a contrary character.

The great sin of sins in his eyes ---the sum f all the evils- was expressed by one very common and important word in his vocabulary----shiftlessness. His final and ultimat an f nt mpt le consisted in every emphatic pronunciation of the word" shiftless" and therefore by this he characterized all modes of procedure which had not a direct relation to accomplishment of of some purpose then any one else could have had in mind, t best. Anybof his soldi rs who did nothing, or who did not know exactly what they were do t do, h should not take the most direct way to accomplish what they set their hands to d. bjects of his very cont mpt--a contempt shown very often by his mo method of ex ssing and punishing them, and by anything he said, and by a kind of stern grimness, rd, th uickly told them a thing or two.

As to mental cultivation- he had a clear strong active mind, was well and through ughly read in history (history and the other Abbieannian and Glandelinian classes and th ught with great strength all he set upon to do. His military talents were all made and th ught with great strength all he set upon to do. His military talents were all made up like - Geography, as in his wars his military ideas with regard to most matters of plans f campaigns, battles, and other matters of military life, such as commanding his generals and all their stuffs and the various political relations of his immense army. He understanding ll deeper that anything else, higher and broader by the strongest and underlying principle of his character, was his conscience so dominant, and all principles of action and excellentness, seem to be conscience so dominant, and all principles of action and excellentness, seem to be conscience so dominant, and all principles of action and excellentness, seem to be ...ther ways, and depended upon his agents to do this. And why was it that his child slaves feared him not, and even thought him an ...mewhat worth while having. To tell the truth, though Mylotzes hated all the Nationals in his heart, he did not consider the slaves as Nationals, and he even loved certain ones. Sometimes he done what stories never would for a slave, he trained them to read, ...rded their clothes, combed their hair, and brought them up generally in the way he thought they should go, and wicked as he was yet his heart was warm, the slaves had a large share of it for themselves and so it was that a conscience possessed him daily to do what he did accomplish with his slaves, keep them healthy, work them only enough to keep them strong and give them keen appetites fed them well, take good care of them and then exchange them to the Nationals for prisoners for ...ing this forever this way, and only laughed and sneered at Manleys compli...nd protests.

...s his path of advance lay for gun Salvador he decided as it was to first capture the town, and then at the proper time call ...truce with the national army promising that if they would abandon the town peacefully to him and keep everything from going to wreck and ruin which a tremendous battle would bring that he would turn over about six thousand slaves free without even the exchange of prisoners, and to give twenty special slaves, for the exchange of one Glandelinian general held a prisoner in the town. The ide of what the little slaves suffered in the more wicked Glandelinian armies went to his heart he even said the persecutions of the Vivian girls Princesses would bring ruin upon the Manleys, then he in secret loved the lovely little girls, as few could help doing, and though he regarded them as enemies in warfare at least as they were on the opposite side yet he loved them, laughed at what they did on the Manleys and others, and fortgot with the damage they brought on the Glandelinian armies and its cause to an extent which those who knew him thought perfectly incredible. But what more of other is to be known of general Mylotzes the reader must soon discover by a personal acquaintance, and to follow his history through the war.

There in the was sitting on his magnificent horse surrounded by a multitude of general and other officers, each looking like well dressed Kings and every one with faces of great earnestness.

Now Francis Lillian gave you kept a good count of the slaves that are with the army on the shore. " said Jannie. "Of course you haven't, his slaves never do, and see on that big gray horse, that's general Mylotzes and all his generals around him waiting for us to land here. How do you like the scene Lillian."

" Why Jannie the army is immense like Manleys, are we going with them or are the boats going to Leeward-re?"

" We are going to land two miles up from the town, child, and so you must take care of your things lest left with you when he sold you, and now Jannie is your mat gone again."?

" Why Jannie we are only slaves, what is the use?"

" You have to appear right when you stand before him, all slaves must take good care of their things, if they even to have everything on in they land, and now Lillian is your clothing put on properly as Mylotzes wants to see you good."

" ...ally Jannie I don't know."

" Well never mind, I'll help you with your clothing, here put on your stockings, you forgot them. ...ever do you do child when you are coming along with your other master. I should have thought you would have been dressed when he sold you."

" Well Jannie, he would not allow me to for fear I'd run away from him, and then when we stopped anywhere, Weldon would chain me to a post."

" MERCIFUL God what a way he has Lillian.

" It was very sicked way Jannie" said Lillian.

" Why Jannie what on all earth is that?" said Lillian as the boat had slowed down to almost stop. " My little I think is he fell I cannot nearly shut it down.

" It has got to be closed or I will lose everything said Jannie with the air of a general as one and Lillian squeeze the things in, and then both sprung upon the lid , but still the little gap remained about the width of the trunk.

" Get up here in there if you please" said Jannie encouragingly " we can do it if we try. We have got to shut and lock this trunk - anywhere are no two ways about it."

And the little trunk intimidated, quite beaten by this resolute statement finally gave in, the hasp snapped smartly in its hole, and Jannie herself turned the key, and then handed it to Lillian and put it in her pocket.

" Now we are ready, my whole's general Dargin. I think the time this baggage was not at. Do look out Lillian and see if you see the general ...anders."

" Oh yes, he is down the other end of the boat conversing with a number of officers."

" He can't know how near we are coming to the town" said Jannie" Had you not better go and speak to him."

" The general is never in a hurry about anything unless he's called for duty" said a sad soldier who was standing near" and anyhow we have not yet come to the landing. Do step in the guards slaves. 'Looks there's ...r coming from right in that big plain."

The boat now began with heavy grounds, like some vast tired monsterous beast, to prepare to push up to one of the big landings at which a portion of Mylotzes staff were grouped in ...rs and ...s and ...s of all sizes were looking on. Jannie joyfully and excitedly pointed at the various spires, dom domes, and way marks, by which she recognized the city that general Mylotzes was going to capture.

" Yes, yes very fine" said Lillian" But mere, oh no I don't like it. I'd rather see them win. The boat has now stopped, but where is general Dargin who brought me?"

And now ensued the usual tr turmoil of landing, officers running twenty ways at once, soldiers carrying army bags, knapsacks, and owners calling anxiously and severely to their child slaves, and every body crowding in a dense mass to the plank toward the landing. Lillian and Jannie seated themselves resolutely on the lately vanquished trunk, and marshalling all their goods and chattels in fine military order, seemed very resolute to withstand them to the last. They sat with grim determination, up right, as two dueling needles stuck in a board, holding on to their property, and replying with a determination that was enough to strike dismay into a hackman, wondering to each other in the interval" what on earth old general Dargin be thinking of," he could not have gone off the boat with at them now but something must have happened, and just as they began to work themselves into real distress, he came up with his usual careless motion, and giving them each an orange said;

" Well my two only slaves I suppose you are all ready to go camping and see a battle."

" We have been ready, waiting nearly an hour" said Jannie " we began to really be concerned about you."

" Well I delayed long anyone" said he " because I wished to wait until the crowd was off so that one can walk out in a decent and more dilitary manner and not be pushed and shoved. Here you" he added to a slave boy who stood behind him" take this trunk."

" I'll use to his going and putting them in the wagon." said Jannie.

" Oh pshaw slave, what's the use of doing that" said the general.

" Well at any rate, we'll carry this, and this, and this," said Jannie, singling out a hat, a box of food, and a hand bag.

" No, no positively your slaves must not come to this way over us. This is not general Manleys army so you must adopt at least a piece of a better principal, and not walk out under all that load. General Mylotzes will rave at us. They'll take you for a hard pushed drive-slaves instead of those to be exchanged by and by, give them to this big boy, he will put them down as if they were eggs now."

The two children I feel hesitatingly in the general took all their treasures off from them, but rejoiced to find themselves once more in the wagon with them, in a state of preservation.

" Where are we going now?" said Jannie.

" We are heading for general Mylotzes head quarters, pussy. I'm going to take Lillian up to the chief for a peice offering, to make up for that little boy the girl spy ran off with and he said the last words with a laugh.

" Oh she'll make him a good little girl I know" said Jannie" She'll never run away or allow the christians to steal her."

The wagon stopped in front of a sort of Calvarinian mansion built in that odd marble ...ian style just like spanish of which there are even specimens in all riche parts of different spanish countries. It was built all in slightly in the Moorish fashion too, a large square building enclosing an immense court yard into which the wagon drove through an arched gateway. The great court in the inside, had evidently been arranged to make a picture as and voluptuous ideality. Wide gallerys ran all around the four sides ...ian-Moorish arches many slender pillars, and strange ar...arabesque ornaments carried the mind back as a dream to the reign of ...oriential rmom romance in spain, in the middle of the court a big fountain threw high its silvery water, falling in a never ceasing spray into a big marble basin fringed with a deep border of decorations that dazzled the eye. The water in the fountain was like a crystle crystal, and in summer had to be alive with to ...ands of golden and silver fishes, which would then twinkle and dart through it like so many living jewels. ...and the fountain ran a paved walk ...laid in various fancival patterns, and this was ...ed by the spring grass just starting to grow, appearing now as ...ish as green velvet, while a carriage drive ...ed the whole. Two large trees of fir and pine threw a delicious shade and made an ...ing comfortable appearance and ...d two hundred feet high and ranged in a circle ...nt upon the turf were many ...rble vases of antique sculpture, which in summer contained ...ful ...s of beautiful kind and on the plants combined there to green up at every ...ring spring. The ...s at these ...with their great arches were there, and the galleries that ...ended the ...court were four ...ed with a curtain of some kind of Moorish stuff and ...s ...s drawn down at ...s ...t more to exclude the hot beams of the summer sun. ...n the whole this place which appeared luxurious and romantic was to be for the time being the head quarters of general Mylotzes and his highest generals.

As the wagon ...ilarcin, the two slaves seemed like birds ready to burst from the cage with the ...pressed ...f their delight.

" n is it not a lovely and beautiful building, when it was my own lovely darling name" Jannie said to Lillian "isn't it beautiful and big."

" It is a pret pretty place" said Lillie condescendingly but it looks as if it is going to be the headquarters of the generals."

Jannie then got down from the wagon and looked about with an air of calm still enjoyment. The child always it must be remembered are an exotic of the most beautiful and superb countries of the world, and they have deep in their hearts, a passion that is splendid, rich and fanciful, a passion which really indulged by an unrestrained taste, draws on them the ridicule of the wicked flatsellinians of other armies, General Mylotze was in his heart, a sort of poetical voluptuary, and he happened to be close by but not seen when the two little girls made their remarks about his headquarters, and it made him smile and turning to one of his officers who was standing looking around his own face being perfectly radiant with admiration he said;

" General Dundergun this seems to suit you a lot always"

" Yes your excellency it certainly is about the right kind of a place to choose for your headquarters said the general, all this passed in a moment however, while the wagons were being hastily unloaded, and while a crowd of soldiers serving their officers came running through the galleries both above and below to see the general himself come in. Foremost among them was a mighty dressed uniformed general officer of young age evidently a very distinguished personage attired in the ultra extreme of the uniform mode, and gracefully waving a long brilliantly decorated walking cane in his hand. and this personage had been exerting himself with great alacrity in driving in all the flock of domestic child slaves to the out outside of the yards.

" Back all of you slaves, I am ashamed of you and if you don't come in more order you will be flogged flogged." he said in tones of real authority. " would you dare to intrude on the generals new premishes just as soon as he had selected one in the first hour of his army camping here."

All looked quite abashed at this elegant speech, delivered with quite an air, and stood huddled together at a most respective distance indeed, except the soldiers who were busy in clearing out the out the contents of the two wagons, owing to general Cannonia systematic arrangements, when general Mylotze turned round from giving his directions to general Dargin there was no one in view but Jannie, and Lillian and general Cannonia themselves, the latter being somewhat conspicuous in satin gray uniform covered with gold medals and other decorations, and standing at attend attention while others were smiling to themselves.

" Ah Your excellency, how you have a new child slave with a golden bob!" said the general offering the child his hand. " how are you little girl."

" Never mind the sad slaves now" said general general Mylotze passing on with his usual air of negligent orderly, " she is with a right general and is mine too. See that the armies are well positioned and prepared for instant action on the morrow, we are going to attack and capture the town. I'll tell you the rest later on." and so saying, he led the slaves to their large parlor that opened on to the verandah while this concluded Lillian and Jannie had flown like some bird through the porch and parlor to a little strange bedair opening likewise on the verandah, and still dark figure officer rose from a couch on which he was reclining.

" Lillian said Jannie in a sort of rapture as she followed, catching the child and throwing herself on her neck, and embracing her over and over again. " ain't this a beautiful place."

" That will do, take care this is no place for such actions" said the officer rising from the couch. " You make too much noise."

General Mylotze now came in, and taking the two children presented them to the general who lifted him large eyed on the slaves with an air of some curiousity, and received them with cold politeness. A crowd of smaller child slaves now pressed to the until a cry and among them Jack who stood for a moment in a trance of joy and expectation of the war for he did not dare to come in.

" Here is my friend Jack, said Jannie as she flew across the big room, and throwing herself into his arms, and kissed him repeatedly. The boy did not tell her that she was making too much noise, but on the contrary he hugged her and cried, till in amity was nothing to be altered if, and when he loosed from him he reflected it was with a trembling hand and kissing, this decided manner that he dent some, petty protests from some of the officers.

" will said [illegible] Mylotze, " you will always [illegible] are not all mad to [illegible] general Mylotze [illegible] armies.

" what now girl" general Mylotze said.

" I want to [illegible] very much [illegible] I will [illegible] me I think it [illegible] but I will [illegible] that is [illegible]."

" That you do like" said General Mylotze [illegible] " Yes I said it."

" Yes now can it be that I will it."

General Mylotze [illegible] artily, as he went slowly into the passage. " Hallos here [illegible] at me if here there you always, are you not glad to see me." he said as he went on making hands from one to another. " look out for yourselves when a battle starts there" he said. " you are afraid when the firing commences let you mention it."

There was an ah and oh of laughing and blessing of the general and his army, as the general distributed small pieces of change among them.

" Come and [illegible] yourself off to your quarters, like good boys and girls" he said and the whole assemblage disappeared through a door into a large verandah, followed by Jannie and Lillian each of carrying a [illegible] satchel which they had been filling with grand oranges, apples, nuts, candy, ribbons, laces, and toys of every description during the journey on the boat, as general Mylotze turned to go back, his eyes fell upon general Cannonia, who was standing on a sort of roof of the house, shifting from one foot to the other and looking very uneasy, and examining something through a field glass with an air that would have done credit to any dandy living.

" What's wrong now sir" said the general as he came down. Is there something suspicious going on over yonder?"

" Seems to me your excellency" he answered pointing in the direction of the town " that a big fire is burning. Seems to me the Nationals are abandoning the town and making movements which are not to my liking."

" Is that so it" said general Mylotze carelessly. " Well here to morrow I'm going to show the Nationals a thing or two, and to night you move your columns to the front and then order Dargin to take up a position in front of the woods and apple orchards, and mind you for yourself Heyward sakes don't make any blunders whatever else you do. I've confidence in Dargin two of that of the Nationals."

" Your columns are already being deployed as I understood you was to attack to night, I think there's been a mistake somewhere."

" Nevertheless we cannot attack to night. Here general Dargin" said general Mylotze beckoning. The general approached him saluting. He looked wistfully and excitedly toward the direction from which great clouds of smoke were rolling high and for a moment there seemed to be no spirit whatever in him. He looked afraid that the Nationals might make a desperate surprise attack upon some portion of the army and saw it all before it, and the worse of it was he did not know where command he was.

" Sir general" said Mylotze " I've ordered the batteries under Don Costello to support your lines to morrow. I tell you he's a regular hearse to the Nationals and will drive the secessionists back to their own country if you want. Be don't give an inch of ground to morrow no matter how fiercely they'll attack. And keep the slaves out of the zone of fire. Keep your eyes open now, and don't may I never in think about food and your command when a battle is threatening."

General Dargin saluted, and fixing his eyes on Mylotze said;

" I know he'll do his best he said."

" Yes I am he is warranted a good artillery officer."

" Well I hope the battle may turn out well" said the general" it's going to be a bigger one than I expected though."

Then Mylotze called for general Black Brooke and he said when the latter appeared;

" Take this message to general Cannonia" and mind yourself" he added " Remember don't lose it, I'll have my eye to take it from you but the general himself."

General Black Brooke rode gracefully forward, a squadron of cavalry following. " That christian army is regular behemoth in size" said general Dargin. " There will be quite a battle to morrow."

" Come now general Dargin" said Mylotze seating himself on a stump beside him" He grasp now and don't be nervous."

" Well I'm not nervous but some of my best generals have been gone a fortnight beyond the time and I don't know when they will come with the rest of the divisions" said the general discontentedly.

" Well you know they wrote by the steamer."

" Yes but they should not have gone through that dangerous swamp with their armies."

" But now they could fight their battle, and they had to go through there or not come at all."

" That's just the way always" said general Dargin" always something turns up to make the best laid plans, and their worse off."

" See here now" he added, drawing a long roll of paper from his coat pocket, and opening it" Here's a plan which I drew myself during the several halts of the march."

It was a very [illegible] little sketch and soft as a new engraving, tapes p [illegible] principal [illegible] and [illegible] and formation of the christian lines [illegible] about it. General Dargin looked at it calmly.

" what is the [illegible] armies each in command position?" he asked.

" Well it [illegible] matter of opinion, but what do you think of the best point of attack."

" If I must think I should attack on the right of the town, my opinion would be to [illegible] the Nationals on the right flank" said the general pointing to the place on the map. " Hang it, why they are suggesting an attack at the most dangerous position of all" said general Mylotze. " Come now Dargin what do you think should be done otherwise, nd plans as we can be so foolish Rose. "

" If you don't think anything of my opinion in one case you surely won't in another" said general Durgin" but I insist at that spot just the same because its my opinion it can be held the weakest. You know I have been studying positions of the christian armies for a long time ever since I joined the army, and there's been much attack made during the advance of the army that I'm sure the Nationals are not half dead."

" Are you sure sir that that position would be attacked with success?" said another officer suddenly rising from the depths of some hole in the ground where he had sat quietly taking an inventory of the positions of the rebel lines, and calculating the consequence of it being attacked instead by the National armies.

" I'm perfectly sure of it" said general Durgin."

" The left of the town is a good place to attack" said Durgin" at least general Black thinks so to think his plans the best of all and he sure is a good and great general."

" I'll be having the Nationals a running good and fast to suit me right for my own special purpose" said general Mylette gravely standing up orderly to come up" Meanwhile Durgin you must be wanting to retire to your own apartment and refresh yourself a little after your long journey. " orderly" he ordered" tell Colonel Andre to come here."

The orderly soon entered the yard, and he was also a clan dolinion officer dressed quite nicely but instead of wearing wearing a hat he had for his head gear a high red and yellow turban on his head, a present gift of a good hearted christian child slave whom he had exchanged to the Nationals in return for her kindness, and which the child had been arranging on his head when she gave it to him. " Colonel" he said" I'll place you in his commans for he will need your services to morrow." and with a salute general Durgin disappeared into the building.

" And now" general Cannonia said Mylette" our golden days of success are dawning. Here we have our practical generals with us to day on who will take the whole budget of cares off our shoulders, and give our armies a splendid victory to morrow. The ceremony of delivering the keys had better come off forwith."

This remark was made after a few minutes after general Cannonia had come back.

" I'm sure we are welcome to success" said general Cannonia. " But I think the Nationals will find out sooner or later, that we do not treat our slaves mean and therefore may be glad to exchange prisoners for slaves."

" Oh certainly they may discover that, and a world of wholesome truths besides no doubt" said general Mylette," but this general in charge of the army in the town is different."

" Talk about us keeping child slaves as if we did it for our convience" said general Cannonia. " I'm sure if we could do it their own way we might let them go all at once."

Jannie and Lillian who had been observing this conversation all the while from the start with Durgin were near by, she Jannie fixed her large dark serious eyes on general Mylettes face with an earnest and perplexed expression, and said simply;

" Why do you keep children for slaves general?"

" I don't know I'm sure, except to exchange them to the Nationals for prisoners they may hold, when I have no prisoners to exchange. I believe that is a much the better way of having slavery than any other way, and the slaves of my armies are the best that any army can boast of. There's a Annie the cook the best slave living and she refuses to be exchanged because her sister is in Manleys army----what could a person do without her."

" Yes Annie is the best slave I ever knew" said general Cannonia" and yet she is a good hearty cook for her young age, and a strange allure of the whole race of slaves, and not a bit selfish."

" I'm glad of it " said Mylette," as selfishness is a dreadful wicked fault."

" Well now there's Annie" said general Cannonia " I think it's mean of Manley and selfish to hold her sister from us when he knows her sister needs her, when her worse turns are on, and yet he's hes as hard headed as a brick. He is absolutely worse than any person I know of much as I'd love to fight the Nationals I'd like to give him a touching too."

" Has she not seen her sister for a long long time general?" said Jannie.

" How should you know anything about her?" said general Mylette sharply" she's been complaining I suppose."

" she does not complain---she only told me but she feels to be separated from her sister."

" Why don't you find some excellent excellent slave trader and have him locate and buy Annie's sister."

" How can you propose that Jannie" said general Durgin. " Slave child you really are absolute imcheid fate, I think. So much trouble as I have with Manley over my way of keeping slaves the least breath disturbs me, and if I was to make any attempt to take a slave from him Manley would go absolutely frantic and he and I would have a war. If Manley does not want to allow her to go to her sister then its his own cut cutlock, and what happens to his soul for it is not my fault. I have heard of Manley and his principles in a way that makes ones blood run cold, but it never was my purpose to be a friend to his order by any means."

Lillian who had been listening to this conversation with a air of unusual earnestness, but she did not say a word but looked thoughtfully and as if fully determined to assert herself and position to her. She broke into the conversation.

" Annie is a good trusty slave" said Mylette she is smooth and respectful and kind to all but she never did to me. She is always fighting and scrapping but she is a good cook, I suppose she is not but because because of the army she is in and the kind of people she is said to have. You see when I bought her and came down here I found I had to bring her with me and her sister Manley would not sell at any price she said no. He is a saint as they say, and he told me that Annie and her sister had better give them lives up and it was not likely to be convenient for them to ever see each other again. I also was I had called some one to kidnap her secretly, but I was foolish and did not take the chance. I told Annie at the time that through Manley's wickedness she would never see her sister, for Manley is as hard as steel in his determination more than any of his kind, that is she can go to his army and get away again, and I advised her to try and forget her sister, for if she does not see her sister in this world she will surely in the next, but no one wouldn't. Annie has a kind of obstinacy about her that is very tedious I find and thoughtful if she ever is free I'll bet she'll be hanging Manley, notwithstanding the Vivian girls. But the little fool won't be exchanged."

" Have they been exchanged?" said general Cannonia.

No they are dead."

I suppose she felt the separation from them?"

" well of course she did just as other children, but she not worries more for her sister. I've tried hard to buy her sister so I could bring her along too, but I couldn't do it, and besides Manley is opposed about as any of buying slaves, and always a very sulky beat it. So Annie can't the ruins of anything else and I do believe she would know how she would feel freedom is, and how terrible her death will grieve if she won't allow herself to be exchanged. I do indeed" said general Mylette" all these slaves are foolish, even the best of them. I'd reward any one of the Vivian girls who would come along and steal one night from the camp."

" Is that general Cannonia dryly for as he was he hated the Vivian girls, and the two little slaves looked only to him and was the flame of gratification and repressed vexation and the scornful curl of the lip as he spoke.

" I have almost made a pet of Annie" said general Mylette. " I wish you could general look at the close chest, she had silk and muslin dresses, and everything a little girl can enjoy. I've had other slaves girls who are trained for it work whole days, making her beautiful dresses, and getting her ready to go to child slaves party, which only is join in in this army. as I abuse she or none of the slaves don't know what it is, the never was stripped more than once in her life, and that was only in a fight with a early saucy girl as she could not mind her own business, and who was dismissed for beating her up. She had milk and even ice cream once in a while when it can be obtained. General Manley says I have my slaves over indulged. I suppose is it is partly my fault but I'm not fighting for slavery, but for the cause of country and flag only, and I've told General Manley, and his face that I'm tired."

" and I too" said general Cannonia. " They are the biggest drawbacks of the nation."

Lillian the beautiful little slave had stood listening to the conversation with that expression of deep and earnest mystic character which was very peculiar to her. She walked softly up to the general and said;

General.'

Well slave what now?"

' General I did just be with Annie for a few days, just for a few. I know I should not make her nervious, and I do not always sleep by night. I often lie awake nights thinking---

' Oh nonsense, nonsense child' said general Mylette" you are a strange child."

' But May I general I think " she said timidly. That Annie is not well. and as have never seen her I would like to honest I would."

" Oh that's the but if it is it well Annie is just like all the rest of them for good as she is she will fuss with you as she does with the other slaves as she is a sort of boss in her tent, it will never do for you to join her long never. I'm principled about this matter" said he turning to general Cannonia" you'll find that she is in a perfect overseer of the matter. If she could let all her followers alone by every little disagreeable feeling, and complain of every little trouble she would have her hands full. she never complains here-if one can know what she endures but those who know her personally."

General Cannonia's countenance assumed a more than ordinary amount of this perturbation which struck Jannie as a supremely ludicrous, that she could not help herself and burst out into a loud laugh.

Jannie always laughs when I have a painful face" said general Cannonia.

There was more of the like offensive. General Mylette looked at his watch and said.

" Jannie always laughs much even more the least allusion to anything unusual. " She is so good natured that I only hope the day comes when she too will be exchanged. I've tried to these and no one would give a prisoner for her as they said she was not a special slave."

"" Now that is just like some of these nation generals" said general Cannonia pulling out her his handkerchief with a sort of spirited flourish. " now take annie for instance no one realizes, her never can and never will what she suffers, and have for so many years she's been with us. Is she was one of the complaining o sort or ever made a fuss about her trouble there would have been some reason for it. We do of course get tired of a complaining child o le slave but she has kept things to herself, and borne and borne till my officers has got in the way of thinking that she is a sort of saint."

Mylette did not exactly know that he was expected to answer to this.

While he was thinking over what to say, general Cannonia began a regular military chat with Mylette concerning movements of armies in case of an impending battle, and other military matters of which the latter was by common understanding, to assume the direction taking and receiving many cautious directions from his superior and charges th t a that a head less systems I systematic and military like them general Cannonia would have been utterly dizzied and confounded ....

go that he has never alluded to the subject since. I said to him;" Sir I'm superior of all commands placed under me and I do what I know is right to be done. I'll never send a slave for no reasons whatever back to Manley and his hell hole. I'm no fool. she ll never find her sister anyhow and only die there."But I know by his looks and little things that he says that he thinks so as much as ever, and it is so trying and so provoking. I'd rather sent her to the national camp than to Manley any day."

General Cannonia looked very much as if he was going to say somethying something but he continued looking at the map in a way that had volumes of meaning in it, f Myletze could have only understood it.

"Do you see " he continued" what to you got to manage if you ever start in the slave trade. A camp without any rule, where all the child slaves usually have it all their own way, do whatbthey please, and have what they please. I keep my cowhide about and some times when it is absolutely necessary and they really do disbehave I do lay it on, but I sometimes feel remourseful afterwards. If general Myle Beppo Evan would only do the ring thing with his slaves he would get more consideration out of them!"

" and how's that?"

" Why send them in exchange to the christian armies more often. That's the only wa That's the only way. Id I did not I would have to manage twi ce the energy Beppo Evans does."

" and how does general Evans contrive to manage?" said Cannonia. " You say he seldom ever strikes a blow."

" Well he does strike, I never said he did not; and when he does he certainly lays it on in a way that is brutal beyond comprehension but it is seldom he does. And besides if you ever looked full in his eyes--its very peculiar that eye---and if he is very angry and speaks very decidedly, there is an awful flash. I'm afraid of it myself, and the slaves kn slaves know they must mind. I am not able to do as much with my slaves by a regular storm and scolding or whipping and the like as Beppo Evans can by one glare of his eye if on once he is angry. Oh there is no trouble about general Evans, that's the reason he is also very valuable to the cause. But you will find when you come to manage, that ther there is no getting along without severity---for many can be bad and are lazy and even treacherious."

" The old words" said general Black Brooke sauntering up. " What an awful account all of us Glandelinians will have to settle with the great Judge at least for having slaves that are especially lazy. You see general Cannonia"said he as he sat down on a log opposite to where general Myletze was sitting "it's entirely inexcusable in most of us in the light of the exa examples that the Manleys and the glandelinian government set us------this world scourge of holding child slaves that belong to their parents."

" Come now general Brooke, you are too bad as you favor child slavery." said general Cannonia.

" Do I now. Well I'll say I don't and I thought I was talking quite good quite remarkab remarkably of me. I try to enforce your ma remarks always."

" You know you do not mean any such thing." said general Myletze.

" Oh I must be mistaken then. Thank you your Excellency for setting me right. I do favor it then."

" You really do love to crack your jokes" said general Myletze.

" Oh come general, the day is growing to an end, and I have just had a long argument with a number of your slaves, which has tired me out so pray be good to me now and let a fellow rest for a while."

" What's the matter about my slaves now" general Myletze asked. " I thik think some of them had been spoiled by you already. I only wish I had the undisputed management of them for a while. I'd take them back home with me and make them as my own children."

" what you say your excellency Excellency is marked with your usual acuteness and good sense" said general Cannonia himself. " But what did you do to the slaves now general Brooke?"

" Well as to their case it is this, that Annie has cooked me such a rotten stale su p supper to night that I almost ate too much and feel heavy in the bosom. She has been so long engaged in cooking your excellency that she has at last got everything to perfection and I have been obliged to give her a little insight into her work."

" How"! Said Myletze.

" Why I was obliged to let her understand explicitly that I perferred to keep her as my own cook for my own personal use, and I put her magnificence upon an allowance of eulogne water---and actually was so cruel as to restrict her to a new set of clothes and one dozen of my beautiful caubric handh handkerchiefs. She was particularly provoked about it, and I had to talk to her as if she was my little girl to bring her around. Why in the world don't you sent her to the christian lines without even exchange Myletze. It won't do no harm. Write the papers out and free her pur thing. She deserves suit."

" Oh general Black Brooke when will you learn to know something about that Jackass! It's abominabl e the way you pry on her" said general Myletze. " The only way to have her go is run her out of the camp and I don't want to do that. I'll find her sister or kill Manley if he won't give her up. And after all what's the harm in the poor girl wanting to see her sister?"

" and why won't Manley let her sister come to her?" said General Cannonia with blunt Determination." and why have you not forced her to go!"

" Too much argument and besides she would lose her way and perish by starvation or run into some squadron of Glandelinian cavarly not belonging to my command, and which ruins more souls than you can shake a stick at. And what's the harm of lee letting the poor kind stay and if I have not brought her up any better than to find this camp a comp comfortable home why should I force her to go out against her will. She is really free any how for I have made out her papers and she's got them, and therefore no one can take her in case she does go except treacherous Manley armies. If it were not for her the slaves living in the tent with her would not be the perfect angels they are. I'm inclined to think that slavery anyhow is the essence of dreadful evil. It's an awful consideration really, and therefore I dod do not really use any as slaves. If they work, they work, if not they don't."

" I think at least Manley and his generals have an awful responsibility upon themselves m re than others!" said general Cannonia. " I would not want to be in their place for a million Heavens like above. You and we educate our slaves, and not treat them like reasonable creatures and so on but as if they were our own kids--like immortal creatures that you have to go to stand before the bar of God with. put elsewhere in other ar armies for the little slaves its a hell upon earth. That's my mind" said the general breaking out suddenly with a tide of zeal that had been gathing strength in her mind all the day.

" Oh come, come general Cannonia, what do you know about the Manley dogs" said general Myletze getting up quickly. " Well you two have given me a good talk, and done your duty on the whole I think the better of you for it. I make make no manner of doubt that you threw the truth at me so that you hit me directly in the face." and he sat down again and looked over the map Cannonia had been studying. General Myletze had a decided tarlent for studying and maki making maps. He examined every portion carefully and then handing it back to the general he said" for

" For my part I do not see any use in such arguments yet I am sure if any body does more for the little ones than we do I'd like to know who they are, and it don't do them a bit of good to drive them like horses, to brutalize them--for they resent it and later on so have enemies worse than the nationals . As to talking to Annie about going over to the nationals for her freedom I'm sure I have talked till I was tired and hoarse, tellin her her responsibility for it, and all that, and there she can go to dues church when she likes but she won't go, even though she has every chance, but as I said they have from the experiences in other camps become a deg degraded race, and always will be if they don't listen to reason, and there will be no help for them if the nationals don't win the war, you can't make anything of them if you try. You see general Cannonia I've tried to and you have not, I was born and bred among them and I know."

General Cannonia thought thought he had said enough and therefore sat silent.

A g gay laugh from the outside court suddenly rang through the silken curtains of the veranda. General Myletze stepped out, and lifting up the curtain laughed too.

" What is it" ? said general Cannonia coming to the railing.

There sat Jannie and Lillian on a little stone slab in the yard, every one of the other slaves having wreaths of flowers, and Lillian and Jannie gayli gayly laugh ing was hanging a wreath of roses around a little boys neck and then sat down before him like a robin still laughing.

" Oh Jack dear you look so funny."

Jack had a sobre benevolent smile and seemed in his quiet way to be enjoying the fun as much as the rest. He lifted his eye when he saw the generals, with a half deprecating air.

" How can you let them do that!" said general Cannonia.

" Why not! What harm does it do!" said general , Myletze.

" Why I don't know, but it surely looks so silly."

" You would think no harm in a child caressing a large dog, even if he was black but creatures that can think, and reason and feel and is mortal you shudder when they play among themselves because they are slaves, even confess it cousin. I see know the feeling among you generals well enough. Of course you have all the virtue but you kn kind obliterate the feelings of others. I have often notice in my advances how much stronger this was among some of my generals than it was with others. You are one who loathe the little slaves as you would a a rattlesnake or a toad, yet you are terribly indignant at their wrongs. You would not have them abused, but you don't want to have anything to do with them yourselves; you would send to them to the National lines for th their freedom out of your sight and smel , and then sent soldier prisoners with the purpose re to try and get them back again. Is not that it?"

" Well Cousin" said general Cannonia" thoughtfully" there may be a good deal of truth in that."

" What would the p or child slaves do if they could not even love one another!" said general Myletze leaning on the railing, and watching Jannie and Lillian as they tripped off loading some of the others with berthes. " They are just the same as our own little children. Jack now is a hero to little Jannie, his stories are wonders to them all, his songs and Catholic and otherrhymns are better than an or opra n and the traps and other bits of junk in his pocket a mine of jewels, and he is the most wonderful little boy slave that ever became a slave. Those two Jannie and Lillian are two roses of eden that the Lord has dropped down expressly for the poor and lowly, who get few enough of any kind."

" It's strange general" said Cannonia" one might almost think you were a Glandelinian preacher to hear you talk."

" A Preacher!" said general Mylstze.

" Yes a Preacher."

" Not at all, not a preacher, and what is worse I'm afraid not apractiser either."

" What makes you talk so then?"

" Nothing is so easy as talking" said general Mylstze. " I believe Shakespear Shakespear makes some body say' I could sooner show twenty what were good to be done, than be one of the twenty to follow follow my own showing'. nothing like division of commands and words. My forte lies in talking, and your general lies in doing."

In Jannie's external situation at this time there was as the world says, nothing to complain of. Little Lillians fancy for him the instinctive gratitude and loveliness of a noble nature---had led her to beg of her master that Jannie might be her special companion whenever she needed the companionship of another little girl slave in her walks or toils, and therefore jannie had general orders to let everything else d go, and go with Lillian wherever she would want him to, orders which our readers may surely fancy were far from disagreeable to him her. Both of these slaves were kept well dressed, for general Mylstze was fa fastidiously particular particular on this point.

Theservices of eve y one every one of the little slaves in general Isaac Mylstze, Army were what you would call been a sinecure, and consisted simply of a daily care and inspot inspection, for general Isaac yletze declared that he could not have any smell of the horses about them when they came near him, and that the little one d ones positively must not be put to anykind of service whatever, that would make them unpleasant to them, as his nervious system was entirely inadequate to any trail of that nature no matter what else he could stand otherwise and therefore one good whiff of anything disagreeable being according to hi his account quite sufficient to close the scene, and put an end to all his earthly trials at once. All of his child slaves therefore whether small or big the way they were dressed looked respectable enough indeed to be the children of the wicked rich th than more child slaves, even though they were all dressed alike, and all wore bobbed hair of the same form whether they were boys and girls.....

Then too whenever the army would make a halt the generals would see to it that the little l slaves were in the most beautiful place of the camp, a consideration to which this sensitive race are n ver indifferent, and therefore they did enjoy with a quiet, joy of the solde, the distant mountain scenery, the great streams, the firm and big trees s the, changes in the weather winter or summer, the flowers, the winter cold waves and heavy wind and snow storms, the eletrical storms of summer, the perfume of flowers, and light and beauty of the bright summer or winter days, the strange magnificence of glandelinian uni uniforms of privates and officers alike, the peculiar " Munchkin custom of their big hats with bell sh all around the rim the colors of the silken flags, and the pictures and lis lustres and gilding on war standards and banners, and the appearance and grand array of the immense squadrons of glandelinian dragoons and cavarly that made the scene like a magnificent Alladins country to them.

If ever Abbiannia shall ever show a elevated and cultivated race(wash your face) and come it mat according to this story some time her turn to figure in the great war drama of human improvement(providing she wins the war) life will awake within that nation and her states, with a gorgeousness and splendor of which any other nation which christian or not faintly have conceived.. in that far off mystic christian country a land of gold, and gems and spices, and waving palms at one point and wintery states in another and wonderous flowing rivers bordered with immense and splendid forests, with fields covered with magnificent seas of flowers, of mountains with flowers on the slope of all kinds not even known to us, and a tremendous miraculious fertility without one single desert to mar the place, and abundant of rainfall everywhere, or big snows too awakens and will awake new forms of wet, new styles of splendor, and the child slaves free and happy, and no longer disp despised by the wicked Glandelinian enemies and trodde to trodden down will perhaps show forth some of the latest and most magnificent revelations of the human life, and they they should and ought to have never been slaves. And certainly they will in their gentleness, their lowly docility of heart the it kind of way to repose on a superior mind and rest on a higher and yet wicked power their child like simplicity of affection and facility of forgiveness. In l all these they will show the highest form of the ways of a real holy christian life and perhaps as God chastenseth whom he loveth he probably hath chossen these poor unfortunat child slaves in the furnace of affliction to make them later the highes highest and noblest of the abbiannian kingdom which He will set up when every other nation and kingdom christian or not has tried and failed, failed, for the first shall be last, and the last first.....

Was this what general Mylstze was thinking of as he stood gorgeously uniformed on the veranda that early morning placing his hat on wrong side out in his hurry to go on a scouting tour. Or if that wasn't that it was something else, for general Mylstze was a man who made good of great and little things, and he was going now in full uniform a splendid uniform to a scouting tour, to be very sure what the national army now confronting his in great force was going to do. General Mylst: Mylstze always made it his point to be very careful before beginning a battle with a national army. There he stood so tall so elegant, so airy and undulating in all his motions his long overcoat enveloping him like a gray mist. He looked more like some graceful sissy like man than the general he really was and he felt very great and brave indeed. General Dargin stood at his side a perfect contrast. It was not that he also did not wear a handsome uiform but his stiffness and squareness enveloped him with an ine indefinite yet appreciable a presence an did grave his superiority of course not the Grace of God however-----that is another thing.

" Where's that Lillian!" said general Mylstze.

" The child has stopped on the veranda to speak for a while with Jannie."

" Tell her I want to see her, and immediately."

General Dargin dispatched a orderly after her. Yet what was Lillian doing with Jannie. Listen reader, and you will discover, even if general Mylstze does not.

" Dear Jannie if I see what is going on I will inform you. Mylstze is going out to spy on the christian linesand I'm to go with him to write down i on a piece of paper what he tells me. I know you would like to know so dreadfully hard."

" God please you Lillian but you are doing something that is dangerous. The Nationals might fire on them when they are scouting and you too might get killed."

" I do not worry. Better to dead than to be a slave. My mother oc once told me so."

" Well I'm glad you have a chance to go out but here? here this may bring Gods protection upon you" and the little girl threw her arm around Lillian" Lillian you shall take my Scapulars. But don't let any of the Glandelinians see you with it on or you'll get a flogging."

" What sacrifice your own. Lord Jannie it would not be proper for me at all."

" Why not. you need it as well as I do, and at least Now I don't. All Catholics they say use it to protect themselves against unseen danger, and it will make you feel as safe as if you were within the camp. No you must take it to please me now. you can return it when you come back."

" Do hear the good little girl talk." said Lillian as Jannie placed it around her neck and kissing her; ran down stairs to general Mylstze who was beginning to be impatient,

" What in the world were tayou stopping for?" he demanded a little sternly.

" I was telling Jannie of our scouting tour. g e likes to know something so she can go too."

" Lillian" said general Mylstze stumping impatiently" You tell this to other slaves afte after I trust you. when will you learn what is proper. I have a mind to go alone and not take you at all. That little fool will reveal it to some national spy and then Iell Iell I'll be out of luck. You better go right back this moment. you ain't going."

Lillian looked down cast, and aggrei aggrieved, and turned slowly.

" I say your Excellency let the child alone, let her doe as she pleases it won't bring no harm." said general Dargin. " Be reasonable."

" But how will she get along in the army" said Mylstze" If she tells that Jannie what she observes Jannie jannie will the first chance tell it to some christian pri o priester who will then risk anything to escape and warn the general. I should not. ow in the world will these slaves get along in this world?"

" God only knows" said Dargin" but every one of them will get along much better in heaven than any of us glandelinians who fight for such a wicked cause."

" Oh general Dargin don't" said Lillian touching his elbow" it will make him mad."

" Well general Cannonia are you ready to go with us on a tour or make one of your own as you proposed?" said general Mylstze turning square about on general Cannonia.

" I'm not going thank you. I'm going elsewhere with my army. I've got an appointment with some portion of the christian army and I don't want to miss it."

" I do wish general Cannonia would ever go with us once in a while" said general Mylstze. "But he always like likes to scout of his own accord. Of course he is allowed to take his course but it is not really respectable though he certainly finds out very important things for me. But I do love his company."

" I know it" said general Dargin" No generals go oi out on a stirring scouting party and learn what the nationals are p to next, and then we will do what we find out best. If Cannonia did go at all with us he would go elsewhere when he co got out far enough, and do something that would keep the national generals awake at least."

" What He go within a mile of the christian lines. horrible recklessness!" said General Mylstze.

" He'll do anything to gain the information he desires your Excellency. Postively positively it is too much to ask of many an officer, but he'll go through hell to find out the purpose of an enemy. Lillian do you like to go. Come remain here at of danger and stay with the other slaves."

" Thank you sir but I'd rather accompany Mylstze. He said I could go."

" Is it not dreadfully dangerous!" said Mylstze himself.

" I believe it is somewhat dangerous" said Lillian" and I am a little afraid too but I'll try to be brave. I want to see what a christian camp looks like as I've never saw one before."

" What else do you want to go for then!"

" Why you know general" she said in a whisper" My mother told us that God wants to have us, but that even he does not cherish a coward, and h He gives a good person who loves him and is brave everything you know, and it is not much to do it no matter how risky it is if He wants us to. Sometimes it is not very dangerous at all or you would have sent other officers and soldiers instead of going yourself."

" You sweet little obliging soul" said general Mylstze kissing her" You may go along with with us, th that's a good brave girl, and write down everything I tell you, but whatever you do for God's sake keep out of range in case the Federals open fire."

"Certainly I'll do anything you advise me" said the child, as she was helped to th. the saddle of a horse for recently she had shown she could ride one. General Mylatze mounte mounted his steed, and kissed his hand to her as he started off first, large tears in his eyes as he said" I wonder if she is not one of the Vivian Girl heroines in disguise. She reminds me of Angeline Vivian rightly named. If she is god has for a time sent a evangel to me in disguise and if my soldiers discover her true nature what shall I do. I do not even condemn spies men spies to death but retain them for the duration of the war. If god is as good as they say Hell surely Heu HE'll surely protect her and no mistake."

"You see Lillian " said general Burgin" it is always right and proper to be kind and loving to your fellow child servants but it is not proper to tell them anything that you are so specially trusted with. Now suppose you did, and something would happen, you would not want to be changed from a child slave, as a prisoner of war because you are accused of being a christian spy would you."?

"I should surely feel like it general." said Lillian" Because then I would give any thing to see all child slaves set free, and because you know you say yourself even tyough though you fight different the christian cause is better than hou ours."

General Burgin was in utter despair at the entire want og moral perception evinced in this reply.

"What in the or world can I do to make this child understand me!" he said to me one of his soldiers.

"Nothing at all" answered he significantly though he looked at the little girl closely and searchingly as if " he had recognized her" some where else before. The little girl looked sorry and disconcerted for a moment especially when this soldier looked so steadily at her; and even would not take his eyes of of her; and she knew he did not look at her so because she was so beautiful and sweet. It was for something that made her a little uneasy but nevertheless children of any kind do not keep one impression long and in a few moments ah she was merrily laughing at various things which she observed as the party rode along..

" Well Your Excellency" said general Jack Brooks as all his generals were comfortably seated in the High officers tent" and what was the bill of fare you took in at the National camp."

"Well it's not needs that sobers as good as one wants, more like preaching a sermon a wicked person does not want to hear" said Mylatze kind of uneasily. " It was something that I'm certain certainly glad I discovered and found out, something that you ought to ha e have discovered general Cannonia; it expressed all my views exactly. You were foolish not to come with me."

" It must have been very improving for my cause and Glandelinians" said general Cannonia. " The subject you discovered must be an extensive one, different from what I discovered."

Well I knew all the plans of the enemy's movements, and preparations and other infor mation and such t l things" said general Mylatze. " It's just like hearing a sermon which has a great effect upon us. The text was" be nationals will attack the Glandelinian army on april the 20th. one national scouting officer close to where I was hiding said;

" That the Nationals will attack my army on the flank. I only wish you had heard him."

" Oh I did not heed to" said general Cannonia. I can learn h what does me as much good as that from splsh any time and smoke a cigar besides, which I can't you know when I go out on a scouting tour for some whipar of a christian soldier may take it in his head to sent a bullet through it."

" Why why don't you believe in what I discovered"? Said general Mylatze.

" Wht ----il You know I'm such a clever person from your acquaintance with me that what the nationals generally propose to do don't edify me very much at all. If I was to say anything on this matter I would say but, fair and square, we are in for it, we have the Nationals before us, and mean to keep them before us, and its for our convience and interest to keep on our guard, for the long and short of it is they might find out their plans are discovered and b might attack sooner or later, for again that's the long and sh it of it--that's just the whole of what all this a war stuff amounts to after all, and I think that will be intelligible to every officer in this army right now."

" I do think Augustine Cannonia you are perfectly right." said general Burgin. " I think it w uld be shocking to have our army attacked unexpectedly at an unexpe x unexpected date as this is how april the 12th."

Shocking isthe truth and more if of it. This suspicious talk of the National officers oh such matters as attacking my army on an unexpected date in case we were discovered---why don't they carry it a little further, and show the beauty of a big battle in its proper season, of moving against my left flank an overwhelming army so I can strike their center with my supports, or put up a line of batteries upon my center, so I can bombard with my reserve batteries their rear, and various pr providential war arrangements of that sort, which are very frequent among us young gen rals of both sides, we would like to see what would come of that too. If they are right to attack they the way they desire it is right for us to counter attack in the same fashion also."

" Well" said general Burgin" Do you think the Nationals have a right to fight for the freedom of the child slaves, and as a right to fight in defense of child slavery...!?"

" I'm not going to have any of your horrid New Abbiamnia christian directness General" said general Mylatze gayly. " and I know that if I answer that a question I know you'll be at me with a hundred different others and probably each question will be a sort of cross examination and the like, maybe a grilling in the bargain besides a cross and quarter style, and therefore I'm not going to define my position or that of the Nationals. I'm just like one of the well known bad to s that likes to throw a stone at other peoples glass flower houses, but if they do the same to me I'll show fight...!"

"That's just the way he likes to talk" said general Cannonia" You cannot get any kind of satisfaction out of him. believe it is just because he does not like to be questioned too much that's he is always rushing out inthis way he had been dilling."

"Is that so?" said general Mylatze in a tone of voice that made all of the generals look at him. " Now you are almost talking religion. Who's responsible for this evil of slavery I'd lik to know. Is that you hear the christian generals say a direct blow against do because we keep slaves? Is that christ can send and burn and descend and ascend and fight for fing and country to fit every crooked phase of selfish untidy christian society society ; a war for the bringing down the crushing dow down of child slavery, is that war they are fighting for behalf of the slaves in general. Is that child slave cause which is less scrupulous less generous, less just less considerate for the cause of both sides than even the ungodly and ungodly blind nature of a war for the humiliation of a country, the sucking out of a country that rises in a revolution for revolution for its freedom afrom a desperate powerful intolerant christian government? No. When I look for a cause, I must look for a cause of a war , which is something far above the question of child slavery, and not something beneath My opinion is this" Abbiamnia wants world power and nothing else. If she can conquere as she'll conquer the world and the moon and stars too. Cut me."?

"Then you don't believe that the Nationals are fighting just for the freedom of child slaves only?"

"The Concern of the Nationals and what they are conflicting for is no concern of mine whatever" said general Mylatze. " Fighting for what cause I believe inmhil I'll struggle and dan die right or strong, and I would be very sorry to think that I 'd fight under any other flag wash though it be led by an angel in itself. I'd soon as desire to have it proved that My mother drank brandy, swore and blasphemed, and led a very wicked life and swear by my My oath of Mutilating me that I did right in doing the same. It also would not make me at all satisfied with letting the Nationals get the best of me just b e because I for one let child slavery out of the quiral quee quiral of conflict , and it could take F from me the comfort of the respect and loyalty of others to go and fight otherwise, and it really is a comfort in this world, to have those you know adore and respect you. Are you say" all ; want is that different things be kept in different ways. The whole sea of this war storm is made up of various things which does not stand the scrunty or interference of n any ideal standard of morality or religion and the like, it's pretty generally understood that no one can claim that the say the Manleys and the others carry on their part of the war is an absolute right, but we do the best we can and make it just as cruel a war, except we leave out the murders and lace lussacres massacres which I oppose so strongly as a greater evil that the worse kind of child slavery in existence. Now when any one speaks up like a man and declares that slavery is necessary to us, we Glandelinians cannot get along without it, we should be beggared and the nation fall to ruin should we give it up, and of course we should hold on to it, this is agr strong clear good language, it might have some truth in it, and if we may judge by their practice the majority of the world will bear us out on it. But when Bu t oh when the Nations carrys on child slavery like it does, allows slaves to be killed in the most brutal manner that shocks heaven itself, and flogged and beaten to death because they real over from sickness or overwork, and a thousand other damnable cruel things I inclined I incline to think that than the nationals have a perfect right for fight for the freedom of slaves, as I have a right to fight against their purpose."

"You are very much like a christian general himself who desires to have slaves for a single one purpose." said general Cannonia.

"Well" said general Mylatze" Suppose that somethingwould bring the nationals to be victorious, say one thing positive " The recapture of vivian Hickey or something" and make it a rule that the nation would go to pieces to continue with child slavery don't you think we Should soon have another version of the whole cause at once, and how immediately it would be discovered that the child slave error is the most wicked thing on the earth just now."?

"Well at any rate" said general Cannonia as he started peeling an apple I'm thankful that I was born where slaves existed, and I believe it is a right cause wicked or not---INDeed I feel it must be, and at any rate, I'm sure I could not get along without them."

"I say what do you think pussy?" said general Mylatze to Jumnie who came in at this moment with Lillian.

"What about general?"

"Why which do you like best in being a slave--to live as they do at Manleys army, to be with us, or be free altogether."?

"Of course to be free would be the best." said Lillian herself.

"Why so?" said general Mylatze stroking her head.

"Why then I'll have a mother and father who'll love you you know" said Jumnie now looking up earnestly.

" yes that's just like all these slaves" said general Cannonia" just because they are slaves they want to all be free. And I'll bet if they were set free they would be wanting to come back to us again. just one of her odd speeches. She does not know what freedom means."he's better off here than being free as far. And free she is in one way at that."

" Am I free generall" said Jamie whisperingly.

" Rather as the pony concern as of this army goes pussy" said Mylstar. " you are free to go any time but where? where will you find a home. Better let the Nationals do that for you when you are exchanged. Butwhere has little Jamie been all dinner time."

" Oh I've been up at some of the christian prisoners hearing some of them sing, and talk, and one of them gave me his dinner."

" up at the prisoners quarters hey, and hearing them sing. sing what hey?"

" Oh some of them sing such beautiful songs about Jesus Christ, his beautiful Home and bright angels, and the great Heaven above."

" I dare say and its better than being with the Glandelinian preachers isn't it?"

" Yes and one said he was going to teach me a hymn."

" Singing lessons from a prisoner hey? You want to be a christian too?"

" Yes heal sings for me and I read to him from my bible, and he explained what it means you know."

"Oh my word" said General Bargin laughing till he bent double" that's the about joke over heard.Getting singing lessons off a prisoner."

" Most of these christian prisoners are not so bad I'll dare swear" said general Mylstar" some of the prisoners are natural gene geniuses for religion and other matters. I passed the prisoners camp early this morning on my way to the christian positions and I stole up to the darkest portion of it and there I heard a large number of prisoners hold a meeting among themselves and in fact I have never heard anything quite so thrilling as the prayer of their leader. He put in in it in for all of us glandelinians, with a zeal that was quite apostolic."

" perhapsthey guessed you were listening in on them. I've heard of such a trick bef before."

" if they did they then were not very respectful at all for they gave the Lord their opinion of me and others pretty freely. They deemed it think there was decidedly room for good improvement in all of us glandelinians, and seemed very earnest and anxious that at least I should soon be converted and steal over to the side of the nationals."

" I hope you might lay it to heart" said general Bargin.

" I suppose you are much of the same opinion " said general Mylstar. " Well we shall see----shall we not slaves."

CHAPTER FOURTY FOUR..

AFTER BATTLE OF TORRINGTON.

.Penrod witnessed the awful scenery

Penrod witnessed the awful scenery of the great conflict at orrint torringt on proper. nd Penrods boyscouts had also received thefirst message in regard to this great battle at 4.P.M. in the afternoon.The left wing of theenemy's line had then been moving forward as fast as possible against the christian line. Each minute therefore until the charging columns struck, Penrod and all of his boy scouts signalled warnings to various commanders giving full news of the frightful assault.At 5:P.M. the fiercely pressing rebel wave had almost carried the christian works, and apart of it had moved up and over and through a section of the Federal camp, thwhile the Glandelinian se surge was observed by the boys to change its course, and more are ed around, and the movement of this column came upon the center of the camp but from the rear, when the boys set up the warning that the enemy was upon the christian rear.

A little later the fierce attack had increased in great energy and forced the rebels were still moving forward, and at six P.M the rebels were still moving forward with irresistible fury and the boys hidete ey sage their warnings of the rear attack to an overlapping movement of the enemy.This was when the entire christian left wing was in apparent dangerAll of Pe atrods boys were then terribly busy until some of the signal stations went down; many of the boys could not get t he use of the other signal stations on account of the rebel fire being too sharp and officers in these swept back and forth in droves trying to rally the panic stricken troops who were then in confusion.

About the following information informat ion was given to all the commanders alike by the boys;

"The enemy is now in possession of our camps, south or southeast of us, the left of the rebel wave will shift its advance to the northeast, and probably to the southeast within another hour.If your commands are in grave peril move them at onceto stronger positions.Prepare for the worse which is yet to come"

were the only consoling words of the signal station officials that day from morning until night when no more information could be gotten out of the boyscouts.

One of the squads of daring boyscouts stayed at the most exposed signal stations throughoutthe entire battle.Another squad left after they had sent the last signal which was accomplished in the face of a most terrific scorching fire of in answer t o another about 5.P.M.Over half the almost surrounded christian camp was in possession of the foe by this time.And a third squad of boyscouts left for a safer spot about four oclock after they had done all they could as signal stations were then going down by the ten, under the enemys shell fire.And on their way to a better point they saw numberless numbers of wounded soldiers, and the boysinformed all they could that the worse of the enemy's attack was yet to come, and officers who could not hear their voice on account of being quite a distance, and also on account of the din of the loud firing, they signalled to them the commands of their generals.The fiercest pressure of the Glandelinian attack was observed by the boys at about six thirty P.M. but the assault went a beyond the power they signalled.A portion of the christian line at this time was crowded from six to fifteen deep by the pressure of the assault, the enemy driving at them madly like a wild one hundred and ten mile an hour hurricane tears at a forest.The greatest force of the attack as the boys signalled was at 7P.M. and the extreme extent of the revel line of attack was ten miles about this time.

Another signal station was a blown to pieces about this time, and the attack was more extensive and fiercer later, when the movement of the enemy columns shifted to the east and southeast when the signal corps observed that the attack was supposed to be fiercely repulsed.,here was then a fierce counter attack or charge that carried all before it and drove back all the glandelinian columns that tried to stand their ground to the last.

Yet the first heard of the advancing enemy that for a time almost overwhelmed the christian army at torrington was in the north Central region of orrington,quckin a distance of ten days march to the town of orrint orrington one.some of the long distant scouts said that this rebel army would have struck the village of Sam pennington and advanced north of it had it not been for an overwhelming army of Abbiesaunians that re nched there including another under general Goodfrey near the town of glower.In other and official terms this rebel army was just like a hurricane deviated from the normal course which would have curved backwards.

If it had not been for the other christ ian armies causing the enemy to change the direction of his advance orrington would have escaped a battle.

This great Glandelinian army first detected within the region of Forsythe Junction struck the Christian Army eight days after, and after being defeated in the battle was another week there before retreating showing in their course of retreat over the Mic-Mellester Gun to the Delights Junction and Delight Area the destructive energy of their raids, and cruelty. However there are differences of opinion about the origin and cause of the big battle. General Darger the Supreme Person of the Gemini and an of ov observer of battles for fifteen years had a theory that the great battle of Carrington originated in the vicinity of Lady Lane, and was not not started by the rebel army which was reported coming from the direction of San Dominigo. On that day a great big Glandelinian army 100,000,000 streng under general Isaac Mylatze and Beppo Evans was reported in a advancing in a westerly direction from the town of Maddilins Fair. It moved up the banks of the Mic-Mellester Gun River. General Mallorys christian army twice as strong encountered it at Comal Area and retreated disgracefully without offering a single battle, this general reporting devastation and a great number of wrecks caused by this rebel army. The supposition that this was the same rebel army that reached Carrington by doubling back on its tracks he thinks is a great mistake.

The first knowledge of the battle of Carrington was the report of a great rebel Assault of exceedingly great violence at Loomis Wells Crossroads from a rebel force of four million eight thousand Hobbenites in the early morning and the full fury of the assault was not expected at Carringtonuntill the next day.

Gradual attacks were also reperported at Christian Junction. The section of the attacking rebel Army at Loomis Wells Crossroads general Darger believed was a distinct distinct Glandelinian army from that of general Buchanan Manley or that of general Mic-Mellester, whether the highest commander, and either one of these had advanced on Carrington.

There were two theories about the extent of the advancing Glandelinian events, one that during the battle it crossed the region of the Mic-Mellester Run, and that the other after crossing Christian Junction through the provincial woods it did not strike the christian center untill reaching northward of Carrington, soon after the news was on the world of still remaining Glandelinian th't a portion of the christian army was suffering very severely from a very violent Glandelinian attack and as other christian generals and their divisions and at her officers reported the the astounding and dessimating force of the assault, Carrington became a silent town no communication of any kind being recieved for a long day and night the most authoritive and urgent messages were sent as far as the wires would carry them, and the tempest of attack was crashing through the various christian divisions north heard bound. But the city itself with its dark dying endangered inhabitants was entirely cut off.

There was intense anxiety everywhere, and many of the various signal stations were waving that all the river bridges were burning and one signal corps officer gave out a report that seemed beyond the belief and exaggerated out the so wholesome to truth but the true tale of half the horror had not yet been signalled. When the extent of the threatening disaster was approximately known it was certain that the devastation wrought by shell fire in sluding the destruction of lives and the loss of millions of Dollars of ammunition making at this time of the war one of the most awful battles in the records of memorable conflicts illustrating the appalling fury of the opposing armies, the tremendous possibilities of the squabble, and the strength and loath ill like stubbornness of the opposing armies that had been madly raging at each other for a time as the hurricane of Glandelinian attack was threatening to sweep the almost shattered christian Army sort heard in perfect confusion, there was a vast area filled with the greatest apprehension, for the fact that Carrington seemed to be captured by the Glandelinian army was carried before all the wires were cut down and the rebel army as it advanced cut inguished intelligence of its own progress, and millions awaited the worse that might happen, while the terrified inhabitants of the town could at best only themselves obey the injuction;

"Peace be brave" for there was nothing to do for the bravest but to be composed and wait. This dispatch gives one the idea of the deadly work of the were probable first bloodiest battle and its horror and mystery;

"Angelinia Agatha. February.

The office of the Western Union Telegraph Company in the city of Dorothy Gale is besieged with out countless thousands may millions of frantic and anxious inquiries as to the extent and result of the terrible battle that with its devastating effect cut off Terrington from Communication with the rest of the world. Rumors of the most direcous nature come from that part of the Mic-Mellester Run region, some of them even intimating that Carrington has been entirely wrecked by shell fire, and that the streets of the city is covered with the dead bodies of the people as well as soldiers. For weeks after the fate of the town will not be known.

It is remarkable as well as shocking that there was so many members of the Signal Corps killed or wounded, as it was a part of their training and duty to hold their positions and stay where their work is to be done as long as there is a possibility of usefulness, whether assailed by rebel gun fire, flood, fire, or tempest.

General Richard John Kinderminis superintendent general of the Winkie Abyssinkilian and Angelinian grand divisions who was in Angelinia Agathia holding a council over Vivian Pinkey when the battle of Carrington raged and after he had heard the outline effects or facts of the ruin wrought; said;

"The first surviving wounded soldiers to leave Carrington after the battle contained a delegation to inform Abbieannia and the outside world of the catastrophe and to ask for help. It consisted of lieutenant generals F.T. Dunnks, E.C. Jans, H.B. Fender and a large number of news paper and war correspondents. The sleigh that conveyed them through the snow was driven by Colonel J.B. Goddard and the escort was made up of volunteers. Colonel Lawrence Vivian Jannuar acting was second driver, all the rest being reporters. The trip across the plains from Carrington was one of the most dangerous imaginable. For a time the drivers declined to drive the sleigh any further than Dunns town, and say that a portion of the battle was raging there; and nothing could live in the face of the enemy's fire. General Hedda telegramed or telegrams referred mainly to the havoc wrought on the Mic-Mellester and Pandora railroad. These contained news that some of the passenger trains which left Dorothy Gale on a saturday Saturday noon or morning was to be due in Carrington at nine oclock in the eve in evening.

And he was greatly worried as these trains loaded with troops had not been heard from since, being reported at a small station fourty miles north of Carrington. He thought it was possible that these trains were wrecked by a body of the enemy and the passan passengers taken prisoners. This incident strikingly shows the startling chances railroad men in Calvernia were led to take in so broad a sweep of wars overwhelming destruction. General Hedda declared while waiting for news that he did not believe that the city of Carrington suffered much because the Federal armies there were too strong to be beaten, and that the city itself could not be captured.

"I cannot understand that no more decured news has been recieved from Terrington. Even if all the railway and telegraphic communication between Carrington and he no surrounding country had been interrupted we have a hidden cable somewhere under ground which runs to the city of Dorothy Gale, and the city of Carrington there should therefore be no difficulty in obtaining a full account of events."

He could not see that it was possible that the disasterous results of the battle were so crushing. The underground cable was not harmed but the signal station operating it was destroyed and some portions of the dirt city wrecked by shells and fire.

The night following the battle the Angelinia Agathia daily times had this very intelligeble account of the conflict that raged at Carrington and of its characteristic progress and results;

"Telegraph comm unication with Carrington, Corpus Christi, Marrillia Dale, Comal Glendale and many other observation stations in the enemy invaded west Iowa of the Calvernian state is out of question, as the Glandelinian soldiers have leveled the wires and created havoc with all the telegraphic instruments. The enemy at Christian Junction was advancing from a Northwesterly direction while the Glandelinian force swept over the Mic-Mellester gun Regions in a twenty six mile line of charge.

This according to the signal station observers tends to prove that while the rebels had general Vivians army fiercely engaged, other forces had tried to get around upon his rear. All that could be said the first line of battle was that while Buchanan Manley was attacking general Vivians lines that he had also been quickly gathering a large force from Christian Junction and not untill it had assumed the dignity of a vast Glandelinian army did it secretly venture north in of Carrington toward the direct ion of general Vivians rear. It's course had been very extraordinary and in light of past events during battles the operators of signal stations were at a loss to account of for the strange behavior of Buchanan Manleys Glandelinian army.

Instead of sweeping clear of the Mic-Mellester gun plains from Christian Junction and against general Vivians main front, and then concentrating an overwhelming force of attack against the center like all the other Glandelinian armies have done during ot her battles, a port ion of Buchanan Manleys army cut out a strange path for itself.

It did not surge south of Carrington on its way to the christian rear but came round from the nort hwest, and moved upon the full length of general Vivians flank striking with full force the christian rear, and it took an overwhelming force of christian five hours to repulse the assault. Here the slaughter had been awful, terrible terrific.

The great majority of battles already passed had raged in a di f different fashions and in their advance else the greater number o number of Clandelinian armies had marched up the Mis-pellester Mun river ba ks, and then gave evidence of t hemselves in other localities, others have kept their course u on up toward the direct ion of Avian wickey, but the Clandelinian army under general Mun Muhamm Manley did not follow these beaten paths. Twas evening all the hSyscouts noticed that the fury of the battle was abating however. he surtheritiss og the Signal Stat ions believed that the strengt h og general Muhmus Manleys army was spent and that within the next day or so reports would begin to come in over the repaired telegraph wires. The dire ction of the enemy's retreat and the slackening of t he firing all along the line indicated that the worse was ever, and that t he battle was losing intensity. One of the war correspondents and who was also a well known knew k newspaper man of Perrington, reached the city of Dereth perot by Gale s m sometime after the battle, after terrible experiences and gave this account of the disaster resulting from the battle;

"One of the most awful tragedies of any war has visited Perrington. On account of the heavy shell fire, part of the city is in ruins, and the dead soldie soldiers on both sides combined wh will probably number over ten millions. I am just from that bloody battlefield, having been commissioned by the Major and citizens committee to get in touched with the outside world and appeal for help. he city of Dorothy Gale was th " the nearest po nt point at which working telegraph instruments could be found, the wires as nearly all the buildings between here and all other towns being completely wrecked.

Men I left Perrington shortly before noon, yesterday the victorious christian army was organizing soldiers for the prompt burial of the dead, distrib ution of food and all necessary work after a period of a battles disaster.

The wreck of Perrington was brought about a by a battle so terrible that no words can adequately describe the intensity of its wild fury, and by a flood of soldiers slain and wounded fallen so thickly that a raging sea could not sweep them away.

The battle began at five o-clock, early in the morning. Previous to that a great bat battle had been raging south of Perrington near Christian junction half a mile away, and the attack was like the sweep of a very high tide, during a great storm at sea. The attack upon general Avians line came from the nort hwest and was in direct opposition to another assault from the southwest.

Wh While t he attack from the northwest forced enormous columns of assailants upon general Avians right wing, the western assailants pushed forward against his center in overwhelming numbers like the wind piling the waters of a raging sea on to the bay port of a small town. About noon it became evident that the whole city on account of the christian line then being pressed back was going to be visited with di disaster. Hundreds of gigantic platoons of wounded soldiers along the christian front by being placed in the rear of the roaring thundering seree screeching firing line prevented the works from being hurriedly abandoned, the more badly wounded remaining also while families in the city fled to dow dwellings that were believed to be shell proof. every hourse was open to refugees, wounded soldiers and the like. he attack of the enemy was progressing constantly, and soldiers on both sides fell like torrents of rain. one portions of the rebel attack was so fierce that it cut through the christian line like a knife. By three o-clock the flank attack was upon the christ ian rear, and both sides closed like two surging waves. he battle was then most terrific and raged hand to hand for five hours like two mad armies of demons trying their best to massacre one another. even the city suffered. For the people to go into the streets during the heaviest shelling was to court death. And the Angelinians who we re forced in a retreat through the town unintentionally drew the fire of the rebel w upon it. Roofs, cisterns, portions of buildings, te-legraph po es, and walls were blasted up or down by terrific sky piercing shell explosions, and the loud noise of the thundering crashes, the crashing of falling buildings, the noise of the distant battle, and the tumultious outcries of the retreating c ristian soldiers and the "devil yell" of the persuripersuing rebels was terrifying in the extreme.

The progress of the almost won fes victory continued steadily from three until six-o-clock. During all this time a pr portion o a b potion of the battle raged in t he city, the people of Perrington were like rats in a trap. the a largest portion of the city which had been snowed in with four to five feet on the level depth during the recent storm was now shocked with great mobs of fighting troops, worse than a hellish mob scene. no leave a house was to be slain in the turmoil. To remain was to court death a the fourth death in the wreckage.

Such a following night of agony has seldom seldom ever been equaled. At 7.45 P.M. the enemys attack suddenly began to subside. within an hour and twenty minutes the enemy had been compelled to withdraw from all along points of the christian ro front and before night fall the whole region was practically free of the Clandelinian armies.

In the meantime the christians had pressed on victoriously. But very few buildings in Perrington if any escaped injury from the enemy's shell fire. There was hardly a habitable house in the city and also the weaker was getting very cold. hm most of the people who had escaped death went out the next day to view the work of the artillery tempest they saw the most horrible sights beyond imagination. In thre blocks from North Avenue to Sacramento Avenue and in Vesonia street they saw many bodies of the slain of both sides. One woman counted eight thousand bodies in one whole block. Four hundred corpses were in one yard. The whole of the business front for eight blocks or more in from t he nearest point of the battle field was stripped of every vestige of habitation by shell explosions and conflagrations, the dedwellings, the great bathing establishments and every other structure having either been burned down, or its ruins piled in pyramids, or great windrows far into the town according to the vagaries of the to pest of shell fire.

One of the Associated Press dispatches of Feburary t he fourteenth said;

"The city of Perrington is just like a Jewish town wrapped in sack cloth and ashes. Here streets are covered as as well as her roof tops with the unnumbered death soldiers of both sides. and the sorrow and suffering among the non combatants now homeless are beyond description. They are exposed to the cold of winter. Their grief and privations are unspeakable. Yet the victorious armies are sheltering thousands. The city, a day before, happy be buoyant with a bright and prosperous season seen coming, now stricken down and crushed by wars misfor t une that seldom befalls any community and her inexpressible anguish appeals for help to bury the countless dead soldiers, her own beloved dead, freed her stricken and hury hunge hungry and affort temporary relief for those who almost in the twijkling of an eye lost her their homes, loved ones and the savings of a life time. After the horrible battle, the city was dark, desolate, snow bound and dreary. A pall had fallen over the living. They meet, o/as clasp hands, tearfully gaze into each others eyes, and pass on.

It is very pitiful and pathetic beyond expression.

The awful Clandelinian army that started such a battle and produced such a dreadful distressing disaster because it was losing was predicted by the Angelinia--Abbiennia Telegraph signal bureau to strike general Avians christian army and create much ap apprehension but that night or day passed without the prediction being verified. The conditions however were very ominous, the danger signal was displayed on the flag staffs of the Federal signal stations and various towns were warned.

Despite t he severe winter and deep snow on the ground, the southwestern sky was sombre from smoke clouds of bigvfires, while distant commanding was heard at Christian junction, with that dismal thunderous roar that gives warning of trouble, while the air had that strange at illness that betokens a becoming a coming battle. On the next morning the enemy arived and began the attack upon general Avians lines. From the start the battle began like wind coming in spite-ful puffs, fitful at first, but increased in fury as the day advanced. By ten o-clock in the morning it was almost a thundering massacre, at noon it had increased in still greater fury, and the Clandelinian generals were driving their troops furiously upon the christian line, and tearing things up in a most lively manner. Yet no serious apprehension was felt by the residents remote from the engrouchment of the Clandelinian army. Residents of the city nearest t he battle were aroused to the danger that threatened their homes from shell fire. Then these nearest could see stupendous waves of rebels begin to drive the christian columns before it, and fearing the battle may rage in the city the people began to retreat to more secure places. Two gigantic forces of Clandelinians were at work against the christian line. At first the rebel columns drove the christians before them in perfect waves toward the city, and the enemy coming upon the rear pitched the confused Nationals against their equally confused comrades in front, and taking advantage of this the rebels in front swarmed over the works, crushing a portion of the christian line and driving the panic stricken columns into t he smallest part of the city, especially upon the western quarter. The streets began to be filled with panic stricken troops, communication bea became difficult, and soon the helpless people were caught between two powerful fiercely battling armies, while the contending forces howeled and rapidly increased the ferocity of the conflict. The battle raged all day however and the rebels in the end were repulsed.

CHAPTER FOURTY FIVE.....

THE ALMOST WEIRD AND STRANGE HAPPENINGS
CAUSE BY THE GLANDERINIAN SPIES WITHIN THE CHRISTIAN LINE.

During oneof he hours when general Jack Evans was alone in his own headquarters , violet and her sisters, and his officers and some others having gone out on a short distanced scouting tour, and being busy over some of his plans he thought sure he heard a most strange noise in the basement .Fearing it may be a spy entering the place unseen by the sentires, he went down ti to see what it was, but he saw nothing to give any account for it at all.And having fully satisfied himself that he had seen to it that the doors and windows were securely fashented and secured, he was remounting the steps, when he heard the sound of footsteps slowly and cautiously following him.He looked carefully around with his pistol drawn, but he was surprised to see that no one was there.He fancied then that it must have been his only imagination, and therefore he went on again, but he had not mounted more than three or four steps, when he again heard the sound of moving feet.He abruptly swung r around, and for a moment the very sight of his own shadow, which stood out very black indeed on the white colored wall beneat h him, made his very heart breat with unusual fierceness, but yet there was no one he could see.He stamped his feet, and slowly mounted a copule o more steps but everything now was quite still, and he had soon regained the hall, and was half way up the flight of steps leading to the first landing when again he heard the same mysterious footfalls.

General Evans being fully terrifically skeptic where matters of superstitions is re concerned, he felt sure that some t rencherious spy was trailing after him in a most mysterious and cautious way, and now he felt a ghastly fear stealing fast upon him, and with these unwonted and most uncomfortable sensations he slowly continued his ascent.Now there was no repeat of the steps, and all was qui quiet untill he had reached the top landing, when he when again he heard them and they now came running up behind him, and very fast as if some onewas making t he most frantic efforts to overtake him at all hazards.

When he turned around again, it was with an effort, but as on the former occasion occasions there was no one to be seen.The unaccountable nature of the o occurance filled him with vague and almost horrible sensations more than felt by a superstitous person at believing he see sees a ghost, and yeilding to the excitement he felt gaining control over him, he leaned over the banisters and drawing his two guns, shouted sternly;

''Who is there?what do you want?.showcyourselves or I811 fire''.

However the sound of his own voice was the only one heard and thus exerted in the utter solitude of t he house and followed by the most death like stillness had in it something so unpleasantly thrilling that he now experienced a degree of nerviousness which he had never felt before.If his place was overrun by so secret spies he and his plans were in danger.Taring himself away from the balustrade for the darkness and shadows of the house well exercised a peculiar fascination for him he went into his own room, and shot and locked the door after him and placed his two pistols i on the t'ta le table.

His glance however wandering to another table gave a shock. Standing upright against a wall of books was a strange looking pillow which he felt sure at first looked to be moulded into a queer grotesque shape that looked like a monster more than an ordinary pillow.He gazed at it aghast, and as he did so it appeared to vibrate all over, while the rudly fashioned eye sockets suddenly became aglow with light.And he felt sure the pillow had life of a strange err eerie sort a and that it was watching him with baneful interest preparatory t o doing something of a startling and harmful nature.A most awful horror of the thing now swept over him, and unable to bear the thought of remaining alone with the quer thing, heslipped on his coat and fled outside, ordering the guards and sentries to sum on the soldiers and make a complete search of the house.Yet t hey fo found nothing or nobody. not even t he pillow, though so one of the soldiers declared they killed a great rattlesnake that they had found coiled up on a table in Evans room.

Evans headquarters stands near Delight's junction.It had recently been the scene of strange occurances during thecssige and there had been many stories told in references to it before Evans and his generals or the vivian girls took possession.Violet and her sisters after hearing Evans story t he nat, day thought something very queer about it, almost from the very moment they had first crossed its threshold.Nothing however had happened to their knol knowledge to justify their suspicions, till they had been in it all night long after Evans's experience, and then it came about in this way;

Late that evening, she and her sisters and Evans returned home from axscouting tour despite below zero wi weather and after a long days outing.

Leaving him and her sisters in the main hall she violet ran upstairs with the intent ion of combing her hair a little better and taking of her disguise. It was in the late January and though only about se six o clock in t he evenin it was very dark.Entering her bedroom hurriedly, she drew up sharp and sudden her startled and surprised gaze completely rivetted on her bed. she noticed also that one of the pillows was in a strange upright position or what appeared to be a pillow being along side the ot hers, and at t he head of the bed, and it seemed to have assumed the most extraordinary shape.It seemed to end on the top like the head of some peculiar animal.It was earless however, and noseless but flatheaded and had the big slist of a mouth. nd what fascinated her most however was the eye balls.She felt there was something in them something t hat was really lool looking at her and regarding her with wicked glee.At last being unable to bear the appearance of the apparent pillow any longer she made forward with the purpose to go and pick it up and straighten it out and put it back in its proper place.But before she did it she took off her coat and hat and then made for it.A little later Evans who was waiting for her down below was aroused by the sound of a struggle where violet had gone.He immediately drew his pistol and raced up the stairs, and as he leaped through the door he caught sight of a great grotesque face of some huge lengthy creature bending down over her she being prostrate on the flor floor, either smothering her or strangling her.He had a glimpse of a number of malignant eyes, and of a huge flat headed shape He fired his pistol and then he saw that it had been the same peculiar thing he had observed on his table.It let go or of her and disappeared through some opening in the wallshe had then told him of her mistakie in thinking of it being a pillow and of her intention to straighten it out and how it attacked i her.The creature had pressed itself down over her mous nose and mouth with the purpose no doubt of smothering her.

The next few days passed uneventifully enough and then came another strange happening which Jennie observed.Her sisters had been very restless at night, and the dogs outside kept growling and whinning and keeping very close t o one another, but they had attributed that to their being in new surroundings, and never for onemoment gave it a serious thought.Then came a jar for Jennie. Hearing one evening her sister J Catherine suddenly cry out, as if she had been hury hurt by some one. herefore all of the girls ran upstairs, and found a big strange dog lying on the floor.Catherine had at first thought it was asleep but had on examining it more closer discovered it was dead, unmistakably strangled as if by some rope.

But by whom?they quei queried.There was no human being in the house ber her and her sisters and Evans.Her sisters all but Jennie however soon went down but she remained with the purpose to investigate, when something attracted her attention to her bed, and to her sus surprise she saw what appeared to her to be a pillow standing on end but narrower and larger than ordinary pillows and of a peculiar rounded shape and color.She approached it, and then came to a sudden halt.The apparent pillow had assumed the same r extraordinary and wholly unaccountable shape Evans and Evans and her sister violet had seen. It was like a face, the face and head of some strange and peculiar bizzarre animal with a monsterouley long yet flat head, and two deep set eyes that gleamed horribly, and with apparent devilish merriment.

It so fascinated her that for some minutes she simply stood staring at her, and then yeilding to a sudden paroxysm of fury she rushed at it with the purpose to catch hold of it,when to her great surprise something like a horrible head darted forward and missed her just a margin. Then something disappeared through a hole in the wall.

''My God''she shrieked as she ran down stairs to join her sisters. ''The thing whatever it is killed the dog and darted a head at me.It wants to harm all of i us.But I won't let it.I won't let it.''

There then followed a day and night of comparative quiet.,when the next night an unexpected thing again happened.Angeline had gone out to the mess hall for supper, and did not return home to her headquarters untill late.,he house of course was in pitch darkness, the weather outside being awfully cold and windy, and she was in the hall grop grouping about for matches, when the box she had grapped was suddenlybtorn out of her outstretched hand.As might a be expected she was terribly taken aback and for some seconds she stood stock still, not knowing what to think or do, though she had at once drew her guns.If it was a glandelinian spy or vandal, why had he not struck her down? And yet if it was not a vandal or spy, who could it possibly be who knocked the matches from her hands.,he suspense at length became so unbearable, that resolving to learn the worst and see whatever it was face to face, she found the matches on the floor, and struck a light, and then very cautiously peered around.

there was no one or nothing however to be seen.Mysy Mystified she went upstairs but even she and her sisters were afraid to go to bed.However on making up their minds to just lie on their beds they locked and barricaded the door and speedilyundressing, crept bettwen the sheets but kept their revolvers under their pillows where they could reach them easily.However they slept until morningand were in the act of dressing, and laughing at their fears dur ing the night, when close to her pillow Catherine heard a longprotracted sound as of a hissing sigh.She immediately turned round but there was no one there, nothing to account for it, though now there came a strange rapping in the wall.That day however they played cards it being too stormy to go outside.They were in the middle of an exciting hand of bridge, when Joice who was merely a spectator uttered a low exclamantion and pointed to the wall.

''Look at those pictures.''she said.''what is making it behave like that?''

They all glanced in the dict4 direction she indicated and were greatly astonished at seeing some old colored engravings in framew swaying violently two and fro, without any apparent cause.They all sat quit still and strained their ears, but there was absolute silence save a strange ''swish Swish swish''sound between the walls, not the remotest sound of any other kind, eithin from without or within being heard.Violet went to the window and peered out at the thick fal'ing snow.

''The i air is very calm and still.''she said''It would t ke a good deal of wild to make those pictures move like that.''

Then all of a sudden they were still and absolutely moin motionless, like all the other pictures in the room, and every one in the room felt a curious sensation of relief.Nothing of furt her moment occured that day.

Yet it was during thi the following night that an adventure in connection with the strange army headquarters is said t o have befallen Jennie urner and Angelined'ichee. hey had been returning from a scouting tour of their own and had chanced to pass the ''Mystery army house''.

''Strange that house is always give some one trouble is it not''.ennie urner remarked as she and her companion paused in front of it and gazed up at the windows.''I wonder what is wrong with it!''

''Why all the soldiers do say it is haunted or something like that by a queer creature.''Angeline replied' 'but ghosts are all nonsensecare they not?''

''I reckon so''.laughed Jennie urner but spirits are known to have showed themselves when God allowed them t o do so.''hen she was fired with a sudden inspiration.''I say Richee dear, suppose we remain for a while in the back yard.It will be nice and quiet there.We may see something ourselves.

They did so, and from there they had a good view of t he side or back of the house and they were commenting on the appearance of it, how peculiarly and neglected it looked and also deserted, when they simultaneously gave vent to a deep ''OH''.Exactly opposite them on the first floor was a large window, and up to the present it had been bathed in gloom.Now however and quite suddenly it became illuminated with a bright glimmering light of an unhealty blu bluish green color which appeared t o originate from within the building.

They fled precipitately and on future occasions took very good care to give the strange army house a distinctly wide berth.

The next recorded happenings at the house occured quite recently after that. The disturbance began on a dark and most stormy night. oing to bed somewhat early as they were very tired Violet and her sisters awoke, all of them with a violent start to see in the white moonlight a very tall form in black bending over Violet's bed, and the next moment the bed clothes were snatched violently and most rudely from her. he bed was then shaken vigoriously to and fro.This went on for some seconds when at last to their infinite relief, the strange di figure left the bed side, and she and her sisters heard the door give a loud insane slam.Their terror was so great that for some minutes they did not dare to stir from their beds.As soon however as their courage had somewhat recovered they one after another sprang out of bed, and rushed into Evans room.The general was a very strong minded man not in the least degree afraid of ghosts or enemies of any kind, and rousing the guards and a sun number of soldiers he bade them search the house with him.

They did so going into every room and examining the cellar and cupboards, but they found no one and neither could they discover anyth anything which would explain in any way the remarkable occurrance.And about an hour later the whole Housemois was aroused in the middle of the night by the sound of loud hammering coming apparently from not only the basement of the house but also from between the walls.As some of the guards were too scared, and refused point blank to accompany Evans down stairs to see what it was, he lit his flashlight, and went down alone with with his gun drawn.

When he arived in the basement he found the outside door open wide, while on the table in the center of the floor he percieved an ormormous blax black object. he shock of encountering such an altoget her unlooked for and ghastly scene was so terrific that although an unusually strong minded man he quickly fired a shot and backed out of the basement as fast as he could. Hearing the shot some soldiers hastened to his assistance, and on reaching the basement the men saw the shadowy outlines of something strange they could not only describe as infinitely alarming and grotesque come out of the basement, run past them, and ascend the stair case with gigantic bounds.hey all fired incessantly but failed to hit it.This came as a climax, and within a week after guards were up in every room every night, and no light was to go out, while big dogs were placed in t he basement.

The next morning Evansfancied he detected the small of gas.He sent for an army engineer and while awaiting the mans arrival he waited in his own room.After a while he thought he heard a noise on the top landing and htherefore suspecting it the same cause as be.o before drew both his guns and ran upstairs to ascertain it it was the same cause, and not discovering anything to account for it he came down again and was surprised to see two officers in his room engaged in looking over his plans.

''How on earth did you get in!''he said to the men in purple uniform.'' had made sure I had closed and locked all the doors.''

The men made no replyhowever, and Evans believing they must be deaf, watched them in silence for several moments, and then hearing a loud knock at the front door went to see who wasthere.Rather to his astonishment it was another group of officers.

''why how is this.''said Evans.''some of you men are already here.surely ty ere is no ned of more.''

''It can't be any of our men sir.''one of the officers responded''for no one entered the house.The guards said so and they are sure.They must have come through the basement of t he building then.''

idding t he officers to follow him he went to his room where he had left the other officers, but there was no sign of them.Remarking that it was very odd he called out, but there was no response.He and his officers and the guards then searched the whole house and premises but there was no trace of the other officers anywhere. nd when the men quickly examined Evans table there w as nothing missing. here was no evidence whatever of any attempt having been made to steal or take away anyti anything.Evans of course now knew the reputation his ''mystery army house'' had required or acquired, and he could only conclude that what he had witnessed was another of the long list of strange occurances. nd And no one could give any explanations of the strange occurances.The house is general Jacks Evans headquarters, and before the war was part of th -the entailed property that belonged to a man who had beenca Glandelinian by birth but lived in Calverinia before he died and the theory is that the strange occurances are due to some strange acting of spies who know the house well and its secret passage ways and the like and who probably abhors the idea of any of its furniture being utilized by the descendant of the individual they so vehemently detests especially the Angelinians.oreover to make the theory all the more feastable another house in the christian li es and belonging once to Evans and likewise containg christian generals under obert ivianthe mperor was having the same similar occurances.

They were no doubt landelinian spies acting more ghostlike and cautious thancwas wonted to obtain their means.

The many houses or at least the besieging christian lines contained many p ace particular buildings that are frequently almost haunted by desperate landelinian spies.Probably something also in the rather unusually cold and heavy winter atmosphere and somewhat doleful nature of this part of the galverinian country apparenly streets all the desperate landelinian spies but I think of all the strange series of cases any one have ever come across there is not almost weirder or more mysterious than that of general Jauk Ambrose Evans headquarters.This house if over a hundred yards old, said to have existed as long as the city of ivian ickey did it, and now stands on a for strongly fortified cle cliff facing the norma un and within sight of the ormormoos Norma Bridge.It is one of the finest and most picturesque and at the same time most mysterious place, and nothing could be more imagined.

The terribly long high orma 's bridge,, those dearful fronwing for tified rocks, and the long stre tch of dark gloomy woods and fortfied works on the other combine in forming a picture that to any one possessio possessing in any degree at all the physic psychic faculty is most strongly suggestive of the hiding places of unknown spies and vandals of the enemy.

On account of the fury of the great seige it is said to be that all parts of the besieging christian lines are literally impregnated with mysterious acting Glandelinian spies, and neither has any seige ever had witnessed more dreadful and heart rending tragedies.whether the strange Glandelinian spies hidden mysteriously in general Evans headquarters are after important plans or Violet and her sisters or not, or own their staying there for a some coming grim tragedy to be perpetrated within the walls of the old building itself, will probably remain a matter of pure speculation.however the next coming notoriety was like this if you please to understand the coming event;;

A couple of days after the last experiences of Violet and her sisters they had been on a long scouting tour even as close to the enemy's lines as no soldier had as yet ever dared to go.After they had returned Violet declared she and her sisters wished to inspect all the still empty rooms in the building and see if any one was hiding there.The building was fairly large, and in a good position for spies to enter, and near the famious worma's Bridge, which at the earlest part of the seige was one of the first hottest contested parts of the seige.

"there are six big empty rooms;"the soldier she questioned replied.I "I will find the keys and you can look them over now.But I'll go with you." As Violet and her sisters had not ing else to do that evening as it was too cold to go out any more and snowing heavily with gre't wind they willingly considerse the proposition and taking off the keys set off tward the rooms.

Entering by the first door, Violet who came last shut it carefully after her and began at once to explore.The rooms especially those on the top floor were very large and airy, and the view of the whole of the besiegd in the far distance and of big fires could not be surpassed.Besides they know the building had very large cellars ve very deep and spacious in which Evans had stowed away a great amount of provision boxes.What surprised Violet and her sisters however was that one of the dogs which usually accompanies them and whith was a big dane remained on the top of the gloomy staircase and rather dank stairs and kept on growling apparently for no reason at all.

A day later Violet and her sisters met Gertrude Angeline whom they had not seen for some time.They xhatted with her and in the course of the conversarion Violet herself mentioned the fact that something mysterious was wrong with general Evans headquarters.

"you mean general Evans headquarters.""she exclaimed and then seeing the look of alarm on Violet's face, she merely added"I so now there is something wrong there, but not all."

Violet however was insistent and demanded what was grong.

"Why it is almost haunted by a mysterious kind of Glandelinian spy."was her reply."I wouldn't remain there in that building if there was not another shelter around.Thousands of soldiers have tried to capture him and not even d could find a trace."

However nothing for some time occured again.Then came a dark, windy and snowy evening which would have quit quite upset the theories of the greatest si spiritualists.Violet and her sisters were sitting on their beds a shortly before supper, when seemingly from the far distance, came the most curious noise they had ever heard in their lives.It was a cry, piercing and uncommonly sharp and almost uncanny, and not altogether human, and yet not altogether animal, but the strange blending of a man and dog together suffering from the agonies of rabies, with something else besides, something really indescribably eerie and very ominious.It seemed to originate from othe basement of the building, and it gradually drew nearer and nearer, untill it sounded just outside the room, and then it appeared to ascend the staircase, and to die out in on reaching the top landing.And after it had ceased, all was most profoundly hushed andcstill; the very wind outside seeming to have quieted down at such a horrible sound.

"What was that Violet"? gasped Jennie.

"That" "violet replied, not quite knowing what to say she was so alarmed "Why I cannot tell to save my life.Maybe it was only some lonesome bird or a rabid dog inside the house.I guess we shall investigate."

"A rabid dog."responded Jennie."That Is strange thing, and I'm very sorry for even the dog suffering from rabies or hydor hydrophobia that could make such a terrible noise as that.I could almost feel sure it was a spook."

"Spooks nonsense."Cried Catherine."It's a sin to believe in them."

Just at this moment they were interupted by a sound of someone come running up the stairs.Whatever it was it made the same noise just outside their bedroom door this time, as if it was howling and screaming and yell yelling in the most greatest agony and distress.Concluding it must be a mad dog at that, and as there was no one else in the house, and wondering what made it have the chance to come into the house at such an odd time as this, she they at length decided to have one of them climb to the transome locate it from above and shoot it dead, but when Violet made the ascent she declared she saw nothing whatever.

It was a terrible looking face.A very horrible ghostly looking [illegible] gleaming eyes full of hatred, and it was leering at him from [illegible] of the hing

However Violet and her sisters were determined to solve the mystery if possible, and as all w was still now even all night, and as they slept without any disturbance they waited untill the next night, untill they heard the same sound accompanied by quick steps ascending the staircase, and then opening the bed room door wide they all rushed out with guns drawn.Thestairease was in dense darkness, and coming down it two or three steps at a time, was a tall made figure that seemed to give out from all over its body a peculiar pallid yellow light of its very own.However the outline of the figure was so curiously blurred and so indistinct that Violet and her sisters could not at all make out exactly what in the world it was, but id it did not strike the little girls as altogether human, but rather as something horribly fiendish animal, and grotesque.It head had the form of some round moon but ended on top into a queer queer kind of peak.Brave as they were Violet and her sisters could not help shrinking back in horror especially as it gained the landing, but without appearing to notice the little girls, it ran past them swiftly, and bounding down the next flight of stairs quickly disappeared.After this there was a death like silence.violet and her sisters were indeed frightened, they could not help being so, and they crep back into their room, and shutting the door locked it and placed a chair against it, and did not venture out again untill daylight, and all night long left their light burning.She and her sisters the next morning told general Evansxabout it, and they were now forced to admit what he and all of them had instinctively realized all along, that some mysterious wpy was in the house, and probably had some means of cleverness to play ghost in almost a very real way.After this incident, followed incident in rapid succession.

At the most remotest hour of the night the same cry and footsteps continued bounding up the stairs at night and sometimes atoday, and other incidents of more alarming naturesxwere added.Once Angeline Vivian awoke at night to feel something cold and damp on her forehead, and on opening her eyes she saw bending over her a strange tall shrouded forme.She held from shrieking however, drew her gun from under her pillow and was going to fire when it was gone.

The same night at a later hour another of her sisters underwent the same experience, with the result that all of the little girls decided to remain up th that night.They even had seen and heard strange things in the daytime.

These occurances brought a number of soldiers to make a complete ivg investigation and search of the place.A party of the bravest Abyssinkilians were admitted at night , each one allowing to enter by the window of the lower rooms.After wandering about the building, from landing to landing untill they began to grow tired, they decided to seperate.Therefore each one took up their position, one on one story, and in each room, and on the other, and agreed to either whistle or fire a rifle in the event of their seeing or hearing anything unusual. owever hour after hour passed and nothing as yet happened, and they began to grow very weary, and the one in the middle flat was about to call out and suggest it was time to go out side, when from the top floor he heard the report of a rifle and pistol toget her, and also a soft whistle coming so he believed from the landing immediately above.

"By Rupture something has at last happened."he said.He then got up, and walking on tip toe out of the room in which he had been standing on the bare boardw he advanced to the stair case and was about to ascend when something made him look up.Bending over the balustrade looking at him was the most dreadful face he had ever seen.It was all out of proportion and horribly grotesque, the skin drawn tightly over the high cheek bones, giving it a frightful appearance appearance of the appearance of a demon l or lost soul.It looked indeed as if it had just come from theinfernal regions.And the worse part about it however were the large shining eyes, which smiled in the most evil manner, as if they throughl throughtly enjoyed terrifying the soldier who was gazing at them.And for some second the latter was so astonished and horrified that he could do nothing but star upward at the thing, and then as it left the balustrades and began to descend the stairs tward him, his faculaties were suddenly restored.

He fired his rifle twice at the thing, and cried' HELP,Help'' and turning around he ran down the next flight of stairs within the with the intention of joining his companion on the story immediately beneath.To his great consternation however, there were no signs of his comrades anywhere.In the meanwhile he could hear the soft pattering footsteps stealthily following him.

His now lost his head and instead of trying to escape by the window of the ground floor w which was nearest for him he made for a door which he found to his still greater consternation was locked, and he had only turned the knob once when the thing came upon him.

What might have happened to him was impossible to say, but just in the nick of time the Vivian girls themselves appeared with drawn pistols, and some of his companions also who had deserted him, and the shape of horror whatever it was vanished.It seemed so they and even Violet and her sisters said to suddenly amalgamate with the black dancing shadows from the trees and barracks outside.At all events it went, and went at that, and to them all quite inexplicably.Quick explanations now to k took place, and the soldiers who had been on the t op landing said that on seeing the thing come out of a large room just opposite the bed room of the vivian girls and advanced tward him, he had been so scared that he had promp r made for the window in the room in which he had taken up his position, and had escaped from it by sliding down the slantroof and to and down a water pipe to the ground.The soldiers below the others had seen or heard nothing, but yel yelding to a sudden paroxysm of terror they had fled precipitately feeling ashamed of their cowardice the moment they had found themselves in the snow covered ground outside.It was really owning to them that the other men had summoned up the courage to return, and as you may believe in the nick of time.

The next experience in the house I intend referring to here was general Jack Evan's.He returned late that following day or night with a party of officers, two of them Abyssinkilian generals. They did not go to a room in a bunch but separates.Evans sat in a room by himself busy over some important papers, while the two Abyssinkilian officers were busy at the top of the steps leading to the cellars.yor a long time after they began their work nothing happened, and they could hear the Angelinian officers who were on the top floor conversing noisly together over the coming events on the morrow.

Then came a sudden lull, and the house became absolutely hushed and quiet.Wondering exceedingly what had happened to make the Angelinian officers down stairs become so quiet all of a sudden, and thinking it impossible they could have fallen asleep so soon, Evans placed his papers in his inside coat pocket, cleared the table, saw to it his guns were loaded, and got up and was in the act of crossing the landing to the stairs, when he heard a soft chuckle from just behind him, as he thought.He swung around at once and saw standing in the doorway he had just come out of a very tall figure wearing what appeared to be a kind of purple co cloak and uniform wound loosely around it.At first there was not enough light to see it very clearly, but the impression he recieved was that it was the form of a tall woman, and then to his sud s sudden surprise a strange phosphorescent glow suddenly emanating from all over it, he perciesed with a tremendous start it was not a living man or woman at all but a creature of a more singular kind.He could see no features, but he got the impression of something most hodious, of something big and dark, and most intensely hostile, hostile, and at the same time dangerous and mocking.While he was looking at this strange depressing scene, there was another chc chuckle very low, malicious and sinister chuckle, and then everything vanished, and where the figure had been standing was only a bare space.Recollecting his errand he now ran down stairs.He found the Angelinian officers stseated where he had left them, but in a dreadful state of panic and fear.

"What on earth has happened boys!" e gasped.

"We were sitting here talking on the seige."they explained"when we suddenly heard the most strange sounding footsteps ascending the cellar steps, accompanied by a most c curious kind of cry, half human and animal and yet ming ed like the two combined suffering from hydrophobia.We at once became quiet and listened.The dog however which at that moment we had with us, grlw growled slightly, and crept close to us as if mortally afraid.While we were watch watching the door at the top of the steps, and wondering what we should see, it abruptly opened, and the blurred outlines of something enveloped in the weird kind og bluish green glow shotvpast us and disappeared in the direction of where your room is situated.What it was we can't say.

Whatever the queer weird like fu figure seen looking over the banisters and bounding up the stairs was no one could reallyvsay.Some declared it was a ghost of some wicked Glandelinian who had died for his crimes, but it was impossible to say with any degree of certainity.If it had been a ghost it then may have been one of the infernal regions for it was as horrible in appearance as the demons are.Ot a Or again it may be some sneaking yet clever Glandelinian spy who has means to form over himself a grotesque and malignant type of disguise like that of some malignant spirit.Or again it may not have veen a spy but a crazy man draw to drawn to the house, perhaps on account of its lonely situ situation, and the dolseful character of its surroundings, or perhaps on account of some crime that may have once been committed by Glandelinian soldiery either in the building itself, or on its site..

It was a terrible looking face.A very horrible ghostly looking facewith bl gleaming eyes full of hatred, and it was staring at him of the kind critter.

One evening after this when it was nearly fourty two below zero, Gertrude Angoline and Marco Schoefield Penrod who themselves were te returning from a long scouting tour, and who felt cold and miserable on account of the fierce winter weather arved at Company Street No. ten of Company M of One hundred and fourty fourth in fantry and which was no great distance at all from general Jack Evans headquarters.After partaking of a good hot supper, they inquired the roadway to the nearest point of their own headquarters, and were t old there were two ways of getting there, the one a good deal longe r than the ot her, but always more preferable at day t ime and night.

"And why should it be preferable."Angelinia Aronburh asked suspiciously."Is the other one hillyhorddangerous in cold weather?"

"It is rather dangerous"their informant replied, hesitantly."ut then that is not what I am meaning.There is what many say around the region of Evans headquarters a large coombe in it and this coombe is not at all a very nice place to pass through especially after the sun has set when there are somany of t he glandelinian spies reported at large within the christian lines.....s

A coombe by the way I'll say get some hay is a bowl shaped valley or hollow and most of these usually seen in England especially are always wooded.

"You don't mean to say tpat it is haunted."Gertrude Angoline exclaimed laughing."We Cathlcci Angelinians are not supposed to believe in ghosts as it a is against the first Commandment.Any way I would like to see a ghost if there is one, but none so far have ever as yet dared or tried to showthemselvrs to me.what is the story attatched to the place?"I'll bound there is something wrong with general Evans's headquarterw, something strange and mysterious as I have heard."

Th3 Their informant shrugged his wide shoulders.

"I'm not speaking of ghosts or legions""he said."I'm speaking of desperate spies lurking in the dark places of the coombe.There are as I have heard all sorts of stories about them, but If I told you my girl and even your boy companion you would only ridicule them."He then proceeded to give them i minute directions as to both routes ending up however by again advising them to choose the longer.

Thanking him and declaring their intet intention of boarding the rebel lion, or rather ghost spy or whqtever it may be, and with their n knapsackes once again strapped to their backs, they mounted their horses and set off at a brisk pace.At last Gertrude and her boy companion reached the s mit of a snow covered hill, and deep down beneath them near the river they saw spread out for some considerable distance, a thickly wooded valley, all dark and mysterious in t he uncertain twilight, and only white patches where snow m lay being visible.As they l slowly descended into it they became impressed with the strange funeral like silence that greeted them on all sides.And here the air felt colder and stiffer.And the dale was in fact so deeply situated that even the wind which for the last half hour or so had been blowing with great force along the surface of the hill making the two travlers feel colder, was scarcely to be felt here.However there was an occasional fitful blast which could be heard amongthe most lofty trees tops, while the thick black branches and the leaves or pine needles of the popular trees gave out a curious husky crackling.Otherwise all was wonderfully, and most absolutely still.The little girl heroine and her companion Penrod were now so impressed that neither of them spoke untill they had arvied at the bottom of the decline and were standing now in almost erebus stygian darkness admis s amidst the shadows of the ever-green foliage on either side of t hem.Penrod was the first to break the silence.

"This is must this is what they must call the coombe."he said."Pretty cheerful place is it not Gertrude.?"

"It is that not."Gertrude replied looking around her and trying to piecr pierce the gloom."But let us come on."Invote we must get out of here as soon as possible."

They continued on much further untill they came t o a much wider spot, and which were open.Here t here were three roads crossing each other.And here the shadows lay very thick indeed---so thick indeed that they had to curb their pace and proceeded very slowly, le lest they should take the wrong route and unintentiona,ly go t ward the enemy's liner.It was while they were thus engaged, straining their eyes and peeping aron aro nd them around them most apprehensic appre he nsively, that they became impressed with the utmost certainity of some strange object moving slowly ahead of t hem through the n uncertain gloom.At such an hour for it was now gee b getting late, and And in such a dreary place, and on such a cold and windy night this was indeed calculated to challenge attention, and Penrod and Gertrude Angoline found themselves ga ing at the object with an intensity that had in it something not very far removed from great fear and suspicion.By and by they were able t o see it much more clearly, and they perciesed it was a very tall figure, apparently a man walking at an even pace, but with immensely long strides.

He was going s in the same direction as t hey were and was only a few feet or less in front of them, but to their astonishment that altough they accelarated their pace with the idea of overtaking him with the purpose to demand who he was and what he wanted, they did not approach the least degree nearer to him. And yet without seeming to increase his speed, he yet maintained the same distance away from them. T hey had now struck off along a road they believed to be the right one, and were walking as fast as t hey could to keep warm as it was terribly cold indeed. The figure preceding them however was seemingly in no way aware of their proximity for without once turning its head toward them with the same measured stride, it steadily advanced. At lengt h Penrod himself more perhaps to relieve his feelings than anything else called out as loudly as he could;

"Hello there you. Who are you, and what do you want here."?

They were more surprised to recieve no response. The figure did not evince by any gesture the sli htest consciousness that it had heard, but continued pacing on at the same rate and at the same distance. The two great friends now suddenly realised that their sense of hearing which the strangely emphasized silence of the place had rendered almost ab normally acute was not impressed by any sound of footsteps coming from the figure. They could readily hear their own and its echoes, but the figure seemingly trod with absolute noiselessness.

This came as an unpleasant surprise, and soon they became completelyand most poignantly aware of the advent of the novel and distin ctly uncomfortable feelings. Pride and courage prevented them from admitting this to each other and they were striving to rally their faculaties, and at all events to simulate unconcern when the most unexpected thing of all happened.

The figure abruptly swr swerved off the road, and making for a large wooden gate near Evans headquarters which lo med up in the distance came directly into the bright moonlight of t hat cold winter night.

Both Penrod and Gertrude Angeline at once emitted aninvoluntary cry. Instead of being clothed the figure appeared to them to be entirely nude. And on such a cold night like this with the temperature at fu fourty three below ze sero. And yet to their most greatest surprise its body gleamed a most sinisty grey horrible indeed to look upon. It had as it seemed at that distance very long powerful arms like the strongest sampson in the world and also powerfully built legs, and a peculiarly small and rotund head, and when it suddenly turned around and looked at the two little travelers it revealed as it appeared to them a startling and strange countenance.

The features were more or less human but the expression in its big deep sunken light gray eyes, did not appear to be human at all. Instead it was like that of some floating, baleful demon from the pit of perdition. Indeed so frightful was it, so indescribably exultant and devilish that Gertrude Angeline and Penrod shra shrank baal appa shrank back appalled, and too petrified with fear to utter a sound or even move a step. Fortunately however whatever the figure was it did not evince any inclination to dally or move forward toward them. It only moved onward still with the same peculiary lengthy and measures measured stride it advanced up the drive, eventually disappearing from view around a rather abrupt curve. A few seconds later there was a faint sound in the direction it had taken resembling the cry of a human being in a rage or in defiance, and a moment or so later still from the same direction there was a repetition of the no se but much more prolonged and bearing with it a tone of suffering quite beyond the ability of any amount of words to describe. There was another long pause, and then apparently nearer a yell or screech of the most piercing intentist y the animal element in it seeming to strive for mastery with the human, and its final echoes had scarcely died away before the whole coombe and other points and also Evans's headquarters and the whole christian camp in this location became suddenly alive with appalling sounds, with moanings, pa plaintive and yet horribly meanacing, and with loud whoopings interluded with harsh discordant cries, and queer hollow sounding longreverberating laughter and bla blasphemies.

This went on for fully three minutes. It then quite suddenly ceased and was succeeded by a silence unbroken save for the gentle rustling of the evergreen foliage and the sad melancholy sighing and soughing of the cold night breeze.

Gertrude Angeline and Penrod waited for a few minutes untill in fact they could sufficiently pull themselves together, and then recovering themselves took up the nerve to cont n continue their tramp out in the direction where the strange creature had gone. They had decided at any risk to find out all they could about this coombe and this mysterious creature. going toward Evans Headquarters. not very far from where it had turned in at the gate they succeeded but not without some difficulty in discovering one or two night guards who were v very willing to be communicative on the subject as to the sounds they just heard that night.

"Yes" one of the guardsnow off duty remarked to Gertrude "This place had some mysterious person here alright and it seems as if either he is some strange spy we cannot capture or discover or that Evans's headquarters is haunted. I have had one or two experiences myself. Listen and I will tell you something;

It was a terrible looking face. A very horrible ghostly looking face with [illegible] gleaming eyes full of hatred, and it was [illegible] of the high [illegible]

A "About two days ago I came through this coombe with my regiment of comrades and in the very early hours of the evening. The darkness had just only started in fact, and the roads in places was becoming very dark. Well when I was pretty near opposite the large wooden gate entering Evans yards and leading into his headquarters as we call it, my horse which was a mare suddenly shied and I discovered sitting by the roadway despite the cold night and propped up against the elm of a elm tree a tall uncouth figure. In the uncertain light I thought it was a man or woman or some [illegible] who was either haf i having a nap or ill. I called out to him, and as he did not give me any reply, I called again and was about to dismount to see what was the matter with him, when he suddenly and with the most amazing agility sprang to his feet. I then got a fearful shock. It did not appear to be no man at all but the grim and ghastly caricature of one.

It appeared to me to be gigantic ten or fifteen feet in height it seemed. It was also completely nude its skin being seemingly a glistening uniform gray, and its face like that of some ugly monkey, a head however that had something frightfully lurid and evil in its big round eyes. I had no time however to observe more because my horse bolted, but when I finally reined it in by desperate efforts and looked around, I again saw the thing whatever it was cross the road with enormous bounds and disappear through the gateway leading to general Jack Evan's headquarters."

Here the soldier paused for a moment and then the boy and girl decided to go on again. They were now walking through the yards of the building when they thought they heard footsteps behind them. They turned and were surprised and horrified to see the same great grey shape whosecunsarthly long arms seemed to trail along the ground. This time it was following them. To them it seemed to be of an unearthly height too. It's head of which they had a pain view now seemed to their terrified senses to tower up into the trees, and that head was that of a grinning fiend. Terridied beyond comprehension the boy and girl began to run blessing themselves at the same time but the thing covered at one stride ten times the ground they did. C o closer and closer it came, that terrible gigantic gray shape that persued the flesing children.

And suddenly as it seemed a most soft and incredibly repugnant something like a cloudy formation enveloped the scene at that moment, t here was a terrific shriek and the creature turned a bend in the road and was gone. The two children cry crying with horror ran on toward the building. The thing what ever it was did not persue them any further.

When they reached the building and were greeted by the vivian girls they told them inbgasping words of their horrible experience. Violet and her sisters then looked strange themselves and Gertrude recovering herself inquired of them of what it may have been. They could not tell but they all decided to summon up their courage and see if they could not discover this time. Therefore asking egery one to leave the building, Evans and the boy and the eight little girls having assured themselves for real facts that there was no one hiding any where in the house or basement they looked for a spot to commence their daring vigil and finally selected the room Evans believed from the description given to him by soldiers was supposed to be the chamber where it was last seen to come from. It was situated at one end of a long wide corridor, and the other a powder chest or closet. It was indeed an oddly constructed apartment forvacross the middle of it were a row of pillars, and on the wall between each of them hung a very grotesque looking pieces of tapestry.

Violet and her sisters, Evans, and the other two arranged themselves thus, they sat on the floor in a row right across the room, Evans facing the corridor, Gertrude Angeline and Penrod facing the pat estry, and the others facing the entrances into the building and that of the powder chest or closet. It was quarter to s nine by violet's wrist watch when they commenced their watch and now they sat in absolute darkness. At first every now and then they fancied they heard strange footsteps and a strange voice soft and most surreptitious tip toeing up and down the corridor, and once they actual y seemed to be in the room, but after a while these sounds actually died away, and there was nothing but silence, unbroken save for the occasional rattlings of doorws doors doors and windows as it was windy and cold outside. One by one unable to do anything else the quartette fell asleep to be awakened by hearing some booming or whistling signal outside. Evans at last rose t o his feet.

"Look here he said "Look here" he said. "It is getting on toward late night. Nothing will happen now while we are watching I guess and I and other generals have to be at"——when he suddenly changed his tones and with a wild cry of "Oh My god, there is is" he staggered back against the walll.

The others looked, and in the dim uncertain light of some camp fire hat struggled to get in through the window they saw standing erect between two high pillars a luminous something. Nothing more at first. By and by however while they were all gazing at it open mouthed in wonder and excitement, it suddenly became hediously and an alarmlyingly vivid and they indeed saw an immense form, streaked so it seemed to them a lurid black and gray. Violet and her sisters happened to glance at its face and they said afterwards that it was like the face of some hedious corpse only a corpse that was half way near the skeleton s stage the skin or what appeared to be skin being drawn tightly over the bones and the mouth devoid of flesh and grinning horribly. The impression it gave the little girls was that it was intensely hostile. Gertrude Angeline and Fenrod contented themselves with peering at the body only, they did not dare raise their eyes to the head.

They stared at it for some minutes untill in fact it gave a kind of growling moan quite plaintive and yet threatening and then began to approach them. Violet then gave way to panic and shrieked out "Strike out a light for us some one". Evans quickly lit a candle and the thing vans vanished behind the tapestry. The quartette did not stay long to talk the matter over. They made for the corridor immediately and hurriedly left the house to call the soldiers. Just as they did a stranger suddenly came in sight and accosted them. He immediately told them that that very hour they were in the house he had seen something f come from a big tent near a oak tree.

"It came from that tent, and then went back there again." he said pointing to a tent standing by a tall isolated tree close beside the river banks. I "you watch that tent carefully and closely."

He did not say anything more and they all approached the tent near the big t ree. It s was still a clear night but some clouds were appearing in the sky, and as they all approached the tent with the purpose to surround it, a small cloud obscured the moon and threw into blackest relief a long queer looking shadow near the tent but just now under the broad silgularly looking branch of the tree. Violet and her sisters and the others with drawn guns leaned forward and peered fearfully at it, andcas they did so the shadow seemed to creep nearer and nearer to the tent, untill it suddenly seemed to amalgamate with it. The next instant to their surprise the tent and tree trunk became horribly lurid and livid, and they all once again saw the black and grey form they had seen standing erect on the floor of the chamber of the building, and which had persued Gertrude Angeline and Fenrod. They all now however got the impression of something indescribably foul and something detestably bad and most wicked, most rottenly wicked and ugly, and yeilding to a wild desire to capture it at all costs and see what it was they all rushed tward it and the tent. There was a sound of something l fleeing like the wind but nothing in sight. he fired volleys of pistols in the direction of the fleeing thing and with no results. They then investigated the tent. Nothing was in it. Extra guards were put on t hat night. They feared it was either some insane man disguising himself most horribly, or a spy trying some very foul and dirty tricks to get some thing important he was after.

Despite the regidness of the seige and the extreme watchfulness of the christian sentires, all of the christian camps especially the main officers barracks, houses, and tents and also headquarters teems with all kinds of secret and cat desperate spies. These innumerable manifestations go on just the same no matter what is attempted or happens among these mysteriously bhidden spies who are st ill taking plafe with their strange manifestat ions in generals Evans headquarters t hey are liley to still continie to take place, for spies are not easily laid to conquer ot or capture, and yet few are more interesting in the descriptions of an occurance or more harrowing than the percidal experiences of many already known and to n be known in general Evans headquarters. His house had been always full of strange history. General Allent on of t he christian side during t he battle of Delight's junction was killed and laid to rest in the yards of the building and accordingbto rumor some clandelinian spies are striving to find his remains for some reason or other. But generalv Jacks Evans house is the main headquarters that demands the most particular attention from others and generals and t he like. he moment one crosses its hurseshold and sniffs the cold atmosphere, one smells Age hoary venerable sage extending back probably century upon century und something else besides, the secret hiding places for all kinds of dangerous spies. It looks smells and is terribly in possession of secret spies some time after the recent experience of Gertrude Angeline and her friend oFenrod, General Vivian and his own officers had been visiting Evans on some errand sent by Emperor Hanson vivian, and they had been on the top of the building looking around. General vivian was sceptic reg rding to spies of these kinds and had more over no idea that this house was allegied to be haunted by these secret spies. however the full revelation came that one evening. The general's aids-decamp and some others were out and he was left alone wit h his officers and ot her generals, and at this time violet and her sisters having been out scouting during the day time were in bed. Some some t ime the general and his officers remained on the t op floor engaged in earnest conversat ion and the n when it grew too dark for him or his assistance to see, they decided to group themselves closer to the window and instead of lighting up did as they planned, and some of themstood looking out of the window. The weather outside had suddenly changed, and although it had been cold and yet clear outside all day a blizzard of severe proporations had now set in which account for the o company street in this location being so empty. And general vivian q ite missed the presence of the beautiful vivian girls whom he loved so well as if they were his own daughters, and by the by the stillness in the company street and s the stillness of the house particularly got on his nerves and also on those f his officers. there was not a single sound, not even the creaking of a board or the friendly nibbling of a mouse behind the wainscoting, all was absol utely hushed and still, even outside. Presently however they heard one of the vivian girls give a loud scream or cry, and then there was the sound of a shot and general vivian wondering what was thematter, got up and followed by some of h his officers went out onto t he landing. The shadows of the winter evening lay thick upon the panelled walls and boards, and in the waning light they saw saw what appeared to be the figure of some elderly woman turning the bend of the broad flight of stairs leading to the lower story. Thinking it was some refugee who came into the house to shelter hmself from t he storm, he returned to the room where they had left the other officers, and had resumed his position at the window, when t he vivian Girls yelled again and there was the sound of two shots and some more shouts, and this time there had been real terror in their cry. much alarmed by this time all of the officers ran upstairs like a crowd, and on entering their room all at once as the door was large, found the vivian girls st sitt ing up in bed, shaking all over, and yet not weeping though they lookedfrightened enough. Three of them by the appearance had just discharged tgeir pistols.

"hy, Violet and your sisters, what in the world is the matter with you." General vivian inquired and he took Jennie in he his arms.

"There was a terrible creature in here." she gaspedout between her sobs and then her agnition gradually sobbing, she and her sisters explained to her a t he generals that a strange looking woman or something like a ghost with a most terrible face had come into the room, and scowled savagely at them and moved tward their beds with terrible fury in her actions. Had general vivian not seen the figure on the stairsas they wou he would have believed that the fright of the vivian girls would have simply been a nightmare and nothing else, as it was however he and all the generals were mystified and wondered who it could have possibly been. The only person likely to be in the building at that hour was the main who attended to the wants of the vivian girls and she would scarcely ah have presumed to come up into their quarters uninvited and depart in such a fashion. Besides violet and her sisters and even general vivian knew the main by sight, and she certainly was not ugly on the contrary she was gentle holy and a beautiful looking woman, the last person in the world to frighten even the most cowardly children. and in no way were t he vivian girls cowardly. Pacifying violet and her sisters as best as they could, general vivian and his generals now left the room, placing two unfer officers to guard it under under orders to k shoot to kill on sight, and general vivian who was in t he lead was about to descend the stairs, when he saw what appeared to be the same woman again goi g down the stairs in front of him.

"Miss Margret Angeline" he called out "Is that you?"

The woman who ever she was made to reply however untill she reached the bottom of the stairs and stood on the landing. She then turned around very slowly and looked up. General vivian who was peering over the banisters now perceived that the woman was not the main maid at all but a perfect stranger and a most unprepossessing one too. sh He was in fact gazing into the leering face of what appeared to be an old h hag wearing an old fashioned mob da cap with a goffered border.

As general vivian stared at her in astonishment and amazement the bleared eyes of the hedious crone glittered balefully, and general vivian then noticed that a queer grewsome kind of light seemd to emanate fr m all over her. While he was still looking at her too overcome with horror and surprise to even articulate a sound the old hag raised a stout fist which she shook in a threatening manner at general vivian and his officers, and then ran swiftly down the next flight of stairs. General vivian anxious to see where she went advanced a few steps and again peered timidly over the n banisters but though the sound of footste ps was still to be heard ov echoeing and rechoeing through t he great building, general vivian and even his officers to their amazement could see no one. when he had summoned up courage he again called out

"Miss Angeline, Miss Angeline. Come here a moment I want to see you."

His only response however was a loud chuckling laugh, after which there was a most intense and ominous silence.

At a few minutes later general Hanson Vivian himself made his appearance; and a number of soldiers were summoned and a throughout search of all parts of the building was made, but with no result, and general Vivian and his officers on being questioned by the Emperor who came on being notified o declared they had seen no one either in the house or outside of it, answering in the least degree to one of the Vivians girls description of the wicked and malevolent looking old woman except her flight down the stairs. General Hanson Vivian and some of his followers laughed, but Emperor Vivian looked serious and alarmed. Hanson Vivian declared his dear brother must have been dreaming and jokingly announced his intentions of cornering the old woman should she ever take in into her it into her head to pay him a vist visit. Several hours now passed unevaptfully. Then a most surprising thing happened, and it was Emperor Hanson Vivian this time who had the experience. General Vivian and Violet and her sisters were asleep , and Emperor Vivian was quite alone in his room and prepared to go to bed. He had spent a very strenious day out scouting in the intense cold, and feeling unusually tired for the consequence he retired to be bed somewhat earlier than he ever did since the war broke out, and fell asleep as soon as his head touched the pillow. He awoke suddenly and with a feeling that he was no longer alone in the room. He always slept with his window wide open no matter how cold it may be outside, and from the fact that he could hear no sound of traffic without, not even the occasional call of a sentry, he judged it was very late. Propping himself up on his elbow he glanced somewhat apprehensively around. To his intense relief however he saw that no one was in t he room. The beams of light from an immense camp fire not far from the house was pouring through the open window in a broad yellow stream but beyond the furniture every piece of which was outlined with extraordinary extinctness, and the black flickering shadow shadows on the walls and ceilings he could see nothing, nothing that would in any way account for that singus singular sensation that he was no longer by himself.

At last making up his mind that it was pure imagination he was about to lie down again and try to go to sleep, when apparently from the direction of a door in the wall in the big fireplace, came a very loud knock made so it seemed with bare knuckings on the panelling. Emperor Hanson Vivians was by no means a fearsome or nervious man. He had as already described served with the greatest distinction in this great war and he was generally regarded as a man of consummate man of great coolness and reckless daring. Yet that loud knock made his heart give a wild sickly throb, and he could feel the terror that shone out of his eyes as they wandered involuntarily across the floor and finally fixed themselves on the light kissed panels of the oak door. He was still staring at the door unable to divert his attent ion, when there came a second knock, and then after a slight pause a third, louder if anything and more deliberate than either of the foregoing.

There was then a most emphat ic silence.

"If there is anyt hing or any one secreting himself in that doorway" h the emperor argued with himself "Why on earth does he do that, unless of course he is mad."

Fighting down the strong feeling of eeriness that was fast gaining the mastery over him, and threatening each moment to render him t ied to his bed limb by limb, he sat up in bed and was in the act of advancing t ward the door, when the handle or doorknob gave a sudden click, and turn, and then very slowly t he door began to open.

The emperor sank back on his pillow, his heart trobbing wildly and the cold perspir ti n breaking out all over him. He could not have stirred anothe inch or had moved a hand or foot , had the fate of his nation or the Vivian girls as well as his own life, depended on it. He was indeed protemperate at all events paralyzed. With his eyes almost starting from his head he now found himself compelled to watch the door gradually and slowly open. Little by little, inch by inch the opening windend untill at lenrt h the illumination from the camp fire outside pouring through the aperture fell on something that glistened horribly. They were horrible eyes, pale lurid eyes that lighted up with an expression of the most fiendish malignancy as they met the gaze of the almost petrified Emperor of Abbissennia. He had not time to notice more before the door swung back all its length or to its full extent and he saw as it appeared apparently float ing in midair a most illuminated a head that had a faint incandescent glow that seemed to emanate from all over it. Saving for the eyes which glowed with absolute hellish hate, the rest of the face to all appearance may have been corpse like.

It might as well have belonged to some one who had just died, to some who no doubt who as the state of the neck strongly showed had none too tenderly been decapitated. The hideous ironhead was load low and receding, the ears project ing and oric crinkled, the mouth hideously course and savage and furnished with black tusks like teet h. It was indeed a most irredeemingly ugly and most brutal face, and the shortness of the hair and the massiveness of the jaw toget her with its appearance as a whole showed that it may may belong to the very lowest kind of wicked criminals. For some minutes it remained quite stationary, and then with a sudden jer jerk moved at a steady and fairly rapid rate out of the open doorway. This was the climax. The spell that had hitherto held Emperor Hanson Vivian riveted to the bed was absolutely broken, and with a howl of terror he threw all dignity to the winds, and after firing some shots at it, fled panic stricken from the room. The rest of the night he spent in a near by tent, and decided the very next day to have the place investigated if he had to have it burned down. That same night while he had this experience Violet and her sisters saw nothing further but complained of very u queer noises. They declared t hat they heard footsteps t stempiding stamping up and down the cat stairs at all hours of the day and night , sounds like a scuffle in one of the rooms on the top of the landing, and tremendous thumps and bangs on t he doors. They stayed in their beds however and did not appear to have been worried no further or to have let the matter trouble them much more as they felt sure of becoming used to it.

Even the next day day while re si remaining home and playing a game, they again heard unaccountable no ses but so no one and nothing. However another of their experiences began anew t he very time they again tretired for the night. They, this time to make themselves feel more safer occupied the room Emperor Hanson Vivian had slept in, the room with t he dark grim looking doorway in the wall.

Going to bed at an earlier hour than usual they were soon dast asleep. However they awoke simultaneously to hear one of the near by sentries yell his password and almost immediately afterwards there was a sound like a heavy sigh so near Violet's bed that Violet said at once;

"Is that you Jennie dead dear." to which she replied; "No but I heard the noise too. There must be someone in the room."

Violet at once struck a light, and getting out of bed looked everywhere. The door was locked and securely fastened on the inside as she remembered leaving it and although she peeped under the bed and throughoutly searched the doorway of the wall w ich land out into a small hallway she saw no one.

"It must be our imagination." she said b blowing out the light and getting back into bed "Or else the wind." "but as the acoustic pe properties in old houses are often queer, and as we have had queer experiences we had better be on our guard to night. AA"

Jennie or her sit sisters said nothing. They tried to think no more about it and go to sleep. Presently they heard the loud creaking of a board, so loudly that all of the little girls felt impelled to sit up in bed and look, and their eyes travelled to the door in the wall, and noticed to their evident surprise that the door was wide open.

"I'm positively certain that I shut it and locked it" violet said to herself "the key could not have caught the bolt I supose."

She and her sisters then lay down again and tried to go to slee slop sleep but the thought of the wide open door so worried g them, that at last they begged Joice to shut it, and she got out of bed and carefully shutting it, tested it several times to see whether it was properly locked. Convinced that it really was locked this time, she got back into bed, and as before tried her hardest to go to sleep. After a while she and her sisters began to doze off, and would no doubt have soon been in a sound slumber had not another loud creak very abruptly awakend them. Obeying an irrestible impulse they all again immediately sat up in bed and glanced in the direction of that second door. To their unmitigated astonishment the door was once again wide open. Utterly mystified and not a little startled Joice herself got out of bed and now not only locked the door but placed a arm chair right up against it, and in so doing created such a disturbance that some of the soldiers came in to investage the cause of the no se noise. To pacify them the Vivian girls told the man what had ha; happened, and they at their suggestion came into the room sat in a corner and watched.

For some minutes nothing occured, and then in the midst of a most tense and thrilling silence, there was an again a most loud creak, and the watchers to their utmost and infinite amazement saw the door slowly open and the big arm chair placed against it m commenced moving inch by inch across the hard polished boards. while they were still staring too fascinated to remove their utmost gaze they at length saw through the gradually q wider widening ope aperture the lun lumin ious outlines of some large oddly d shaped sinister looking object which by degrees they made out to be some great gray and black shape.

As soon as the opening was wide enough it came out and moving slowly over the white moonlit floor rushed pass the beds so near to Violt herself that she could have almost touched it with her hands. It was the same horrid shape that had terrified Gertrude Angeline and Penrod, and Violet and her sisters too. nd And then as they all sat up listening, listening frantically they heard a succession of hollow long reverbrating sounds of laughter that gradually grew fainter and fainter untill they ended into one shrill almost uncanny screech or demonish yell, after when everything was once again still.

While all this had been taking place, Violet and her sisters and the three soldier soldiers had not uttered one single word. They simply sat bolt upright too overcome with horror and astonishment to speak or move but as soon as it was all over and the atmosphere had become normal again, Violet remarked;

"I think it is advisable for us all to leave here for good to morrow."

But Jolce answered; "No we'll see this through to the finish at all costs."

Violet and her sisters however on the morrow were not at all content to let the matter rest. They felt there must be some evident explanation of the extraordinary manifestations they and others had witnessed, and believing sure it were not from spooks and ghosts and they believed not in them, they themselves set to work with all their girl and boy scouts and some great investigators to find out all they could with regard to the history of the house and the cause of the remarkable occurances.

They were not as yet successful but eventually they came in contact with a very old soldier who had lived in this region all his life who remembered a rumor to the fact that the old house may be haunted all right and no mistake at that, of or that the place may be secretly be infested by murderous and rascally kind of Glandolinian vandals playing ghosts to secure their intentions intentions or in obtaining something they were after to make their appearance in this fashion to prevent any evidence against themselves for what they did. Yet no matter how the building was investigated nothing could ever be found, the building seemed to have no or secret rooms or secret panels in the walls , but as the s those occurances continued it was believed that spies only were responsible for these strange manifestations and not ghosts. Here then was probably an explanation which if true would leave no reasonable doubt as to the meaning of the terrible manifestations. The wicked olf spies, doing their work more in the dark, having stolen something important, must have made a duplicate so that the loss would not be discovered. Needless to say many believed it was a spy in disguise who appeared like the ghost of some old hag that appeared to Violet and her sisters first, and to them general Vivian , and the obtuse looking floating head may have been some other trick of t he same spy who for some obvious reasons was playing his game well and most clever cleverly as well as in a most uncanny way. As to the strange evident phenomen phenonemon of the great gray shape seen three times now by Violet and her sisters one can only surmise that it was a stage accessory deemed necessary by the action of the spy to bring home to mind of the spectators the true cause of the disturbances and all they purported to illustrate. However be this as it may and whether the reader accept the foregoing theory as a solution or not, the strange manesfes manifestations still continued, and the rooms on the top filor for a time now were never occupied by any generals or officers. They were now as we believe vacant for good.

In the meantime at general Evans headquarters was a general whose name was Nat han gowler. Now this general had many generals or relatives and among them was his cousin, and to his sorrow all of these had joined the wicked Glandolinian cause at t he moment the great war began. On account of this and unfort unately too there was a most bitter animosity, his mutual dislike of his relatives for serving t he Glandolinian armies was well known, and the misfortune grieved no n one more than his father, who was fon d fond of them all. His father had often planned how he could bring them over to the other side and have them fight for the just cause, and effect a reconcillintion between them and their cousin, and at last one day he went into the enemy's lines in secret to make a most bold attempt at it. Without giving any of the d cousins a hint as to what was in his mind he disguised himself as some Glandolinian general, and invited them to come to his headquarters and dine with y im. Neither suspecting of course that it was their enemy who had invited them they all appeared, and for a short time the worthy father of the cousin who served in the christian army had a most anxious t ime of it. In the end however he managed to pacify them and before they left his presence the hatchet was apparently buried and he and they seemed to be on the best of terms and they promised to turn over to the christian side as soon as they saw the opport unity to do so. A few days later the general invited his son to go out on a scouting tour and the two accompanied by a number of their body guards went off toget her to the wooded country around the region of Delight's junction. Scouting about hour after hour through the sunny glades and the shadowy dell of the woods the two son and f father r suddenly found themselves side by side in a small clearing not far from the first section of the enemy's camp.

"Hush" his father whispered t ouching his son lightly on the arm "now you see that fringe of Glandolinian snowspents ove r there. Prove your prowess by going as near as you dare."

He was just about t o ride forward and his father was at once leveling his pistol to take aim at something he saw in the nearest bushes a dozen or so yards h ahead of them when suddenly and without the slightest warning there was the crack of an unseen rifle and a bullet struck the father in the breast. His father however was only wounded having at that time under his shirt for protection on scouting tours a coat of some kind of mail, probably

It was a terrible looking face. A very horrible ghastly looking face with b... sunken gleaming eyes full of hatred, and it was peering at him fr... of the high pillars something like ringed mail so consequently the bu llet only penetrated a little and only caused a slight flesh wound. Roused to a fury by this abominable act of treachery on the part of a Glandolinian sniper, his son at once drew his sabre. He rushed for those bushes and the hidden marksman before he could fire another shot fell mortally wounded. Before dying he cursed at the Angolinian officer telling him that he would never enjoy a moments peace again and that his comrades with scour the world for him, and the Angolinian officer knowing who the rebel was he had killed realized that if this made the matter public among the Glandolinian armies would mean the beginning of a massacre of all christian prisoners in t he hands of the enemy. Yet to keep keep it dark was something out of the question. In a land where all men like his kind were deemed extremely valiant he was rightly regarded as being a great christian warrior indeed a most perfect gentlemen and all great Angolinian warriors and gentlemen hated to do anything that in any degree was under hand and cowardly. It was indeed a dilemma. It was solved however by his father who perceiving the danger in which his son stood at once suggested hiding the body in the large hollow trunk of a great pine tree that stood near by general Evans headquarters since the strange manesfestations had occured in this building and its yards this great tree to every one there seemed to have a very sinister appearance. It was not only all black and accursed where it had once been struck by an incendiary bombshell but its wide spreading, knotted and gnarled branches bore indeed a most peculiar resemblance to the mal shaped arms of a human being or more stranger still to that of enormous snakes to boot. It was known and shunned for this reason by many of the guards and even the brave Vivian Girls themselves and other heroines though hih hitherto however there was no substantial grounds for ever associating it with anything pertaining to supernatural means. Yielding to the persau persuasions of his father the young soldier caught hold of the bleeding corp corpse of the Glandolinian sniper put it on their horses and rode back to the christian lines until they reached the region of the t rees and then between between them they both carried it to the pine and dropped it into the hollow.

On the morrow as the rebel sniper had not yet returned to his camp a great search was made for him by t he Glandolinians. All the regions outside t he christian lines was completely secured, but odd to relate although every place, small caves, bushes and ditches and all parts of the wooded country were examined no one thought of making the attempt ot of entering the christian lines to look into the hollow of the very notorious pine tree. Some thought the soldier may have fallen down some deep well, i or into some obscure pit, or caught in quicksand hidden under the deep snow, others that he had been drowned while attempting to cross the treacherious gunboom Creek or while attempting to ford the swift and treacherious river of Norma n Run, others again that he may have been seized and carried off by a band of marauding Angolinian or Abyssinkilian soldiers.

Sometime passed and his fate became one of those mysteries that even the whole christian army loved to discuss. In the meanwhile strange stories about general Evans headquarters and its surrounding yards got afloat and soon was close to Evans headquarters is a small mound of earth and more than one guard crossing it on pacing back and forth while on duty after dusk or early in the morning testified at seeing a large shadowy form standing by the way side, his horrible almost corpse like face scowling. Its description was not unlike that of which Gertrude Angeline and Penrod had seen. One of the guards decla declared that he was persued for nearly a mile by the strange and und uncouth figure while which followed him most persistent ly through the thickest and toughest briars, brushwood, and frozen water only leaving him when he came within sight of some Army Catholic Church.

Whatever kind it was the phenonema which it may or not have been was encountered too near th too near the building. One stalwart Angolinian officer while returning for a inte rview with some generals stated that when he neared the gate of general Evans headquarters he saw what he believed to be pale lights of some nasty bluishgreen hue flitting in and out from among a thick maze of bushes and near a great oak t ree by the nearest tent. Thinking t hey must be what it is called by Whes Welsh people a Canhwyllan Cyrth or what in Whale wa Wales are always known as corpse Candles or what is said to be spirits in the shape of candle flames that always were known to appear before people before the death of some relative, he stood spill r oted to tye ground, with fear and horror, and stared open mouthed at them. Then quite suddenly to his evident surprise they came together, taking at first what appeared to be a huge flame of the same color, and almost immediately saw afterwards that of some shape gray and sinister, gigantic and shadowy. The officer could not help being terrified as brave as he was supposed to be for he recognised in the shape that towered above him the features and figure that he had heard described by either Gertrude Angeline, Penrod or Violet and her sisters and also Evans.

The expression on the apparent apparitons face was most dreadful to see, the eyebrows scowledcmost diabolically, and thewhorrid mouth was cont racted int o a most savage snarl, while the eyes blazed with a terrific hate, a hate that the wretched officer felt could only owe its origin to the infernal regions.Raising one monstrous hand the figure was in the act of striking the officer, when the latter suddenly and instinctively crossed himself and at the same time mutters a loud prayer.The moment he did this the whole expression and even attitude of the figure changed.Fear and dread, t ha a dread that was most terrible and frightful for any one to see seemed to sweep through it, and turning on its heels with a gesture of despair it swiftly glided away.As it swiftly went winding its way in and out among the t rees that stood scattered in all directions a dull and most melancholy wind rose suddenly, and tossing the branches of the naked trees against the now starless sky for it was cloudy and snowing flew after it like one l ost soul following swift ly after another.A winter night owl hooted most dismally and a hare screamed and the officer now at length having recovered his faculties slunk fearfully home to hisown headquarters.Again a that same night violet and her sisters witnessed the same strange phenomena.Twice that early night while playing a game by the windows of their headquarters on the ground flour they twice saw the tall almost spectral figure in the grounds of Evans headquart ers through never once again so far did it actually enter the house again.Once however while they were still sitting playing a most interesting part of the game they saw a horrid face appear at one of the windows and look at them most angrily, untill they prayed or uttered some pious exclamation, when it at once became sorrowful, and withdrew with a groan or sigh.Later that night when they looked out of their windows to see how much it was snowing they saw it peering up at the house from among the nearest trees and perhaps wringing its hands and going through what appeared to be all the antics and gestivul tions of sassiest soul or some creature who had lost its reasons.Indeed the vivian girls really bec began to feel queer, for now they began to actually believe it was some spectre, and indeed the idea conveyed to them both by its appearance that it was damned, damned, and laboring under some dreadful curse .

But as many believed it was the actual oak tree by the lonely solitary tree close to the building that appeared to be the worse haunted.No horse of any kind ver passed it, either in the day time or at night without shying, while as they said all kinds of strange phenon Phenomena w re were seen and heard in its immediately vicinity.They said that many times they had seen and watched strange uncanny lights hovering in its branches and trunk, while at others they heard awful moans and groans, and terrible sounds as of the cry of lost souls to proceedd from it.Once a party of officers retuning late at night from a scouting tour happened to pass the tree and Evans headquarters on their way to their own headquarters and were terrified to have heard as they said a cry of some voice shrieking out, apparently from its trunk;

"All Glendelinin is cursed, I'm cursed, and so are ye all."

Knowing the Strange oak tree and the tent also and hearing so much of their evil reputation only too well, no one hardly dared to daily to investigate the seeming phenomena, but fled panic stricken.

One of the most extraordinary stories her told by soldiersconcerned as they declared the terrible evil power of the oak tree near that tent to kill or main all those who strayed into its grasp, day or night.It was declared scores of soldiers, and women and children refugees, girls and boys, and even animals, such as horses, and dogs and cats and cows had been found dead at its base with terrible marks around their throats as though they had been strangled.

But in the story refr referred to it was not never believed untill one night Angelini a Aronburg herself after her recent experiences with the gray shape became an eye witness of what she actually alleged to have occured..she and another girl companion much younger than herself were just returning from outside the christian camps, and ne reaching the yards of Evans headquarters were suddenly overtaken by darkness.They decided to spend the night inside the tent at the base of this great oak which although they did not at all like its appearance promished the best shelter about, as Evans headquarters was not allowed to be occupied in the night for some time.After preparing their supper inside the tent, they stretched themselves out on the cots and finally went to slee; sleep..owever soon aw after Gertrude Angeline awakened from what she called a dreadful nightmare.she had dreamed that some myster ious creature had torn the tent from them, and that from the trunk of the tree under which the tent had stood and under which they were sleeping long knotted arms most en sinister and queer had begun to slowly drop.And at their ends were much smaller branches, that looked like strange grotesque heads.

It was a terrible looking face.A very horrible ghostly looking facewith bl sunken gleaming eyes full of hatred, and it was glaring at him fro[illegible] one of the high pillars.

[illegible] father [illegible] general [illegible] himself drawing his and indeed these uncanny hands and arms crept slowly and noisslessly down and down tward her, while she ,s lay helpless in terror.just as they were about to touch her, she managed to awaken, and with a loud scream rolled away from the cot, lead l leaped to her feet and fled.She had ran about fourty paces, [illegible] ir [illegible] this terror of what her [illegible] dream dropped gradually from her.She then stopped feeling ashamed, and having the sensation that she may have turned out to be a coward, and feeling shne shamefaced she looked back wondering if she had awakened her girl companione.to her amazement and horror she saw that she appeared to be to her rison that her girl do ompanion was apparently climbing up the trunk of the great oake.She wondered how it could be when she knew she never could climb a tree to save her life.Then as she dared to take a number of steps forward and looked closer she saw that her comrade seemed to be smeshed in branches of all sorts.At this moment the fleeting clouds which had veiled the moon drifted away, leaving it shining in its full splendor.

She then saw that one of the narrowest branches of the tree was actually wound around her companions neck, while stronger branches held her firmly clamped to the bole itself.And in the strong light of the moon it appeared that Gertrude Angeline saw a huge evil, grotesque and most demure face gleam out fro m the top of that trunk, staring with the most malevolent eyes upon the contorted face of the strangling girl.The sight was too much for Gertrude Angeline.she tried to save her companion and fired several shots at the branches which soon brought a number of soldiers to the spot, and there at the base of the horrible tree lay the body of her girl comrade.she had indeed been strangled to death.he neck was brushed bruised and on her body were deep cuts as though great claws had torn her.At this it was believed the tree had indeed some strange sinister reputation and it was at last ordered to be cut down and burned.

[illegible] to make things more interesting however I'll say that to the eyes of many of the best Angelinian and other generals' the [illegible] on the very grounds of general [illegible]van's headquarters did almost look haunted.....As one who is strange there would wander from one room to another oak pannelled and shadow laden, one who was in the belief og ghosts would almost sense the presence of the unknown at every turn, or face it from every hoo nook and corner.but it appeared that nearly every generalsheadquart ers and others were treated the same way.And small wonder indeedgeneral john Manley, his father, and many other wicked Glendelinian generals had alone r probably sent probable vast armies of undesirablespies, vandals and the like, who in their cleverness may be as it was believed acted like phantasms, elementals, and heleish spirits of allkinds. Undoubtedly most of his most daring and most dangerous spies divided their time of work between general Evans headquarters, general Hansons and [illegible]ivians and unquestionly they brought in thrir their wake if successful in their mission morethan one horrid disaster.But just so far here in general Evans lines, his headquarters perhaps the finest and largest in the besieging christian lines resided for shelter from the emeny forces for the time being the brave vivian girls, and sometimes their loving and best friends.Yes indeed in this story there are many generals and other officers as well as royalities who may expect at any time to witness some strange scene almost ghostly whether day or night, and if one can rely o pon the stories every one hears from some of those who had had their own experiences really strange nd most unaccountable things did happen from one time to another.

One dark winters evning , when it was clear however with a bright moon A soldier w o who had been off du ty had been with his comrades in a tent and did not leave the tent till far later than he had originally intended.Indeed it was close on tward midnight when he finally bid goodnight to them and set out on his return journetry to his own tent which was over three company streets awa y.

It was cold but nevertheless it was a beautiful starlit night, and so light that he could see quite a distance away ahead of him and behind him as wee well.

At first while walking quite slowly there was a trifling variee of strange noises that disturbed, such as one so often hears at night time always in the country, but after a while theegradually ceased and then a silence came that was only broe broken by his own footsteps which to his senses sounded unaturally distinct and loud.He walked on and on however without slo so showing the slightest fear, and thinking of nothing at alp when all of a sudden he fancied he heard the sound of other footsteps pattering swiftly along behind him.For some minutes however he did not pay any head to them, and then very graudually they began to force themselves upon his notice, and he found himself soon commenting on their strange measuredness, and something else which baffled his powers of analysis it was altogether most novel and subtile.

At last he was unable to restrain his curiousity any longer, and then peeped around in a apprehensive manner.However the long snowy vista of the company street lined up on either side by long and tall pal v pine trees revealed no one.At first he did not look downward but straight upward and forward, but then just as he was about to continue on his way he chanced to look twqrd the ground and was shocked as well as surprised to see a strange shadow most black and sinister that lay very motionless right in the center of the army's wide thoroughfare..gowever to him it looked like the shadow of some huge man a strangely squat mal shaped man with long very long muscular arms that were extended clutching and long legs, and with what appeared o be a very small head. At first the soldier believed it must be the shadow of some da far distant shadow upontthe lanascape, and therefore he looked around to try and discover the origin of it but he saw nothing visible anywhere xsaving the many tents, barracks, and the tall trees.

Up to this time however he had not in the least dr degree felt any nervousness, but now as he stood there all by himself amidst the intense t stillness of the winters night, and stared at that curiously looking and sinisterashadow that owned its origin to only Heaven knows what he began to feel vague and most horrible sensations.The great shadow looked so hedious, so uncanny and almost so hediously shaped and deformed, and so terribly grotes- que and so beastly and above all so vivid that he could not help fearing it.

Partly for the sake of companionship and partly out of sheer bravado he started whistling a war tune, and turning on his hells continued his walk.he moment he started forward however, the footfals footfalls in his rear reco recommenced.He then swung around again, and again the y ceased, but there, and only a few paces behind behind him and still right in the center ofvthe company street but larger and more vivid lay the same shadow.

wowevervnow it was much closer, and the great black hands seemed to be closing in on him like the claws of some gigantic animal.It was without the slight sat doubt that whatever producedcthe shadow had followed him.In spite of his natural scepticism where things that were supernatural we re always concerned he now felt a terrible fear stealing upon, him, come more and more stronger, and it required no smal effort whatever of stubborn pride on his part to resist the impulse that prompted him to run at the very top of his speed.

Without increasing his speed however, he walked steadily on, and yet always from his rear sounded thesame mysteriously footfalls, soft, and stealthily , and so it seemed to him, murderous indeed.At last to his relief he came to thewide gatef gateway of general Efan Evans headquarters leading into the grounds of the building itself.

''Now ''he said to himself''I shall get rid of the thing whatever it is.''

HeHe passed rapidly through the entrance, closing the gate behind him, and then commenced walking down the broad path leading to the terrace confronting what is known as the bend of the gunbeam Cree keHardly however had he advanced a dozen yards or more before he again was surprised and terrified to hear the same footsteps dogging him, and on swinging sharply round he saw to his greater terror the strange shadow looking if possible even more grotesque and sininter than he ore.And the great hands appeared to be clutching at his very feet.He was now seized with a most frightful panic n indeed, and throwing all pride and respect to the winds he bolted like a deer.Past the long balustrade overlooking the stream he ran at full speed, and down the great broad terrace scattering the snow far and wide, and over and above his own footsteps born to his ears by the night wind which had suddenly got up and was blowing in low mournful ghusts came the sound of those other footfalls, running too, but running lightly,, running stealthily and running ow with an unmistakably unmistakable evil intent.

He at length reached a wide door leading into the building.It was shut but he tore it frantically open, and dashed inside.He then for a full minute stood in the stone corridor shaking like an aspen leaf, his legs seeming to lose all life and barely able to support his body.Finally he managed however to pull himself together, and then approached a wide window looking over the court a courtyards he had just r traversed, and peeped fearfully out, and there portrayed even more vividly on the snow than it had been in the company street lay the large shadow, black clutching, and with the same small he d head, and even as he stared at it in breathless fascination it began to slowly move away, to move as if at last realizing t hat it had failed to harm him.

And he watched it as it gradually retreated, and retreated untill the gloom and shadows of the long gateway and trees opposite eventually swallowed it up.But for sometime afterwards he heard the echoesof its footfalls, soft pattering and even enigmatical and at last they also ceased and there was only the sighing and soughing of the wind, soft, gentle, and pitiful.

Indeed inside general evans headquarters the most famious spot visited by some of the strange manesfestations was the immensecGalley on the top fllor.It is situat ed betweengeneral Evans great Council chamber and the room occupied by Violet and her sisters.Even in the day time whether it is sunshining or dark and stormy the gallery is somewhat gloomy, the sixteen large Gothic windowswith which it is furnished being ill sufficientvfor its immense length.It is fully ne hundred and tg thirty thre yards long.

It was even here where violet and her sisters had one of the closest shaves in their lives as yet and where a dreadful tragedy was almost enacted.

On the afternoon of the day of their last experience with the strange occuranses they had moved from their gloomy room, and running along the immense Gallery to go down the steps for a shorter rout outdid outside, tried to reach the top landing.They got as far as the top step, when they were suddenly and without warning attacked furiously and savagely by six strange horrible objects armed with terrible weapons horrible to behold, and one of the assailants seemed to be the big strange gray shape.They would have been cut down and slaughtered but their struggles, and shooting at point blank but wildly, and their frenzied shrieks for help for help must have reached the- ears of general Evans and some officersxand soldiers below, who came up with a rush, and just in time before the strange creatures brutally laid hold of the vivian girls to murder them.It was a narrw narrow escape indeed, and the scene lasted fully fifteen minutes and tn seconds.At the approach of the general and fifteen soldiers and some other officers all armed to the teeth the strange creatures hurried alongthe long gallery and rushed through the doorwa doorway leading to general Evans shamber.On reaching it some of them, and especial especially the large gray shape halted, turned around, and as the vivian girls beated a hasty retreat the creature gave vent to them ost harrowing and unearthly shrieks and blasphemies and then disappeared with the others.

And all the efforts of the generals and a hundred soldiers faild to locate them.

Mn Many of the soldiers declared that they had frequently heard these shrieks during their stay there while other officers appeared to have expr experienced the same thing.That night twenty of the soldiers armed to the teeth and having their long rifles with bayonets attatched stayed in the same Galley that night waiting and on watching, when they were suddnl suddenly thrilled beyond beyond measure by hearing a door in the big Gallery open and something come tearing over the floor and toward the direction of the rooms in which they sat.Believing sure it may be the strange creatures who had att attacked the vivian girls the soldiers screwed up their courage to look but to their surprise it was only the vivian girls who had been forced to flee from some strange thing suddenly seen in their new room.

''What on earth is the matter ''f one of the soldiers inquired''Have you seen anything again.''?

''It was that big gray shape ''was Jennie'w Jennie's reply.

Yet as it was now getting toward morning, and it seemed pretty futile to remain on the watch any longer the soldiers set off together in a bunch with the intention of reporting to the general.On their way they had to pass through the corridor where the immense pillars with the porteirs are and they had just entered it, when they saw advancing t ward them a tall gray fu figure.At first they were not quite sure what it was but as it drew nearn to them it suddenly gave a fierce and terrible scowl, and the disappeared g ban behind the portiers.The vivian girls had observed this thing too and there was an expression of the most intense fear and anguish in their new white faces that instantly touched the hearts of the soldiers and won their utmost sympathy.Wondering whom the creatures could really be, and what they were trying to do to the vivian girls they moved aside to let them pass and then almostinvoluntarily turned around sinul sumila su simultaneously and gazed silently after them.On and on they went down the corridor looking fearfully to the right and left till they reached the far end of the apartment, when some how or other the y suddenly lost sight of them.They seemed to l glide behind a large piece of tapestry and disappear like spooks themselves.

In themorning all the generals met with Evans and they all decided to try and find out who the mysterious creaturexwere and wherever their hiding places were.

''You say that this morning the vivian girls were dressed all in white''Asked Evans with a curious expression in his eyes.''Well it was certainly none of them for real I believe thoughbfrom your description I would say that whatever those d creatures are they are after more than those beautiful little girls.''

''What do you mean!''asked one of the officers.

''Why gentlemen''said Evans''between you and me only mind this in strict confidence, strange things have happened in this building since I took it for my headquarters, and what y u see are not ghosts as you think or believe, but some clever spies doing their work too cleverly to be caught at it.''

"But why did they in a body that morning attack the Vivian girls so savagely and without warning from ambush in the Gallery." I one of the officers remarked "I did not at first know what had happened when I heard such violent screaming, shots, and the sounds of a desperate struggle."

"It may not have been their purpose to attack them for what they are" Evans said "but for murderous intent. "The Vivian girls you know yourselves are Abbisannian Princesses, and it may have been the express wish of those disguised rascals to murder them to win the war for their cause. He then went on to relate one of his other recent experiences.

"Just only yesterday afternoon" he said "I was looking over a large map in my own chamber. It was at a very quiet period of the day and as I looked up from my work I perceived a solitary individual standing by the open doorway with his back to me gazing intently at the pictures in the gallery and elsewhere as it seemed. Whoever he was he was a very tall and stout man indeed and there was something so quaint and altogether so unusual in his appearance that I could not help letting my work drop and sit still to have a good look at him. While I was thus engaged he suddenly turned round, and I was startled pretty nigh out of my wits. In the strong yet pale countenance with the strongly marked fea features, blond hair and smile the stranger displayed to me I recognized at once Emperor Robert Vivian himself. I should have known him anywhere. He looked at me fixedly however for some minutes, and then scowling fiercely at me which he never did before crossed the room slowly, and and then made for one of the other apartments. I being suspicious by his actions followed him immediately, probably not more than ten paces behind, but though I was quick, he was still quicker, for when I reached the treshold of the inner chamber he was gone. Now that room is large, there is no place for him to hide in it that I can see, and he could not have run across the hard wooden floor without my hearing and seeing him. I was scared I can tell you after that , for I know from what I had seen was without doubt some spy of dangerous character for he dared to impersonate the Emperor himself. I tried all my efforts to locate him but failed."

Yet despite their expriences Violet and her sisters still dared to remain where they were. Yet often in the night they had still been awakened by sounds resembling strange sighs, and even the working of some kind of instrument the like of which they could not tell since the sounds had even been more frequent, and quite recently Angeline hearing them in the day time went to see from whence they proceeded and was indeed considerably frightened at being suddenly confronted again by the gratshape that seemed to her fright ened wits to rise out of the floor, sweep past her without the slightest noise not even the echo of a foot fall and disappear in another room.

Joice Vivian also had an experience.

Emperor Vivian had written to violet asking her and her sisters to send to him a certain note he expected from Evans, and entrated them if possible to send it immediately. Violet recived the letter. She made preparations to comply with their fathers wish and ringing for her boyscout who was in the building, and seeing he did not come promtly she went to her stillopen door to listen if he were coming. Opposite to her was a wide grand staircase and to her horror and amazement up this came again that horrid grayshape but without making any noise, and terrible as he looked he yet appeared solid and not transparent as a spectre would. A singular tremor now seized Violet. She could nither st ir or speak. Slowly and cautiously the strange figure approached her, reached the landing, made a step forward and seemed about to seize her with the intention to tear general or Emperor Vivians letter out or her hand wo when she uttered a shrie shriek that alarmed the whole building. At this the creature stroke her a blow that felled her senseless to the floor, and grasping the letterdisappeared as mysteriously as before.

On recovering Violet reta related minutely what she had seen, her memory especially retaining to the fact it had taken the important letter, but nothing more than the usual uns atisfactory solutions were propounded, nor did it appear that the orr occurance was at all associated with the same gray figure thatvhad persued Gertsude Angeline and Penrod in the yard of the building. In a few days however came another important letter from Emperor Vivian announcing thathe hachad heard of the occurances, and that he was sent sending Emperor or general Darger to the place with a number of his most expert Geminian members to investigate the occurances at all costs.

From this there was added a noteworthy confirmation of the occurance. Evans found his important map gone, but other things were not stolen.

It was a terrible looking face. A very horrible ghostly looking facewith big sunken gleaming eyes full of hatred, and it was peering at him fro[illegible] one of the high pillars.

"[illegible] either a man or a madman!" the general said to himself drawing his

Here indeed are some more incidents relating to general Evans headquarters. It was about two days later after the vivian girls had been attacked by the strange creatures in the buildingwhen general Roswell Buster Johnston hearing of the strange occurance went to have a look at it and have it throughoutly investigated as ordered by ge eral Vivian himself. He was accompanied by some of his high officers and some of the best of his boyscouts, and it was ust about mid day or at about one oclock when they arived there, and during a driving wind and snow storm. After making a complete examinationof the ground floor general Roswell Buster Johnston left the officers and th boy scouts in thehall and quickly ascended the flo-r. In a few mon moments he had arived on the first floor and was about to cross the landing to one of the front rooms when he was surprise to a hear a strange noise like the click of a key and then on turning sharply saw at first the door knob turn and then the door of a room nearest to him begin to open slowly. After it had opened a few inches or more he saw a small childish hand thrust through the aperture, clutch hold ov of it and then hold it stationary. It was without the slightest doubt the hand of some little girl and obviously the owner too may to his idea have or was a child of extreme daintiness and refinement, for the fingers were white and tapering, and the nails almond shaped and highly polished. Roswell Buster Johnston was indeed most surprised and fascinated. He had never in his life seen a hand of such bef beauty before and it he found it quite impossible to remove his gaze from it.

He was just trying to forcehimself to do so however when there was the whiff of some kind of decli delicate perfume and the hand withdrew. The next instant the door closed and without any noise too. General Roswell Buster Johnston supposing the little girl was some one who like himself was look ing over the house for investigation ma and many Gertude Angeline or some one else but for some reason did not wish to be seen thought no more of the matter tillhe had finished his examination of the premises and then seeing nothing of what he had heard about the building rejo t returned to those down below.

He then causally remarked that hechad seen a hand of some beautiful girl there presopresumadly on the same errand as himself unless as it had first stuck him might be the case, she happened to be Angelinia Aronburg using the place as her headquarters. To his surprise the boyscouts or the officers did not at once give him any answer but looked very much surprised, and then said after some hesitation;

"The Vivian girls are in main charge of the house your Excellency" "They are what ye call the Vivian Girl Princesses. If it is not them then I don't know who it may be."

General Roswell Buster Johnston suggested to the boy scouts that they should come with him and see the Vivian Girls, but as the latter appeared extremely reluctant and too scared to do so, he told his officers to come along, and they all ascended the stairs together.

On arriving at the room in question the door of whichwas still shut, general Roswell Buster Johnston pased and listened for a full minute outside. He could not hear the slightest sound however, and when he threw the door open and peered inside he was surprsed out of his wits bec because he could not see anyone "That certainly takes the cake." he ejaculated "and I can swear that some one a most pretty little girl was in that room, and that some one was the most pretty child I have ever seen."

He however decided to remain in the house for some time to see what would really happen then his own troubles began. A few days after his arival his aide-decamp came to him one morning looking very alarmed and scared.

"One of our best officers is dead, and the papers you entrsuted to him is gone." he said.

"I thought there was something wrong with this place" general Roswell Buster Johnston exclaimed. "Well we must gwt rid of these these make believe spooks that all."

"I've given all the soldiers in this region notice to keep a good watch on the house" the aide-de-camp said. "I felt I could not do anything else otherwise. And do you think there is really anything wrong with this house!"

"How wrong!" asked he general. "You don't think like the rest that it is spooky."

"Why replied the Aide-de-camp "I get the most funny impressions." "I constantly feel I am always being watched, watched ,watched everywhere I go, and this morning shortly after breakfast I had the most quer experience. I was in my bedroom making the bed when I heard the sound of some one knocking at the door, and most loudly. Thinking it was one of the Vivian Girls I called "come in, and the door at once opened, and someone knocked again but no one seemed to enter. Yet I heard footsteps in the hall outside. they passed close beside the door. Yet when I ran out to see who it was, I saw no one there."

"You must have imagined it." The general said.

The aide-decamp shook his head.''No I did not''he replied.''I am certain it was some one or something.Do you think the house is haunted as I have heard many say?''

''Haunted?'' the general ejaculated appearing quite jocular.''Why my dear sir ther there are no such things as ghosts.Don't you know our Religion forbids us to believe in such insane imagi ations.You may be assured it was fancy sheer fancy.'' An hour or two after this incident the general came home after a short scouting tour feeling more than ua usually tired and exhausted. He felt sure that the othe others in the building happened to be out and at this moment there was apparatly no one in the buisng but himself.He sat down on a chair in his room and was about to take off his boots when he suddenly heard footsteps of children as he believedascending the stairs leading up from the basement.They were light steps and were soft and graceful.Up and up they came softly, and nisely till they arived in the hall where theyhalted for the moment and then commenced to approach Roswells room who for a moment thinking it may be one of the manesfestations felt a strange unnatural but not actog altogether unpleasant exc excitement began to creep over him.

There was a full amount of daylight the sun even streaming in the windows most brightly and enough light for the general to discern any tolerably large or small object in the hall, but to though he stared hard in the directions where he had heard the sounds he could see nothing to have accounted for them.Then he heard the sound of the same footsteps in another room, and then suddenly as he arose he felt the same feeling as before.Then out from a certain doorway came seven children so beautiful, so dazzling beautiful and wearing such beautiful clothes that he was shocked.He had never seen the Vivian Girls in his life as yet and he felt sure these were spooks.His whole being was aroused by their sudden appearance to arouse within him passions and cravings and awe andlove he never in his life time had ever been conscious of before. He was thrilled right through, and more than that almost intoxicated at the sight of them.They came close to him bowed gracefully, and he felt the clinging folds of one of their dainty garments pass gently overhis feet.Then they all swept on and left him, and he heard one of the other doors open almost sure suroptitiously and close in the same manner again, and after which the air around him se suddenly seemed to become perfumed.He then had an almost wild desire to follow them to go anywhere, to brave anything so long as he could see them once more, his feeling now possessed him utterly, and springing up from his chair he rushed toard the door he saw the last go through.But they were not there.He rushed out of the house.On and on he walked, tillhis strength finally gave out and feeling utterly unable to go any further, he looked for some tent to take a rest.Right at his elbow was one a gaundily formed affair.He approached the tent and peeped inside and was surprised to see seven creatures in human form like before with two boyscouts and another beautiful girl.He gave on one look, then emitted something approaching a moans moan and then returned. An hour or so afterwards he vcame back to general Evans headquarters.He believed he had seen seven celestial beings.A wild desire for heaven seized him.That night he sat up in the hall for nearly seven hours gazing for their pp approach in su wtupeifed silence.And then as they made no appearance he went to bed.

He awoke with a start to hear a clock in the hall solemnly boom out four oclock in the morning.Directly afterwards he heard the door of his room open cautiously.With all his faculaties painfully on the alert he at once sat up and looked.Atfirst he could not observe anything, and then suddenly coming toard the door knob was a hand which he saw with a start was the same he had seeb seen before.The hand was absolutely white and slendor the fingers t pe papering the nails beautifully vand exquisitely shaped and polished l ike agates.

At first he could see nothing beyond the wrist.Finally however it disappeare and then he saw what he believed was a face of almost supernatural beauty appear within his view and then s, slowly vanish.Again he heard the footsteps this time retreating in the direction f of the hallway which opened very gently, and then as gently closed again.After that all was profoundly silent.

The idea that it was something supernatural, something pertaining to a happy child creature of heaven at once crossed his mind, but somehow he was not frightened.On the contrary he felt irritated irratated too much at being so disturbed to think of going to sleep again.He did not now believe that the ugly hedious creatures were in the place as he had heard, and blamed the crasy cowardly fools, and attributed it all to them.

Yet when Roswell Buster ,ohnston realized what he had just witnessed he was dazed.That he should fail to see the beautiful little creatures, and just at the time when he o felt he needed their love ad and sympathy most seemed quite incredible,and he felt crushed to a mere nothingness, with no strength, no life in him.

Then suddenly in the midst of his troubles there came to him a memory of those exquisite hands and he found himself revelling on the prospects of being in the house and alone with them.However later that night he to recieved a shock. He again went asleep and after having been asleep for some time, he was awakened by hearing some one moving about in his room, or as more than one person.Think ing it was one of his officers he called out to him to be quiet, and on his taing no notice he immediately sat up and looked.To his astonishment however instead of seeing the soldier he saw standing in the moonlight andoin the centre of the room several slight girlish figures enveloped from head to foot in long white cloaks.The figures remained motionless for some moments and then one of them crossing the floor with a curious gliding movement it advanced tward the door cautiously, the general watching it in breathless expectation.On reaching the doorway which was parellel with his bed the figure turned around and beckoned to the six others, and the general who was precocious even for his years noticed the same beautiful hands .Wondering who the could be as there was no children in the house to his knowledge he now awakened his aide-de-camp.And the general at once slipping out of bed cautiously and his aide-de camp also proceeded to d follow the mysterious individuals They moved across the landing noiselessly and cautiously and every one of them descended a couple of flights of stairs to the first story, and then making directfor general Evans door they came to a halt immediately outside of it.And they appeared to be excited and trembling.More than ever puzzled as to their identity the general was about to call out to them, when he saw them suddenly rush past him in a g hurry and in a seconds time were gone.Wondering what was the matter matter he looked down the corridor and to his unspeakable horror saw a terrifically high and fearful gray shape towering like a giant by the doorway of another room.To him it seemed to be nothing human.The body was streaked ba black and gray and had the appearance as the usualy gray shape that terrified Gertrude Angeline and Fenrod .The general was still peering and staring at it in speechless horror, when general Evans opened the door and looked out.As hecdid so the figure seemed to slowly edge away and then vanish, and the tro trio found themselves gazing at nothing more than bright moonbeams and shadows, and shadows in abundance

There are few places if any in he whole entire christian line besieging Vivian wickey are noticed and traversed by he enemy spies that general Evans headquarters just now.The cause of it being the main cenar for spies is not certain but according to the reports of many war correspondents the general general Jack Q Ambrose Evans is trusted by the emperor of Abbicannia with the most important papers brought to his headquarters all the way from the city of Angolinia Agathia, and that general Evans had put them in a place so secluded and impregnable that healone was able to perform what they contained for the good of the seige and the Angelinian cause, without fear of interruption from rebel spies.This alone no doubt would account for the great building and its important grounds being said to have hua hauntings.But it is believed that that iw not all.After general Evans had taken possession of the building for his head headquar quarters, it also or some of its rooms also came into possession of the Daughters of emperor vivian for also thought the building the main and best place for their own abods as long as tgey intended to rema n near the seige. They too had all kinds of important maps and papers in their possession.And they were always seen while at their work dressed in their prettiest clothes.In one part of the generals headquarters there is a very sinister looking door a strange deep fo furrow running all along one side of it having been designed so many of the best experts believe to be used as some strange secret passageway.Such a place would undoubtedly attract Clandolinian spies of any type, but besides this the place is said to be used by secret spies for another reason.All around the building a long wire wi fec fence because according to other reports the fence was erected by the best army engineers are a number of long boards and under each of them also is said to lie some most important ducuments hidden there for the purpose to keep them from spies.Thus when we review in detail all that had already happened at general Evans headquarters, embracing evocations of all sorts of strange creatures working at all kinds of horrid practices, and still more threatening more horrible destruction to human life than can be estimated to the countless interments of men whose savage nature alone would have been sufficient to render the Clandolinian spies most desperate, we can not wonder at the place being the hiding place of all kinds of strange creatures as already described and to appear to many of the others horribly and hed iously haunted.The very atmpos atmosphere too especially at night suggested dangers lurking everywhere inside the building.You could even feel the presence of something indefinably horrid and threatening when you go inside the building, and in a more marked marked degree, when you actually stand in the middle f the wide corridor of the building near the portiers and great pillars.Ori Orginally the great Orginally the greatbuilding had two large and immense hallways, an inner and outer, the ernormous wide i pillars standing thirty feet hi[gh] from the floor.There have been many soldiers in the company belonging near this building who had investigated it throughout, and declared it to be th true that something strange is in the building, and that for some reason orvother that the pillars cannot be correctlycounted because whenever you count them the second time forcorrobat corroboratio n you strangely and mostinvariably get a different result.

It was only a night after that general roswell muster johnston who had been u out scouting all day on rearning to the christian lines alone arived ata large mess hall on the outskirts of general ivians lnes lines.He partook of a hearty supper and afterwards announced his intention of spending for a while and for certain reasons of his own three more nights atgeneral Evans headquarters.
"I want to see something strange that is said to be going on there," he said "In the moonlight nights I am told the incidents are at their best there.I of do course do not believe in such things as ghosts but there are strange ghostly manesfastations at general V Evans headquarters, and to night I'll make for one of the most haunted rooms right away."
"You had better change your mind sir" his host said." It is not a nice place to remain in at his hour.They s have already tried to rout general Evans and the vivian girls out of the buiksing and probably will succeed yet."
The general smiled scornfully, but the soldier shook his head and again said;
"As many of he soldiers and others in this part of the army say, and would tell you the place had has a very evil and dangerous reputation, and no one dares go near the building after sun set."'"
"Captial" the general exclaimed. "That makes me all the keener to see the strange incidents.I'm off at once .I've seen pretty ghosts only last night and I intend to see more of them."
He had strapped on his knapsack, and went on his way and had just entered he doorway of the general headquarters, when a beautiful little girl of about nine or te years of age wih golden curls and of almost unatural beauty and wih large violet eyes ran up to him and slipped something into his hands.
"here "she said shyly" That will protect you I'm sure.So long asyou keep this with you e vil creatures of any kind can never dare approach you, or do you any real harm."
As he looked he saw it was a prr pretty good sized crucifix.Had it been anything else the general would have probably thrown it away, but as she was uncommonly and stran ely almost supernaturally pretty, he slipped it into his pocket, and handed her a pazaato.To his astonishment however she would not accept the money but shook her head emphatically and ran away at once.
"By jove" the general laughed as he stopped to look after her." what a beautiful creature indeed.All the some she will be an unatural beauty when she grows up I'll warrent.I'll keep this cross and when I visit these parts again I'll show it to her.She can't be so much younger than Angelinia Aronburg, and who knows bu butwhat Fate manybnot have some part in it?"
Busied wih these boughts like these he started off into the building, and walking quickly soon came within sight sight of the immense corridor.Then he approached a wide window and looked out.He saw that the night was very fine indeed.High ovshead the moon hung like a great silver ball while all around it were a thick cluster of bright stars.There was not a cloud anywhere.The air frigid as it was was just now free from all the smoke and filt of the recent conflargraions of the seige and batles and was so delicious that he opened a window and kept inhaling it every mom moments in deep breaths.Then he went onand soon reached the hall of the great pillars.It was absolutely deserted. Whichever way he looked he could not sed see anyone only a broad expanse of wooden floor and curtains and high pillars.A kind of mournful silence hung over everything.He was much impressed, and looked closely at the great pillars, which some of the moonbeams touched and the y stood out in the boldest relief.
How gigantic they indeed were, how still and sol solemne and what very black and curiously elongated shadows lay grouped at their foot.
Walking up to the nearest one he looked behind it but saw nothing.Outside some night bird from somewhere close at hand wailed most ominously.Thinking a smoke would be a welcome diversion he lighted a cigar, took a whiff and was putting out he match when somehow or other he thought he saw stars flash before his eyes, and knew no more.For aomoins he lay unconscous of anything but soon very slowly his senses reasserted themselves and opening his eyes he looked around.What was the meaning of it all, those huge black pillars homing him in on all sides and why were they arranged thus in two long lines.?As yes of course now he remembered.It was the hallway of the great building and he had been gazing at one of them and looking behind and lighting a cigar when something happened.Probably he had met with some curious accident and had fallen.
Gathering himself j up the general stood on his feet and was about to move on when he suddenly caught sight of something opposite him that sent arush of cold blood to his heart.

It was a terrible looking face. A very horrible ghostly looking facewith big deep sunken gleaming eyes full of hatred, and it was peering at him fro from behind one of the high pillars.
"It's either a spy or a madman" the general said to himself drawing his gun "Perhaps both.But I wish he would not stare at me like that.It's tying for a persons nerves no matter how brave he may be."
He opened his mouth to speak, to call out and ask the fellow who he was, and why he was looking at him in that way, but somehow or other he could not make a sound.His throat seemed to close u suddenly and his tongue t cleave to the roof of his mouth.He averted his gaze and recievedas second shockKeeping at him from behind another pillar was the horrid face of that terrible gray shape.
Convinced now that he was in the presence of a couple of dangerous mand madmen the general debated in his mind whether he would ty to parley with them or shoot them down or make a bolt for it.inally he decided on the latter course and was about to turn around and run when he thought he felt something oc icy cold wrap suddenly around him and held his arms and legs in a vise like grip.Then to his horror and amazement from behind every pillar there suddenly appeared a tall gray shape just the same as the first he saw, and appearing to be perfectly nude.Some of the figures were armed wih long swords.Uttering no sound, and advancing with a curious gliding movement they came right up to the general and glared at him evily l playing all the while with the handles of their weapons.Then at last one of them whom the general took to be the leader made a sign, where upon the general was propelled violently forward and pushed with irrestible force in the direction of the room which he believed the vivian girls occupied.As he approached the room he percieved with a thrill of horror that the floor appeared all red and wet, and that a furrow that was rudely formed along one side of the hall appeared to run with blood.
He tried to struggle, but it was of no avail, and while the fearful octopus like grip relentlessly pinned his arms to his sides he felt himself lifted bodily off the ground, and roughly thrown on his back upon a bed.He now heard mutterings and whisperings all around him and interningled with them was the sound of moving feet.Still he could not move and all the whole he lay utterly motionless and helpless on the bed.Suddenly the sound of footsteps ceased and he was conscious of some one approaching the bed, and bending over him.The next moment high above his facehovered the shadowy outlines of a long gray bare arm knotted and knarled like the branch of some tree of grotesque fashion, and in the hands was a long gun which shonein the brillant moonbeams.
A fearful horror of death now seized hold of the general.He felt that he would give anything, even his soul if only to live, to go on breathing the winter air, to go on seeing the glorious white moon, and the countless scintillating stars.
Besides here was the pain, the awful shrinking of the flesh beneath the now appearing hediously sharp blade of a long knife, the agonizing sensaion that was bound to ensue when it cut, and slashed and prodded him.He felt he could not endure it, it was to frightful, oo too hellish, too----
A flash of memory pulled him up, for he recollected the crucifix.That prety little girl with the large violet eyes had said;
"So long as you keep it with you no creaare can harm you."
"Probably after h all he thought they were real ghosts.Tjataccounted for their wild devilish looks and that peculiar far awayness of their voices.
If he could only move.He tried and to his greatest relief andunmitigated h joy, found he was able by dint of much coaxing to inset his fing fingers into his trousers pockets.The next instant he had withdrawn them, revealing the crucifix.The arm then that held the hediously long knife had at that juncture been almost about to descend.But now it stayed.
There was a sudden low buzzing of strange voices, the icy grip that held him fast arm and limb was suddenly removed and he found himself free.
He got up dazed and stupfied, tottered a few paces, caught his foot into something, tripped and fell.He put out his arms to save himself, but it was too late.Something struck him violently on the forehead, and he knew no more.
When e again recovered his senses, he found himself lying on the floor at the foot of a bed.Close beside him was his unlighted cigar, and in one of his outstree outstretched hands was the crucifix.If it had not been for that he might have fancied it was all a dream.As it was he got up and went to his own room overwhelmed with a sense of gratitude tward the strange little girl whose imely gift he honestly believed had saved his life.
Others whoohad been in sight of Evans headquarters witne witnessed strange sights.shadow like forms emitting from some tree and emitting from all over them ancer eerieclight were as they said seen to dance in and out of the trees, whil while every now and then orise as from some frenzied soul ring out with a startling clearness on the night air.

escape from [illegible] so easily. yo that must never be. hey assembled together and was preparing to move forward to take the little girls when so their surprise they saw them suddenly on the floating ice cake and away went the little girls

While General Boswell Custer Johnston was still staying in the building he heard a remarkable story to this effect;

A small party of strange officers met one evening outside the gate of the building, and in due course their conversation turned to the house. ''Yes''observed one of them, a very old soldier''Queer things happen in that building, day and night.S Especially just now.''

''Did you not see something there once yourself Jack James?''One of the soldiers asked.''I kn kinder believe of some one telling me you did.It was two nights ago or last night was it not?''

''Yes sir the ''The old soldier replied.''It was last night and I observed something unusual that came to pass.I always heard the soldiers say that any one who goes inside the generals headquarters at any time stands a chance of seeing something almost supernatural, and I did.I saw a very pretty ghost or prhably something like one.she whoever she was or like wise her spirit came up to me from behind one of those pillars in the grand hlland kissed me on the forehead.''

''Kissed you''a number of those present cried out.

''Yes indeed.Kissed me right on the forem forehead.''

''Were you not scared?''

''Aye that I were and still am, but I did not run all the same, and then suddenly she raced away and seemed to fade away behind the same piller.''

''Well Frank''Another soldier remarked I'll reckon I'll get the permission to be on guard in the building, and see if I can see anything to night.I would not mind being kissed by a pretty little girl, even though she were a celestial being of the other world, or whatever else you like to call it.''

The older soldiers triedto persuade him but the young soldier having once made up his mind on the point was very obstinate, and accordingly that night saw him, accompanied by two other sentries, Hedge Hedde, and allen urner wending their way at about two oclock in the morning for Evans headquarters.

The weather had been very cold and snowy all day but the night had turned out clear singularly still and silent, and the shadows thrown by thr the trees in the yards seemed to look more than usually black and sinister on the white fresh snow.The three soldiers entering the building took their post, and paced up and down as was their duty.Then as moments sped by and nothing unusually happened they gradually became less and less alert, and kept very silent.

Suddenly one of them s halted and gave a startled cry;

''My God In Heaven boys look.What in the world is that?''

The other two looked in the direction he pointed and at first only saw see seven beautiful figures rush away in a certain direcion in what looked to benight attire.They appeared to run into some room with outstretched arms and as they soldiers saw their faces they called out simultaneously;

''Why its the Vivian Girls.

Before the two could recover from their surprize at seeing he them, their eyes were suddenly rivited on a second figure now not from from the roof from which th y they issued.It was a grat gray shape indeed, seeming to tower fifteen feet tall and moving toward the direction where the girls had gone. At first tye watchers did not know what it was, but they were spell bound with horror.

None of the three for a moment said nothing but stared in breathless fascination the hedious creature soon entered the room.There was the [illegible] agonising [illegible] shouts and the guards rushed to the doors As they neared the room they saw only the Vivian Girls and nothing else, but they looked at the soldiers wih blanced scared faces, and one of them had a smoking revolver in her hand.Even though questioned the Vivian Girls refused to give any explanations but said that was their last night in that horrid place at untill the place could be properly searched out

At the point where general Evans headquarters stand the river Norma Run flows through a small wood, but at his point it suddenly contracts itself into a wide rocky channel or canyon little more han four hundred feet wide or more, and at summer and after heavy rains and thunder storms pours through this wide fissur fissure with a rapidity that is not even to its confinement.The sight is always an ugly one especially during a nigh flood stage, all this mass of seething hissing water, and yet it possessed an attraction for many of certain temperaments that at times is simply irrestible.The opposing forces of both sides had not been able to resist the fascination of building strange fortresses on its banks, and many had lost their lives by being cought ihnthe irrestible currents during fierce fighting at this quarter.

It was such a fate that probably befell gneral Roy Egremond of the Christian side.Out on a scouting tour in the woods one day he was standing on the edge of this precipice, and from some hidden rebel marksman a shot struck him and in falling he dropped into the raging current and was swept away and drowned.At least such was the theory of his death.When the body of the general was found his hand still grasped the papers he had been marking something he had seen down on.How he could have been killed in this mysterious fashion right on the very outskirts of the christian lines wasinexplicable.

[illegible] great building and he had been gazing at one of them and looking behind and lighting a cigar when something happened.Orobably he had met with some curious accident and had fallen.

Gathering himself up the general stood on his feet and was about to move on when he suddenly caught sight of something opposite him that sent arush of cold blood to his heart.

Another accountof the strange actions of the hidden Glandolinian spies is alleged to take place atvthis very spot.Violet and her sisters themselves were one cold day visiting this spot and saw standing close beside a snow covered stone a very beautifully dressed woman an as they supposed.With her was a very handsome dog something like an Irish wolf hound .Violet and her sisters were particulary fond of all kinds of dogs, and never had seen one quite so beautiful.It was a fine specimn, and violet threw the creatre a piece of hard mean meat.The dog hoe however went up to the meat and snapped.it, and then went away wih its mistress.Thinking no more of the incident, violet and her sisters went home to their supposedly haunted headquarters, but were surprised when they got there to again a see the strange woman and her dog.This ime Violet and her sisters secretly followed them both, and one of the girls was on the verge of catching hold of the dog but was balked.

The dog repeatedly in some fashion, repeatedlybindeed in some very mysterious fashion slipped through her graps grasp.In the a end the little girls desisted, and the woman and the dog made for the building, and vanished in the dark shadows of the arched doorway to the entrance of the building.

Struck with the oddness of the incident, and determined at all cots to probe the mystery, which they now felt enshrouded the dog and the woman the little girls followed more cautiously, and inside the hallway of the building encountered the a animal but did not see the woman.This time the little little girls waited untill it was sniffing the piece of meat, which violet had dropped on the floor(shut the door), and then hrew a small piece of m meat directly at it.The meat struck the dog on the sideand fell on the floor immed imdsly under it.This convinced the litle girls it was nothing at all ghostly as they had supposed.....

Before she could hrow a second time the dog took up the other piece and slowly moved away, let the house and set off in the direction of the river. Violet and her sisters having become used to their recent trying experiences had now more steady nerves than ever before.They cautiously followed the dog. On and on they went along a narrow winding snow filled path that soon led them into the recesses of the small woods.The sun had by this time sunk very low, and despite the whiteness of the snow the shadows of the evening lay so thick athwarth the path that violet and her sisters were compelled to proceed with some great caution.A false step or so may cause either one of them to easily slip down the precipitious bank into the roaring torrent, rendered unusually deep and fierce by the waters caus caused by the melting snows.As they grouped their way along, the silence all around them seemed to inten ifsfy and become so they thought, almost unatural.Above the loud continuous roar of the weir, which assumed exaggerated dimensions, there was nothing only a dead stillness unrelieved even by the croaking of a night bird or the scurrying footsteps of a hare.There was also the their senses an almost uncanny feeling in the atmosphere too which was very strange to the bequtiful little girls.Still keeping their nerves in grip they went on, keeping close behind the dog, which after a while seemed to move along a little faster.

At last a sudden swerve in the path brought them in sight of the precipisce..The moon was now out, and its bems lighting up the whole scenes before hem them with an unearthly white glow threw into most startling relief the black rocked chasm, and the mass of water swirling along tward it.The sight so appalled violet and her sisters that they came to an abrupt halt.

As they stood there debating in their mind what to do, whether to make a further advance or retreat, a tall strange figure clad in a queer fantastic kind of garb ermerged from a clump of trees a few yards to one side of them and walked tward the dangerous part of the river.At first the little girls fancied it was a boy their own age or size, but they soon changed their mind and came to the conclusion that it was a girl for it had slight figure and long curly hair, but that it was a strp stripling of perhaps sixteen or seventeen years of age.

Advancing to the edge of the terrible chasm with long strides the stranfer whistled, and upon the dog violet and her sisters had followes running up to him she bent down and attatched a long piece of thin rope to its neck.That done she stood up and looked at violet and her sisters.At that k moment the dog twisted and turned and in midair leaped at Jennie's throat.There was a rush of ice cold air on face and neck as the dog missed her.The ertified children saw for an instant the figure of the boy and then in a minute more the girl and the doh dog had disappeared at what they knew not.The whole drama though only a few minutes duration seemed unusually vivid, and for some reason or other there was a strange horror about it all that held violet and her sisters spellbound.

They completely lost the use of heir motor faculties, and heatheir very soul depended on action h they could not have moved an inche.Their arms and legs seemed weighted wih heavy iron.In stinct told them after all that the figure of he young girl they had seen taking the dog away was merely a disguised a rebel girl spy who had disappeared at seeing them, but thatonly added to the ghastilness of it all.If all this was not stopped soon a terrible would hav happen to the whole besieging christian armies.something must be done to find out the cause of the mystery.without venturing to advance another step they waited untill they were once more masters of all their faculities, and then turning abruptly they hastened back tward their own headquarters.They had just reached the road when they saw a certain soldier on horseback approaching, and they were still more astonished to see that his horse suddenly shied and pitched him from the saddle. e fell fortunately withouthurting himself, and siting up was immediately surprised to see oneof the beautiful ivian irls bending over him and the others standing near.She arouse sreatthe moment he got up but still however did not move as if unwilling to leave him altg altogether unless she was sure he was not hurt.Struck with the oddness of their beauty as he had not known of the viv an irls the soldier remounted his horse and rode onward.Violet and her sisters following close behind eventually came to a part of the woods with which they were unfamiliar.Directly they set foot on this new ground they were conscous of some strange subtile change of the atm atmpsohere, and presently they heard the most curious sounds like the knocking and the clashing of sticks.Peeping through a climp of bushes they saw the to their amazement two Gargoylian Kurds dressed in white ghostly custom.

Not knowing what to make of it the little girls stood stock still and rubbed their eyes and theas they did so the wood suddenly awoke to the tramp tramp tramp of many footsteps accompanied by the noise of steel.The sounds grew nearer and nearer, and in a few seconds the already bewildered ivian irls were almost paralyzed at seeing marching tward them a large number of men in grey.They wore the same headwear as of the fierce Omarians oroScoodlers, and were armed with long rifles with bayonets attached, and at their head strode a gigantic man who kept peering all around him as if momentarily expecting an ambush.

Violet and her sisters in great terror, sprang behind trees with their own weap-ns drawn and the ready, and concealed themselves from view as best as they could.When the landelinians came on the level with them, however, they were seaeen and the huge landelinian at the head of the procession drawing his sword at once made for the tree.Violet first shot him down and then she and her sisters fled, and he whole company of Omarians instantly set off in swift persuit of them.Fortunately they soon arived at a spot they knew, and talking a short cut out of the wood,they succeeded in reaching a high road, and coming upon a body of Abyssinkilian cavarly k just as the foremost of the landelinians had practically caughtup with them.Indeed as Violet who was in the rear leapes out of the bushes on to the broad open throughoufarsa glittering sabre blade seemed to whizz with icy current past her ear.At that moment there was a crash that stunned her and her sisters, the woods flared wih a larfe number of rifle flashes and twenty of the rebels fell prostrare.the moment the little girls were free of the wood, the Abyssinkilians persued the remainder of the rebels, and after they themselves had turned androd around and looked they saw nothing now in their wake, saving the shadows of the trees and hedgegre hedgerows gently flickering on the gleaming white snow, and moonbeams.

On giving a des description of heir ex e experience the following day to Gertrude Angeline she exclaimed;

"What did you notknow that wood is every night infested by landelinian scouting parties, either on foot or horse.Have you never heard of that her ore. You are risking your lives going into that wood at night.For od's sakes girls don't do it again."

She then proceeded to tell iolet and her sisters of how the wood was so full of rebels specially at night

CHAPTER FOUHTY SIX.

THE REBELLION OF A LARGE NUMBERCOF THE WORSE OF THE GLANDELINIAN PRISONERS.....19.!!PP

THE MOST impressive scene and also the most impressive exhibition of moral courage opposed to the wildest ferocity under the most terrible and appelling circumstan ces was never observed in the war as yet that which was witnessed by many of the Angelinian and Abbisannian officers at the main Interment camp seventeen miles southwest of the battle torn city-of orrington in the wild and almost successful rebellion of nearly IO,000 glandelinian prisoners which occured the same day the terrible battle was raging..

Many of the landelinian prisoners among them had been sentenced to dis for they had been found guilty of having aken partvin one of the the recent dreadful massacres of helpless children, n and by some effort some of the othe prisoners who were fierce Omarians a gate into the ya yards of the encamp ments ad been opened and also another communicating with the great prison barracks, and through the retaining yards, into the company streets.

In front of these landelinian internment camps the companystreet was long, highly walled with immense tabours and other tents, and deeply covered with snow, and in this all of the IO,000 glandelinian prisoners managed tl to assemble all armed with clubs, guns, knives, dsabrescand such other weapons and tools as they had been able to seize in passing through their own work shops in their barracks and tents.All kinds and sizes of knives, big hammers hatchets axes, and chisels swords, and with every variety of such weapons were in the hands of the ferocious and savage Omarians who by the hardships and horrors of long and curl wars q af are drawn away from their engroach ents on the best society forming a fierce congregation of wicked strength, vileness and tarlet that no real criminal sancequal embearth anywhere.

Glandelinian soldiers of the Omarian and Scoodler type of all ages and characters guilty during the war of every variety of m infamious war crimes, dressed in the dressed in the motley and peculiar garb of the prisoners in camp, and now disp aying the most wild hedious and demoniac appearances that always pertain to the worse of glandelinian soldiss were now gat hered together for probably not only the single purpose to preventing the death penalty which was to be inflicted on the j morrow upon twenty of their comrades but to fight for a chance at freedom.The guards, sentries, and some officers and a number of privates in charge of the interment camps were there at thatime, and were alarmed indeed at the terrible consequences likely to ensue from the desperate conflict necessary to restore order.None of the landelinians have ever been found worse than the Omarians andoScoodlers.The Omarians are the worse of all the most savage and knew no fear under any conditions.Here they were ten thousand of them huddled toget her, and could scarcely be said to consult each other but glwer, and the stoutest among the brave Abgelinian guards lost all presense of mind in overwhelming fearfear.

The news of the rebellion of so many prisoners rapidly spread throughout this section of the christian army, and a general who was a calm officer and who usually had the most kind and mild disposition hurried to the scene and came most calm and most collected into the midst of the terrified and confused Angelinian officers and guards.The most equabled tempered and the mildest man or christian officerbin the Angelinian armies was in this terrible hour of peril and horror the firmest.

He instantly sent a dispatch to request major general Kindernine for immediate assistance, and then declared to the others his firm purpose to enter the yards of the landelinian intern internment camps and try the fo force of firm demeanor and persuasion upon the enraged mulitude of devilish glandelinian Omarians and sScoolders.

All of those present exclained against such an attempt so full of great hsard basat hazard, but in vain.They tried to force him to listen but he would not. hen they offered him arms , a sword and pistols, but he firmly refused them and declared to themall that he had no fear, and anyhow that in case of danger, should the landelinians assault him arms of any kind would do him no service whatever,and alone with only his own sabre which was his usual w weapon, he advanced into the yards to hold parley with the selected congregated, and enraged glandelinian prisoners of the whole compment.

First he demanded their purpose in this coming together in arms, involation of the rules of the Angelinian internment camps.

One of them replied in a surly tone;

"We are in the utmost determination to obtain at all costs the full remission of the punishment of our twenty comrades comdened to die on the charge of child slaughter, and that we are going to have our way about it too come what may(".

easily. so that must never be. hey assembled together and was ring to move forward to take the little girls when so their surprise ay them suddenly on the floating ice cake and away went the little girls

''It is impossible for our laws to complie with such a request, the rules of war must be obeyed, and you must submit.'' The general said.''You are guilty of the massacre of many thousands of children, women and at least parte partaken in them with the army that did it, and the penalty of such crimes id death when caught.There is nothing whatever would save them.''

At the hint of this the furious Glandelinians drew nearer together, prepared their weapons for service, and as they were seen plainly out in the yards of the encampments by those who observed them a more appalling sight could never be cons concieved, nor one of moral grandeur than that of the single Angelinian officer standing there within their grasp, and exposed to the full danger of being torn from limb to limb instantly if one of the rebel leaders of the rebellios prisoners only gave the look or word of commands.

That terrible excitement too was of the most dangerous kind.When really exxited the Glandelinian no matter what kind they are never break forth in terrib terrible noise and imprecations, but are calm and look ferocious.And the very excitement could be seen easily in the dark looks and the strained nerves that shoeshowed the deepest determination.The officer expostulated.He said to them;

''you know this encampment is large, the whole christian line has millions of men in it armed to the teeth, and that it is hopeless for you men to escape from here through all this deep snow and cold, that the whole christian army is alarmed and on the leart, and that the main general in command here would submit to nothing now but only unconditional surrender.So I warn you yo you to act wise and all those who would go quietnly back to your barracks will be for given for this offense, but that if every prisoner were to be killed in the contest power enough would surely be obtained to enforce the regulations of the internment camps, and that no prisoners therefore would recieve any quarter whatever.''

Hossame Scoodler officer replied;

''We expect many of ourselves to be killed/ death is better and would be better than such imprisonment as we are suffering from now, and that not a single man should leave the internment camps or its yards untill the death penalty upon those twenty men would be completely remitted.'' And as he said it there were a a look in every face of the rebels that told of a most unshakable and indomitable purpose.Their evil passions seemed to be more and more inflamed, and some of them already desired to destroy the officer, who however still stood firmer and with a more temperate pulse than did the other Angelinians who saw from a safer distance, but could not avert the danger that threatened him.

Just at this critical moment and in about three minutes from the commencement of the tumult the officer saw the approach of a small force of Abbiesnnians on whosepresence alone he relied for succor, filing by in the company street. Without any apparent anxiety he had repeatedly turned his attention to their approach, and now he surely knew it was his ownly time to make his escape, before the conflict came as was expected, one of the most dark and dreadful in the world.He stepped slowly backwards, still urging them firmly and wisely to depart for their barracks, before the soldiers were driven to use as the last resort their firearms.When he was within three or four feet of the wide gate one of the guards opened it, and as he quickly sprang through it was closed instantly and he was unexpectedly restored to his own friends.Mar

Major general Kindernine was requested to order his firce of one thousand men to fire upon the Glandelinian prisoners from behind the fences of the internment camps, wi first with shell and then with musketry till they were willing to retreat, but the general took as he be/ believed a wiser course though bolder, relying as he supposed upon the full effect which firm determinatio would have upon so many men so critu critically situated.

He ordered the wide gate to be again opened, and marched in at the head of his seventeen hundred soldiers whole who filed through the-passage, and formed a line at the fences opposite to the crowds of desperate Glandelinians huddled also in rank formation near the barracks.Hevthen started a speech stats stating that he was empowered to quell the rebellion at any costs, that he wished to avoid shedding useless blood, but that he or his followers would not quit the yards till every one of the Glandelinian prisoners had returned to his duty.

They however seemed balancing the strength of the two parties, and the Glandelinians replied s all the f more firmly and determinedly that they were all ready to die, and only waited for an attack to see which was the more powerful swearing that they would fight to the last unless the death punishment of their twenty comrades was remitted, for they would not submit their comrades to any such punishment whether they were guilty or not.

Major general Kindernine ordered his soldiers therefore to load their muskets and that they might not at all be suspected of trifling each man was made to hold up to view the bullet which he afterwards put into his guns.

[illegible] was the hallway of the great building and he had been gazing at one of them and looking behind and lighting a cigar when something happened.Probably he had met with some curious accident and had fallen. Gathering himself up the general stood on his feet and was about to move on when he suddenly caught sight of something opposite him that sent arush of cold blood to his heart.

However this olnly n only caused a great howl of determination, and not one of the Glandelinian prisoners even blenched or seemed disposed to shrink from the foremost exposure.They did not see why they were to be afraid for they knw that their number would enable them to bear down and destroy the handful of Abbiesnndian soldiers after the first discharge, nd before their pieces could be reloaded.Again and again they were ordered to put down their weapons and retire within the barracks, but the Glandelinians answered with more ferocity than ever.The Angelinians were then ordered to take their aim so as to be sure and k ll kill as many as possible at the first discharge.Therefore their guns were presented, but not one of the Glandelinian prisoners retired or stirred, did not even move a eye lid, except to grasp more firmly his weapon.Still desirous to avoid such a tremendou s slaughter, as much follow the discharge of a single rifle, Major general Kindernine advanced about four paces, and spoke even more firmly than before urging them to depart for their barracks.Again while looking directly into the mussles of the guns which they had seen loaded with ball they declared their ''intentions to fight it out''.This intrepid general officer then took out his watch and told all of his men to hold their pieces aimed at the Glandelinian prisoners, but not to fire untill they had orders, then turning to the prisoners he said;

''You must leave these yards and return to your barracks;I give you fully four minutes to decide if at the nd of that time a man still remains only one, he shall be shot dead.''

No situation of greater thrill or interest than this can beconcieved.At one side of the yards of the internment camps a fearful multitude of the most desperate and powerful Glandelinian prisoners in existance, waiting still more determinedly for the assault, at the other side a little band of desciplined Angelinan soldiers waiting with arms presented, and ready upon the least moment or sign to begin the cargae, and their tall and imposing commander, holding up his watch to count the lapse of threeminutes, given as the reprive within four men to the lives of probably alle.Probably no poet, or painter could ever concieve a spectacle of more dark and terrible sublimity no human heart can concieve a situation of more appalling suspense.

For three minutes or more than three and a half not a person nor a muscle moved, not a sound was heard in the unwonted stillness of the prison yards,nexcept the labored breathing of the infuriated wretches, as they began to pant between fury and revenge, at the expiration of three minutes during which they had faced the minsiters of death with unblenching eyes, two or three of these in the rear and nearest the further entrance of the yards, went slowly out of the column, a few more followed the example, dropping out que quietly and deliberately, and advance forward, and before half of the last minute was gone every man was struck by the excitement, and crowded forward, and then there was a terrific rush, a dreadful discharge of musketry and nearly a hundred of the Glandelinians fell dead.Yet the yards were cleared like magic the Glandelinians sweeping all before them, and moving down the soldiers general Kindernine barely escaping with his life.It was a terrible scene and the steady firmness of moral force and the strong effects of counter determination acting deliberately failed to awe the most savge Glandelinians and supress a scene of horrible cargae da carnage which had instantly followed the least precipitancy or exertion of physcial force.Many of the rebels fell, but spreading all over in their flight they all escaped killing and wounding all who get in their way.And just because the required force of Angelinians sent for had failed to come .They had been behind time.

[illegible] easily. [illegible] that must never be. They assembled together and was [illegible] to move forward to take the little girls when so their surprise [illegible] them suddenly on the floating ice cake and away went the little girls

It is hard to say indeed that during his service in the whole war that general Whillamsburger Zimmermann met any defeats as yet. During his advance upon the storied ar.ion of the enemy during the time when generals Hannon and vivian had been swiftly advancing to strike in the enemy back from Julo Callio and Norma Catherine Zimmermann had forced scores of Glandelinian armies to retreat even many times without a single battle. All other christian commanders had suffered scores upon scores of disasters and slight defeats, and yet Zimmermann was proving himself a monster in the path of the enemy.

Zimmermann during the reign of terror and fierce battles around the fortifications had of Evangeline Granda had destroyed a town called Mc-Whirther Hollibrook with the hel of a fleet of fierce Abbienanian and Angelinian warships and then at general vivians command his armies poured forward as of a mighty flood into the way of general Buchanan Manley as he retreated from the regions of norrington and Evangeline Granda, and within four days afterwards, all the biggest Glandelinian armies belonging to Buchanan Manley were swept clar out of this section of Calverinia with the most frightful disolusion, and not only that but the mighty Angelinian waves were mowing growsome paths throughout the whole section of this part of Calverinian devastating enemy territory, and pouring toward the region of Kittens Pinch erts Run, as if an ir irrestible tidal wave was sweeping upon them.Severe skirmishes by hundreds had been fought with the Angelinians and Abyssinkilians under Zimmermann never losing a single fight.After every skirmish they carried all before them. Ruin was everywhere for the unfortunate glandelinians, the Angelinians having laid waste to ever thing so the enemy could not make use of it.Glandelinia's armies in re sisting Zimmermann had reckoned without the host indeed.S The glandelinian armies in the running fight resisted Zimmermanns advancing armies for ten days in vain, zimmermann continued to press on, and eighty times large forces of Z Abyssinkilians laid seige to small glandelinian armies capturing them all the unfortunate glandelinians being so c on cut off to give up on account of being hard pressed y forest fires as well as the advancing christian troops.

In march the fortifications of Marocco Io were besieged and stormed by the christian armies under Zimmermann.The whole position of the enemy was stormed by the Angelinian cannon and so terrific was the fire of artillery along the christian line that terrible destruction raged. The fortifications at portions was laid in smoking ruins amid inconceivable slaughter, and the glandelinian generals seeing the ruthless slaughter and destruction going on for so many days d r during the siege offered to mediate with Zimmermann but general Zimmermann only wanted a surrender and not any mediation and so the bombardment only continued with redoubled violence. A frightful catastrophe would have occured if it had not been for the advance of general Johnston Jackon Manleys great armies which had not as yet been at Evan Granda. This news of course alarmed general Zimmermann and he let loose all his guns with horrible slaughter beyond describing blowing thousands of positions and parts of fortifications sky high, and then raised the siege, in order to stop general Johnston Jackons Manleys advance. He learned the purpox purpose of this generals advance and decided to stop him at a ll cost.Zimmermann then did so and waited for the other threesections of his army to come up, an' then to lay seige again to that portion of Mc-Whirther, and smash all of the enemy down.

Now came the time for general Zimmermann to prove himself a very dangerous fighter.He readily learned the course taken by general Johnston Manleys armies and knew also what his intentions were. Zimmermann Zimmermann in order to retain his hold to the seige of Evangeline Granda which Hannon and the other christian generals were making, was now deciding to draw general Johnston Manley away from Evn Granda by laying seige to a portion of the main Mc-Whirthian fortifications in person. So he started a movement which resulted in the [illegible] Jennie Turner, the most of which raged at Madge Evans.

Zimmermann had about two hundred armies and one was now starting the advance toward the fortifications of Mc-Whirther, with the intention of concentrating on the Virginia Run, and also along the Mc-Whirther Run in order to make a line long enough to harness the fortifications of Mc-Whirther with a continual cannonade. This movement was indeed bi-ness more business than any movement of the war before.In two days on this section the enemy of the glandelinian armies had concentrated a line of batteries for the distance of thirty miles, and was bombarding the fortifications of Cedermine ruthlessly and the fortifications responding just then at this part of the war made the most violent artillery duel ever heard or witnessed, and thirteen million shells exploded within the region of Mc-Whirther and the fortifications within the space of twenty four hours indeed making a dreadful inferno of din and fires.

[illegible] building and he had been gazing at one of them and looking behind and lighting a cigar when something happened.Orobably he had met with some curious accident and had fallen.

The whole of Zimmermanns army had already concentrated along this point and general Manley learning of this grew worried because if Zimmermann ever reduced the fi fortifications of Cedermine all would be lost for if Cedermine fell all would fall with it.Something must be done quick as possible, and so johnston Jackon Manley having rallied Buchanans Manleys armies, and reunited the scattered sections marched hastily to crush Zimmermann.

The other large army of Angelinians was at the time advancing toward Madge Evans Madge Evans, under the orders of general Hannon to strike the beleaged glandelinians at Julo Callio a very hard blow, and to prevent the enemy from taking possession of the city of Madge Evans. This army was led by general Maurice Costellio and he advanced so fast that he reace reached the big town of Flanders and here came face to face with general Manley.Manley at once threw an onslaught against his lines which struck the christian , line with inconceivable violence, and during the battle that was now raging general Gen Maurice Costellio withdrew the shattered divisions that had resulted Manleys first onslaught with horrible loss made a stand at Jennie Turner, and counter charged, striking the enemy a heavy blow and destroying everything in his path with the horriblest shell fire the world had ever seen.The furious battle raged all day the enemy counter charging for a whole day also many times but could not force the christian position though at times they did slightly break the christian lines seriously and drive the divisions back with dreadful loss.

Zimmermann had met indeed fierce opposition at Flanders a section of the Evangeline Granda region and after his first engagement he had fallen back to Jennie Turner and almost destroyed the assailants as they came at his armies like a raging avalanch of hells demons.

Jennie Turner was one of the bloodiest battles of the war, and raged furiously for over thirteen to eighteen hours without the slightest intermission, but the other army marching on Julo Callio and Madge Evans as swiftly as men could advance, was also reported to be stormed by a large force of Glandelinians whose regimentalways carried the white flag with a cross in the middle who generally are called Hobobinites under general James Flantory, and so Zimmermann at last knowing what was coming prepared for a general battle. The enemys attacks was terrible at the section of Jennie Turner and Madge Evans where most of the terrible battle raged and the slaughter was so great that it could hardly be conceived.Cities and towns by great numbers were shattered and ruined as if a tornado struck them by the dreadful concussion of the battle and by the shell fire, and great conflagrations occured during this great battle.

To see the full description of the battle along Zimmermann Center at the portion called Madge Evans and Jennie Turner see next chapter, where it describes that the christian armies fought with all their might, and crushed the enemy causing Manley to suffer one of the most frightful disasters of the first year of the war.

It may be difficult indeed very difficult to find any one in the world who could give the faintest idea or the agonies any one experienced when one suffers the discomfort, of having a sticky porous plaster removed from any portion of the body it happens to be on it.

Yet who can conceive the faintest idea of the acute agonies that two of the prettiest of the Vivian Girls went through when their sisters and other persons tried to remove a heavy coat of tar and feathers th that had been applied to their tender skin by the glandelinian soldiers who kidnapped them while close to the fer fee lines at Jennie Turner.....Usually the removing of plaster from a person's back, or chest takes only two or three minutes and sometimes longer.If you don't believe it try it yourself and see.The process of the coat of tar on the bodies of the two little girls took four days each, and a little over three hours.The actual putting on of the tar and feather on any person is considered not to be very painful in itself, except where the body is burned only where the tar is laid on ever pleased on first and the tar usually cools off as it is being spread over the rest of the body so that when it is removed there are only fix or six small spots t hat shows where the skin has actually been burned.

Of course we all know that the feathers applied or removed are not painful at all.They are just to add to the humiliation.The real torment that the two Vivian Girls, Jennie and Violet were compelled to suffer came when they tried to get rid of the tar.The two vivian girls were covered from head to feet.It had even hardened in their ears And some on their eye lashes & and it took their sisters and a number of red cross nurses and two doctors these four days and three hours to melt it and scrape it off.Their hair was even caked with the tar.During these four days and three hours the two vivian Girls suffered the most intense pain compared to which the process of daubing them with tar and rolling them in fa feathers was nothing absolutely.

[illegible] so easily. So that must never be. They assembled together and was [illegible] to move forward to take the little girls when so their surprise [illegible] them suddenly on the floating ice cake and away went the little girls

And after the tar was removed theyvwere still in bed for several weeks even during agoniAfter the battle of Jennie Turner, nursing their scraped and blistered t heirvblistered flesh.As is usually the case the two vivian girls were again the victims of the ferocious and wicked Glandelinians.Among even the less wicked of the Glandelinians, children like the vivian girls comes in for a great deal ed of discussion, and it did not help matters at all when certain more sensible Glandelinians pointed out to them with great admiration, claiming them as an example of how they would like to see their own children act and behave.

All of the Glandelinians knew that the seven beautiful vivian girls are vivacious and have prettier faces and forms than other children ever known and q qu alities that caused most of the Glandelinians to hate them, and even be terribly jealious and enveious of them. And the vivian girls it is said had so often spied on the Glandelinians, and caused so many battles to be lost tha the highrst of the Glandelinian generals decidad that they were more dangerous than any spiss ever knewn throughout the world, more dangerous than their own most professional spies and determinated to take immediate action.

And so while two of the vivian girls, Violet and Jennie vivian, were surveying the enemy's lines at a distance from Jennie Turner, oseveral groups of Glandelinians on horseback rode with irrestible speed upon them, these Glandelinians being garbed like the Gargoylian Kurds, but were not really of that sect.The vivian girls so taken by surprised, screamed and opened fire wih their pistols and started to run, but the soldiers riding the swiftest horses, and the deep snow impeding the progress of the girls, the Glandelinians quickly overtook them.

They were quickly placed on the backs of the horses in front of the soldiers,and brought back to the rebel camps And turned over to general Stanck.
The two vivian girls did not at firstknow what it was all about or how they came to be captured so quickly, and without warning, but afer holding a short council the Glandelinian general came to the point very quickly.

"We will let them go free this time and return to the camp, but we wil l will first make an example of them."he said."we will have a big day ahead of us and we will want to get this done as early as possible.Then we'll let them go back to the christian lines."

The two vivian girls screamed and struggled, but it did not do them any good, even though they scratched, pummelled and bit their captors, for all the other rebel soldiers approving of what was going on came to the assistance of their comrades.The general led the soldiers with the two vivian girls outs de the rebels lines and out into the country, and at a particucarly deserted section the two Vivian girls were forced to dismount from the horses and both were held while one of the Glandelinians produced a rawhide whip.The two vivian girls then hysterically demanded the Glandelinians to instantly release them.

"I'll show you how we'll release you"said the soldier with t he whip striking them slashing blows."Ill'Ll teach you and your sisters to spy on us and steal our plans."

The vivian girls shrieked and tried to escape, but a man held each one fast qnd encouraged the one with the whip to greater efforts.

"hey and their sistersvare the most dangerous spiss in the world"they said."Give it to them good and hard."

And the man who had the whip did.Between blows the two vivian girls cried out that if they were real soldiers they would not treat little girls like thiw but the rebel payed no attent on, but continued the blows.

"I'll teach you qorms to spy on our generals"he said"Somebody has neglected to bron bring you up properly and therefore I'll supply the needed lessons right now.(swish)Yell. Scream.Holler.I like it .(swish).Crack.
(swish). Louder.Now maybe you'll quit wrecking our armies.(swish)

By By this time the two vivian girls who kept protesting against such foul treatment were on the verge of collaspe and they negrly fainted when the rebel soldier with the whip dropped it, and without any regard of whom they were, or no matter how cold it was began tearing off their clothes.

"Are not their uniforms beautiful."sneeredone of the Glandelinian soldiers.
"My.My.Beautiful sin silken uniforms.go his is what you little Centepedes are supposed to wear while snooping around our camps.Well the two of you will need something soft next to you r skin for some time to come.Get the tar quick one of you boys before they get too cold."

One of the soldiers ran for a very large iron bucket of tar, that was being kept soft on a hot coal fire burning near by.Others appeared with two pillows loaded with feathers and down.One of the men continued to hold sachvgirl while the irate Glandelinian soldier who had struck them with the whip kept rippi ripping off their clothes.

"My what lovely little figures each little girl has" he paused to exclaim"are better tyan the most beautiful Fairy Sprites, are you not.Well I'll give you Centepedes something nice to wear in just a minute..."""

[illegible] gazing at one of them and looking behind and lighting a cigar when something happened.Probably he had met with some curious accident and had fallene

Gathering himself j up the general stood on his feet and was about to move on when he suddenly caught sight of something opposite him that sent arush of cold blood to his heart.

One of the soldiers advanced with a brush dripping with hot black tar and commenc ced to apply it to the bare back of one of the vivian girls, but the soldier who had whipped them seized the brush from his hands.

"It is my duty to do it myself"he said."I want to listen to them yell."

It would have seemed hat the work of applying the tar would not have been fast enough to satisfy the cruel Glandelinians but it was continued untill they were coverec from head to feet.When he took the bucket from one of the men and pouredthe ra remainder of the hot tar all over their bodies with appropriate comment.The two vivian girls all this while struggled like ferocious wild cats held in the grasp of a trap, but that did not prevent the rev rebel from continueing the job.He finished up by shifting the contents of the feather pillows all over the writhing forms of the two little girls, and rolling them about in thefeathers that had fallen to the snow covered ground.

Some f of the other soldiers assisted him in rubbing feathers over surfaces that he had overlooked.As this was going on, a scouting party of mounted Abyssinkilian soldiers approaching near the scene j had heard the screamx of the two vivian girls and the comments of their wicked torturers and one of them decided to ride forward and investigate or make an investigation.

He rode forward a certain distance, saw what was going on, and returned to consult with his followers.

"I guess they are tarring and feathering the vivian girls"He said.

The officer in vharge ordered his column forward.All of the Abyssinkilians are crackshots.Holding their rifles at the rwar ready they charged into the group from all sides which numbered about fourty rebels.The column of Glandelinians were surrounded before they knew the Abyssinkilians were coming.

The Abyssinkilians dis disarmed them, while one of them threw a blanket each around the shoulders of the vivian girls.Some of the leaders of the Glandelinians menaced the Abyssinkilians, but when they thgertened to give them no quarter they quit mumbling.By this time thete vivian girls suffering intensely had been wrapped in the blankets and placed on a horse spiess, the prisoners being forced to assemble, and march to thechristian lines on foot.As soon as the camp was reached the prisoners were confined, while the two poor little vivian girls were brought to their own place.Ger sisters were notified, and were sh-cked and angry when they saw what had been done.Summoning help they at once began their ministrations.The blankets however had stuck tightly to the tar, and as their sisters who started first, bega vto pull it away, they moans moaned piteously with pain.

"Oh My god how it hurts."one of them cried."Please dear sister pull pull c gently, as gently as you can."

Indeed it did pain and more than any one can conceive.The stout blankets stuck t o thecatticky mas of tar so tightly that as it was dragged away pulled the tar with it.And the tar clung very stubbornly to the tender skin of the little girls, more stubbornly than even a thick perous plaster.

Therefore the blankets were cut to pieces, and away in bits, and very carefully so as not to pull the tar any more than they could help.And when the blankets were off both of the poor vivian girls, were a most grotesque sight dreadful indeed to behild beheld.Both of the little girls looked like a couple of strange feathered creatures of a strange world.Their beautiful golden hair was thickly matted with the viscous stuff, and from it stuck do guess down a d feathers.

There were large splatters of tar on their beautiful faces, and all portions of their bodies, neck,s arms breast, back and arms and abdomens and legs were thickly covered, and everywhere the feathers st uck out.and the tar used by these wicked Glandelinians was of a kind or variety used by the army of both sides for mending military roads, roofing and so on.

It was possibly the most toughest kind of tar ever known to be made.And by the time the vivian girls had been rescued, and brought into the camp the tar had hardened so much that the little girls had thr me most difficult time in every movement they made.And also it can be believed that every movement at the same time produced the most agonizing pain since it continually twisted and pulled the half scalded flesg beneath and every little hair embedded in the tar.

Obviously, neither of the little girls could be laid upon their beds or anything else without sticking fast, and this complicated the efforts of their sisters and the others in the operation of removing the tar.

Each of the little girls had to be leaned against a wall or table while their sisters and their assistance with desperation, rubbed the tar upon them with various oils, and hot water.

First they manifulated the neck and shoulders of the two little girls, gradually extending t he vigorous massage all over their little bodies.After an hour of this treatment proved to be of no avail, the two little girls were plunged into a bath as hot as they could stand it, left in for twenty minutes, and then taken out, and the scraping pregr processs begun.

[illegible] easily. no that must never be. hey assembled together and was [illegible] to move forward to take the little girls when so their surprise them suddenly on the floating ice cake and away went the little girls

The process of scraping within three hours ti e took off the feathers and the outside surface of the tar.But still theywere thoroughly covered.For six hours more this desperate work of kneading with coal el oil, turpentine, benzine and other tar solvents and the plunge into the hot bath continued untill the two little girls could not stand any more,when the nurses themselves wrapped them in oil sheets and put them to bed on their little army cots.Their golden hair which was nothing new but a mass of matter tar was completely s d and thoroughly scalded in coal oil, and wrapped up in other oil cloths soaked with the same kind of fluif fluid.Yet if the tar in being removed had caused more than usual agony, the torture of the second day was well ne nigh unbearable.Her sisters themselves who had done most of the cleaning had now gotten down close to the flesh and here the tar clung most stubbornly.

As every one knows the skin is covered wih countless microscopic hairs, and her sisters or the nurses could not scrape or rub off the tar without avoiding the necessity of tearing millions of these out by the roots.Now it was really true that no torture of mediaeval times, nor c Chinese refi refinement of torment had ever equaled or surpassed this slow minute by munite minute hour by a hour agon/ of the vivian irls.and when the tar was being removed from their arms and legs where the hair is more abundant the two little girls had a hard time to keep themselves from screaming or faintint every time..there were also a number of areas of half soaked half burned flesh that their sisters and the nurses while scraping, had to treat wih the utmost care.

By the end of the second day, large patches of their bodies had been cleared of the tar, and yet despite all the care, the flesh was tender, inflamed and indescribably paind painful.In some places even the cuticle itself had come away.Yet anothe an agony was in the toudh of the kwosine to the tender flesh.

"It burns so.It burns so.It smarts so bad.""the little girls would moans

Al through the third day the work of cleaning of the tar went on and the agonies of the little girls continued.Their hair of their heads was steeped and resteeped in keresenw keresenw and other fluids, untill the hairs were once more cleaned.Patches however that because of irritation, could not be so manipulated had to be cut out.

But at the end of the third hour of the fifth day, all the tar had been removed from their bodies. nd both of them had bruised and aching bodies, upon whose skin the slightest touch caused exquisite pains.Of course as stated before the landelinians who had put the tar and fathers on the two little girls had been captured the same time the vivian irls had been rescued.

And all the vivian irls had the greatest sat isfactio of viewing the prisoners but instead of desiring the means of retaliating for all the misery their two sisters had suffered, as the result of their villainy all of the vivian girls tried to make friends with the prisoners and convince them of their error.

However all of the christian soldiers who knew of it were heartily ashamed of the cruel episode and were showing the vivian irls espcially the two every kindness, and they in turn hoped the landelinian prisoners would be able to obtain forgiveness from their captors.ut despite the fact that every one of the vivian girls expressed their will willingness to forgive and forget, the officials of the court marshall decided and did bring to trial with the purpose to punish by death all the prisoners concerned in the distressin experiences of the vivian irls.N t being able to save them from p n punishment the vivian girls however managed to save the lives of the rebels who had tar and feathered them, and they were punished in the same way instead o and then let loose to go ti to their own rebel lines in that same condition.

[illegible] and he had been gazing at one of them and looking behind and lighting a cigar when something happened.Probably he had met with some curious accident and had fallen. gathering himself j up the general stood on his feet and was about to move on when he suddenly caught sight of something opposite him that sent srush of cold blood to his heart.

NORMA RUN SERIES. NO. TWO.

It was on the last day of March that general Zimmermann learning of the results of the advance of his other armies, and of their being attacked at Flanders and Cesanna Hogan had in the meantime collected many different commands untill he had obtained a monsterous army and so being determined to move on Madge Evans and Julo Callio he advanced against the landelinians under general johnston johnston Jackon Manley and it was sometime during the early part of that day that a battle of the most terrible description raged with the greatest violence ever known in any battle before. As soon as he had his divisions ready he sent them forward under general Noro ivianin and covering the attack with his artillery his columns rushed to success at a breath as it seemed accumulating great force and hurling themse v themselves upon the gray lines in grent force and fury and the woods and plains for the extent of twenty miles was swept with the almost preternatural bosom of carnage and destruction. Only fourty minutes had elasped since the attack began when ten thousand cannon made their horrifying appearance and committed great and dreadful slaughter among the christian columns leaving death and desolation in their wake taking heavy toll of human and animal lives as the christian cavarly also charged in heavy numbers.

Then fatal news of the approach of overwhelming disaster of war which left mourning and misery in its wake was sent out after the terrific charge was repulsed by signal stations all along the line. It had been a terrific clash between the opposing forces which swp swept over the plains back and forth, and the wildest rumors concerning the fate of the many fallen was also added by the news that general ivianins force was torn in pieces in those two hours/ for in the first terrible onslaught that occured divisions of men numbering hundreds of thousands singly had been torn to pieces and heaps of corpses and mangled limes miles long were left to tell the tale of the enemys irrestible fury as they repelled the desperate and furious christian charge. Two divisions belonging to general Consentinian Aronburgs(Whilimsburger Zimmermann) and under the leadership of another Aronburg with his assisting general Double Day Federal had been reported by various commanders to be almost prostrated with exhaustion of their efforts to cover their retreat against the crushing pressure of the gigantic and extending counter onslaught of the landelinians under general Pemberton Jensin whose troops had advanced with the violence of a tornado only to be repulsed By Zimmermanns main batteries The whole region of the battle field was then again transformed into a vast scene of death and destruction as Zimmermann threw another force forward to the assault. For a long time the desperate assault of the christians swept everything before it the enemy's fire however tearing the biggest brigades to pieces and temporarily stopping their headlong onrush, but the christians again carried all before them, and crushed the landelinian front for the extent of five miles. Hundreds of thousands more were killed or wounded in this second desperate onslaught and picture the hprrors of this mighty battle as the onslaught for a time overwhelmed the largest landelinian columns crushing them to fragments, the enemys line being engulfed by the raging abalanch of raging or furious Concentinians and Abbiesnnians. Oh the horrors. The bodies of horses, had been sent flying through the air in fragments of flesh by the violence of shell explosions which rained thick and fastemong the christian columns.

General Manley driven desperate by the outcome sent general Federal to stop the attack and his troops struggled with superhuman vehemence to hurl back the christian assailants amid the million cannon like roar of battle his cannons blowing hundreds of christian soldiers to bits at every discharge poor torn tabernackles of human beings. The line of christian assailants however being sixteen miles long and in seried waves each a mile long had swept upon the whole force under general Federal and hurled his troops back for the distance of two miles from their position rendering hundreds of cannons usels useless and killing scores of thousands who remained to resist their onward tide. Onward the christians advanced in indescribable numbers of men in purple with their wicked pikes and bayonets which injured an appalling number of foes and taking fearful numbers of lives.

The battle centered fully along the trenches in front of Jennie Turner.And the once beautiful plains in front of Jennie urner over which the battle line surged was now in the grasp of the worse horror ever experienced since the battle of Mo- ollester Run and when the reports of the wars horrors soon reached the nations of the world it stunned them. Reliable officers placed the numbers in killed during the first two onslaughts of the christians as 995,000 but greater numbers of almost unbelievable disasters trickled in from remote sources. Many of the Landelinian divisions had been overwhelmed by the storming assault and only the means of desperate resistance resistance and by training thousands of guns upon the assailants was general Federal able to throw the Angelinians back once more with their line again shot to pieces.

But new assaults were made and the progress of the bloody battle rolled onward with fearful force lashing the scene of battle into a mad hell of screaming fury, and here it may be entirely observed that our gentle readers can have no idea of the almost preternatural fury which the storm of Landelinian yells infused in their deafening and appalling roar. Even the tremendous and universal clamor of the battle was indescribable, and not even the screechings and howlings of the worse legions of barbarians or de ons could compare to the terrific yell of the wicked Landelinians. The crushing storming assault number three swept upon the entire foe line under general Federal, Aronburg and Double-Day-Federal hurling their forces forward with terrible violence and this assault lasted a little over the time that the other two did and general Francis Wienstiens Landelinians on the right were struck about the same time but sad to say the assault was again repulsed.

All the time during the savage encounter of the third assault strange rattlings filled the air and deafening and fearful was the savage earsplitting roar of cannon and musketry and as the Landelinians advanced to make a counter chargesthe whole retiring christian line was suddenly obscured in smoke but nevertheless the foe pressed them back but did not assault as they only repulsed the christian attack. The loss in lives among the Landelinians was still more appalling and more frightful was the numbers of injured and dying which strewn the ground everywhere.

After a lull of about half an hour a great force of Landelinians under general Chuck struck against the christian line under general Standby like a gigantic wedge with the intention of breaking zimmermanns lines in two.

After the Landelinians started attacking in all their ferocity the battle made a million of various deafening sounds the Landelinians rushe rushing forward with great rapidity and general Marcus Halls Landelinians who also joined in the terrific onset was galled by a christian fire of great intensity whole regiments each consisting of div five thousand men being annihilated in a fr few minutes as they came within range, and so frightful was the heavy toll of Landelinian lives that their columns mangled to pieces again withdrew with Marcus, Chuck and Hanson Turner among the wounded.

On the christian side general Sherlock Highland and watersonnia was wounded. General Heenia Heddens Angelinians had sustained the main force of the enemys attack but fortunately there was not such a terrific loss of lives among these christian columns as there was among the enemys but general John Callen Zimmermann, Mc-Hollestines, and wienstien Sanders had witnessed the frightful havoc among their own lines, where hell had seemed to retain its fury and horror for four hours without abatement, but he and his two aids had finally managed to press forward crushing the Landelinian assailants and rolling up their line in the wildest confusion. Along these christian lines over five hundred thousand had been killed and wounded in these four hours along Wienstiens line along, one hundred thousand of these a being among the dead and along Double-pay-federals lines over one hundred thousand more had fallen but the number of injured it could not as yet be found out.

For nearly five hours already the appalling tumult of the battle had continued and now the enemy were recoiling recoiling along this point the foe having been crushed to fragments and routed. Half an hour later an assault of the most disasterious effects had been rolling forward upon Mc-Hollestines line for about half an hour more amid the most dreadful carnage and never before in all the histories of great wars was there such a terrific slaughter on both sides the enemy sweeping upon his whole line seemingly in titan throes and hundreds of thousands more fell and his lines had been made almosta helpless wreck untill reinforcements came and more artillery which rolled back the assailants with fearful losses. The fury of this assault of the enemy had torn Mc-Hollestines line to pieces and many of his guns had been taken by the enemy during the onslaught and only were retaken when the enemy was repulsed.

Along his lines heaps of bodies were exposed to view and the obscene sight of death and destruction could give only a faint idea when an enemy like wicked Landelinia, an enemy of God and all his Holy creatures and all christianity itself, and the beautiful, when fully aroused to her highest pitch can do.

Simultaneously to this assault a great one was thrown upon general John. Callens. Zimmermanns line. Two of his best columns supported by Aronburg and double-day-federal had been almost annihilated during the first part of this onslaught.The battle had rolled back and forth with the fury and noise of a million avalanches of hell. The Landelinians in their desperate storming charge had ploughed their way through Arch Aronburgs and Double-Day-Federals lines leaving nothing but death in their furious path of attack before they were also finally driven back by heavyl reinforcements.

The death list was one hundred thousand in Arch Aronburgs columns alone and nearly I65,000 in double-pay-Federals where two hundred cann-n had been captured by the enemy and which had cost great loss to be retaken.

been gazing at one of them and looking behind and lighting a cigar when something happened.Probably he had met with some curious accident and had fallen.

Gathering himself up the general stood on his feet and was about to move on when he suddenly caught sight of something opposite him that sent a rush of cold blood to his heart.

Even many hundred general officers and others on of lower rank whose names were withheld were either killed or wounded and general Arch Aronburg had a narrow escape from being wounded himself. No one could ever imagine a more terrible sight for a battle before. The renewed onslaughts of the enemy had more terrific force, there being four of them and each lasted an hour. For a time during the fourth attack the enemy had drove in so hard against the christian line that the assailants had swept everything before them rolling up general Wienstiens right wing with dreadful slaughter. Indeed it was a frightful battle and all the efforts of the enemy were thrown in to force the christian army back but in vain. governor General Hedda also recieved a great onslaught which after it was repulsed inundated the fields and plains in dead and wounded Landelinians. This was the most frightful onslaught ever seen and which still raged ff the other christian generals who had such big forces at hand could only picture the oh horrors of the mighty onslaught that was going on they would have realized what a battle was. The carnage extended along a front of seventeen miles and general Heddas right wing was threatened with annihilation and worse yet many of his officers had fallen and he d needed aid very badly, and afraid that he could not hold out much longer aid was sent to him by general Concentinian Aronburg.

The horrible onslaught of the enemy indeed swept the whole christian line under general Hedda with its most terrific fury. during the fourth desperate assault which raged on with unabated fury and which became general many of the mightiest christian columns tried again and again amid the most terrific slaughter of the battle yet to overwhelm the rash assailants the onslaught of the enemy s being so strong that thousands of the best regiments had been reduced to fragments and after the battle the greatest misery prevailed among the terribly wounded lying in the battle field for many long hours even after the great conflict had ceased. However though for a time the assault was apparently successful it made the worse carnage ever seen since Sunbeam Creek and the christian divisions under general wickey Lansin seemed to have fallen into a smoky chasm of hell from their firing but the enemys line assaulting his was shot and torn to pieces, and though the foe was finally repulsed at this quarter general wickey Lansin was killed, though a portion of his line was annihilated. Soon however the Landelinians advanced in full force to make a fifth assault and again they rushed forward with the most tremendous fury and now so loud was their terrific devil yell that it seemed as if hum hundreds of millions of demons possessed the woods and air, and like before, the very christian lines itself. All the christian commanders stood appalled as the intense million cannon like roar of explosions broke out from mines which smote their ears like the bursting of the inside of the world.

Only in a few minutes there was a terrific surge of men in gray like some mighty typhoon wave and the Angelinian force was suddenly torn apart by an almost preternatural rush of greycoats, and thousands upon thousands of soldiers, outside of the trenches, or inside, or among their guns fell dead, under a maelstrome of clubbed guns, tumultious clanging ob bayonets and whirlwind of sabres and pistol blows. It indeed was a most sublime hand to hand fight ever seen in the war and hundreds of low officers were also killed and wounded anew, the Angelinians striving with the utmost desperation and greatest energy to press back their assailants whose yells were now worse than the damned legions of hell, and which made the Angelinian combatants almost deaf. Soon two brigades of Angelinians were shattered, but still the survivors confident that the main force would hold their own ground like spartians, even using their fists, chocking each other, kicking each other, and even trying to tear each other with their finger nails, and biting like savage dogs. Time and again regiments of the foe utterly overpowered and outnumbered would be scattered but they would only go at it again few in number as they were and indeed the brave hearty Landelinians never witnessed such furious resistance which indeed as they knew and could see would also make this assault of theirs a severe repulse. But still they fought on determined not to give way under any conditions untill their commanders ordered them to do so.

Thousands of ranks of Angelinians were shot down, men by scores of thousands were wounded and scratched, bruised and maimed in the cho chaoes of weapons of every description that swirled and fell. For a time now the enemy indeed seemed to be pressing their advantage. The furious hand to hand fight with the clashing of musket butts together, of tremendous clattering fire, and the ring of steel on steel indeed was dreadful and the foe surge s resembled a furious sea streaming over a rocky shore during a hurricane. such a wild scene of destruction of lives, the tumultious bayonets, firing and confusion of the combatants could not be correctly described.

Thousands of men were literally torn in pieces and hacked to pieces, and the enemy though hurled back time and again would go at it again like hells rushing ocean of screeching legions. Indeed the enemy being so stong in numbers had rushed with the most incredible fury upon the christian line and the christian generals Beldon Hanson Aronburg, Kauffmann and James Marcusian whose commands were almost reduced to or fragments were killed. however the assault was in vain. Though whole divisions of christians had been hurled from their positions, reinforcements always arrived, zimmermann having plently of reserves to throw in at any point needed, and amid the wild and savage fury of the struggle the christian forces now rushed forward to make a desperate counter assault cutting the enemys line to pieces and making the battle scene dre dreadful in appearance. The battle along this point continued in this frightful state for a long time without the slightest abatement and when it finally but gradually subsided for another brief lull it was heard plainly along other b parts of the line. The total loss in killed and wounded during these five onslaughts all put together could not be originally stated but the larger number of troops were crushed by the impact of the assailants, and to these columns which sustained the worse fury of the desperate attack had recieved such losses that fresh troops had to be thrown in to their supportIn this story no death or destruction can be compared with any other battle during the first year of the war except Calvarine or Hemmollester Run. It was indeed unapparalled and even exceeded the battle of Hemmollester Run and gunboat Crook. And no thunder could outrival the horrible crashes of the high explosives thrown upon the whole scene by the glandelinian batteries which covered the onslaught of the wicked glandelinian soldiers.

During a lull in the battle of Jennie Turner great and new concentrations were started among the main line of the enemy. One of the new and desperate onslaughts struck against the christians under general Calmaurinin scathing his whole line and damaging many of his best guns which he aint entirely relied upon. Several other glandelinian columns advancing in parellel coom columns had advanced upon his right and another terrible scene of battle was raging again along general Aron Arob Aronburgs line but the result of the onslaught was not decisive but it had been of terrible violence and lasted twenty seven minutes. This repulse however was followed by another desperate onslaught but which did not make itself present at any other point of the christian line just then, but this dreadful onslaught pressing on like some gigantic steam roller in its violence struck general Phel Phelantonburgs columns of Abyssinkilians crushing his line to atoms, but the onslaught had lost some of its force as it reached his main right wing, and so in the end he was able to repulse it. The same surge of glandelinians extending far struck general Boykings line and also here the most terrible slaughter occured. The battle was terrible along his lines at this point, and it was believed to have been the most extensive and bloodiest assaults made during the battle at this section. As the enemy came caressing over the plains plains which were swept by a storm of shells the enemy drove a straight course and supported by their artillery fire. As the main part of the onslaught struck, nearly a whole main line of the first assaulting column was annihilated by the sudden fury of the christian fire, which blazed horrid trails of death and destruction among the assaulting lines reaping the most grim harvest of lives ever seen. The surviving columns of glandelinians however had increased the rate and speed of their charge, and struck the christian line in the fullest fury and many of the christian brigade commanders once again suffered great loss, and even, divisions, corps, battalions and cavarly forces at the very outset of the charge collasped before the enemys terrible sledge hammer drive like the melting of snow banks.

General Beppo Lansinia on the christian side had been wounded and half of his command had been wiped out for very few escaped in his command which sustained the full force of that headlong onslaught. The desperate assault still progressed forward, t and the terrible firing having already reaped a harvest of glandelinians for the extent of ten miles in lenth, caused the enemy to swerve their advance a little more tward the other christian columns not yet engaged, and these advanced against the christian division under general Henry Agathia. The uproar of the battle now was appalling in the extreme, and at one point the enemy rushing upon the christians with the next and deadly precision of some ondinopent mowing machine struck general poden ghamberlanes division, and here they carried all before them. The christian ninth corps and ten brigades under general Evans St clare were torn to pieces, and the divisions under Prue, Chamberline, Poseinia and Topsy were galled beyond description, and the other columns were fairly swept away before the onrush.

The whole of general Evans St clares command and Chamberlines within the space of three ququarters of an hour had beencrushed and driven back from their position.

Simultaneously as the glandelinian columns struck the christian line under general Peterine both sides became like a stream of demons which surged back and forth in all their fury, and indeed seemingly clouds of musket butts, sabres, bayonets, and pikes, seemed to parry, thrust, slash, clash against each other, and in fact whirl in all directions. Still advancing with their scathing fury shattering every christian brigade that opposed them the glandelinians progressed onward. All the strongest brigades were torn in pieces adew and no one could in even a very long time coul count all the dead and injured which were buried here and the uproar of the dreadful clash deafened the poor injured for life The enemy had been enraged by the desperate resistance of the christians and had charged again and again upon the christian position and though whole brigades had been wiped out the survivors had finally gained the works and had swept the christian line from the position at this section, but suffered untold losses. Anew hell itself had seemed to spent its fury here as nothing was seen along this portion of the battle line but myriads of bodies, thousands of bro broken guns of all description, and many disabled and broken cannon, and on the works itself the hundreds of thousands of fallen glandelinians seemed to have been piled ridges high. Indeed scenes of the most horrible description and horror was exposed to view at this point where the bodies lay the thickest. Here the dead numbered 923,564...

been gazing at one of them and looking behind and lighting a cigar when something happened.Orobably he had met with some curious accident and had fallen. Gathering himself j up the general stood on his feet and was about to move on when he suddenly caught sight of something opposite him that sent srush of cold blood to his heart.

A very serv severe portion of the battle along general Whilliamsburger Zimmermanns center raged with all the violence a battle could rage. The furious advance of the enemy who were gobonites were noticed by Jennie Turner and Angoline Pichee and only by them was Zimmermanns center warned in time.The two little girl spies had realised that they could nit not reach the main christian line in time, but they notified the men of the nearest of the signal stations which were on the christian center, and from this reason the christian center was well prepared and the christian guns poured a perfect curti curtian fire tearing the Glandelinian columns to pieces as they sn swarmed to the attack. The enemy however through driven into confusion rallied, and resumed the attack with unbelievable fury and the immense divisions of general Be ppo Lansinia Abyssinkilians were assaulted at the same time that Jennie Tories hill was carried the full force of the attack at this point for a time carrying all before it untill the extensive gray line suddenly bending tward the northeast encountered a reserve force of christians which made a counter attack w the christians bearing down everything in their path cutting wide swaths in every Glandelinian column and driving the foe back in panic.

It was also along general Kauffmanns christian line where the battle started its main career of horror and damnation. Not a christian column along this point of the battle field stood their ground without being shattered. The whole christian line was scathed the enemy advancing onward pressing it back inch by inch and terrible was the destruction among general Vivian Wickeys columns. All that was left of his command was mere remnants. Hundreds more of various christian commanders and even chief generals witnessed the force of these desperate onslaughts of the enemy. General Charoles Dolores brigades were wiped out and now the main line of the enemy as it advanced with all its appalling fury gaving a horrifying display of musketry firing.

A big column of Glandelinian hordes just missed general Confections lines, but the main line of the enemys assaulting column hit him however but did not do as much damage as they recieved, and the assault was gradually repulsed along his lines. Another glandelinian column however o moving forward in the formation of a serpent with its head thrown far back hit the christian line under general Johnston Din crushing his foremost columns to fragments within twenty minutes, but reserves saved the day and finally he wa was able to cause his desperate assailants to gradually recede though he himself fell severely wounded just as the Glandelinians retired.

General Gretchens brigades and ninth corps supported by seven battlions and seven parks of artillery was also struck with terrible violence by an asult of sledge hammer force but the enemy drew back and c after committing incapable damage. The loss of life was terrible among the main christian center. Every christian column under his command was sha shattered to pieces and one hundred thousand perished on both sides. Seventeen brigades had been crushed to pieces, sixteen other brigades were also thrown back from their positions and here nine hundred thousand had fallen entirely and of all of the christian columns at this point only two hundred and fifty thousand escaped unharmed. But nevertheless all the very glandelinian columns had shattered themselves against the solid christian line and out of one hundred thousand of each twenty brigades of assaulting glandelinians only four thousand returned so many of them having been killed or wounded. Hundreds of thousands were lying outstretch outstretched on the ground cannons of heavy calibre and big machine guns were dashed a thousand yards in shapeless wreck by shell explosions, even thousands of human beings and animals were literally lifted into the air by the severe concussions, and dashed stunned and bleeding to the ground. However the glandelinian columns formed into solid wedge lines and extending to a stpuendous length resumed the assault with redoub e redoubled fury. General Anninnas's massive columns of Abyssinkilians extending to the extreme east of Jennie turner sustained the worse fury of the main onslaught it being the southeastern boundary of the battles death strewn course and here the christians gave the fiercest resistance slaughtering the enemy in a terrible manner and general Zimmermann had been amazed of the enemys dreadful repulse along this point, the general declaring that this line of Abyssinkilians had sustained the full force of the onslaught.

This was the greatest mystery that ever confronted general Whilliamsburger Zimmermann and even then some other officers had the belief that the assault never happened, or that the enemy missed the Abyssinkilians because they were in a thickly wooded region but the very scene before them indeed told them that a battle of fearful fury had raged there, and there could be no denying it. Indeed Zimmermanns question was; "How were they spared from great losses, when all the other christian columns had literally been crushed to fragments."?

This was literally the strangest mystery of his life. It was along the solid line of the fourty ninth corps defending the Trscian plains where the gnemys assault seemed to swerve still ore to the northeast. with all their fury the glandelinian columns stormed forward with the most terrific yells, and here after the assault was repulsed after a number of hours of frightful carnage was left nothing but a sea of dead and wounded glandelinians and many windrows of dead and wounded christians.

The battle was a regular hell of destruction for it looked if some great and terrific typhoon had swpt the region in in all its force for nothing but ruin, death and desolation was left within the confines of the plains borders and here many more hundreds of thousands of soldiers had been killed and wounded.....

easily. no that must never be. hey assembled together and was ing to move forward to take the little girls when so their surprise them suddenly on the fleeting foe came and away went the little girls

Here whole armies in their onslaughts and in surging back and forth in a parellel of horror had been torn to fragments and the earth of the plains itself was literally goughed with immense shell craters from mine explosions and here was predicted the greatest loss along the lines of the opposing forces and the most terrible destruction of the whole battle. Those generals who witnessed the desperate onslaughts of the furious Glandelinians declared that this immense onslaught was as terrifying a sight as ever met the eyes of man. It was even more awe inspiring that the worse tidal wave, even a volcano in eruption. Several portions of the desperately assaulting lines were indeed fanned shaped and the christian lines seemed to fill the wooded region with smoke as of a forest fire so fierce was the discharge of artillery and musketry the roaring being heard for scores of miles. One of the big minor Glandelinian waves passed through the Trecian woods on the extreme right but it never came within two hundred yards of the christian lines as three quarters of this whole column had melted away before the terrific christian gunnery. The right of the main portion of the assaulting wave had seemed to have the shape ofvtwo long angler wedges and soon formed to the shape of two gigantic gray wings with a body in the middle and which appeared like a sinister gray monster of some awe inspring dragonic specimen of hell. Those had spread out and some points even had come on with the greatest and most appalling fury, and then rushed forward with soathing violence. Speeding onward amid the withering roar of millions of musketry along an opposing line of ten miles the eight mile length of Glandelinian surge struck against the christian line hundreds of thousands of Glandelinians pouring through the woods but all who advanced though these woods were threatened with annihilation by the terrible tempest of shell fire and musketry and also from machine guns. The main line despite allthe havoc struck the thickly wedged christian line the firing on both sides repeating with redoubled fury, and the loss of lives among the soldiers was not know as yet..General Mc-Hollesters headquarters was blown to pieces by two high explosive shells and where he and four others were killed the glass stopper of a large decanter was broken off but the bottle was left unhurt. Black mud covered the walls although no such mud could be found anywhere in the neighborhood. Light pictures were left hn hanging on the walls of the wrecked building whose roof and several parts of his walls was shattered and blown awat. A lamp was left standing on the counter and the lace shades were not even touched though the building was shattered beyond redemption. A number of beds and mattresses were blown away and dropped in Heddas lines. Many heavy wagons and carriages were blown away and to bits and even at general Zimmermanns headquarters the sh shells tore off the front wall of the house leaving a sign which read;

"Good night. Sleep right."

One great explosion drove a weather boarding lath and plastering of a barn across two rooms of another building, while the force of the same explosion simultaneously drove a large foundation stone through the weather boarding laths and plastering of general Viensteins head headquarters across five rooms a distance of three hundred feet and lodged it through and into a rear wall of bri brick and concrete without even breaking a corner of the stone. So great was the velocity that the laths were cut smoothly without cracking the adjoining plaster. By the same high explosive shell which blew the barn to pieces many large boards were driven into the ground and straws were also found driven into barks of trees.

The battle had ended as a total christian victory the enemy in the evening abandoning everything in a rout cannons and provisions and wagons of all sort the battle having raged fully ten hours in which over 9,456,666 christians had fallen dead and wounded, and where over II,866,997 Glandelinians had fallen and on both sides were ten thousand officers of all ranks which were killed and wounded. General Hanson and Robert Vivian had recently before the great battle sent poor violet and her sisters on a important message to general Zimmermann and they had went through a harrowing experience during the battle a as they reached the lines after having traveled for three days and nights and persued by foes of al kinds for an incessant stage. Within sight of violet and her sisters the attacks of the enemy had went on the uproar of cannon and musketry almost deafening them and indeed to them the yelling of the infuriated enemy sounded to them like a hundred million demons let loose everywhere and many times violet and her sisters tried desperately to get away from such a scene of terrific slaughter but had been seen b men caught in a preternautral whir whirl of bayonets and weapons of all kinds hundreds falling dead all around and indeed Violet and her sisters had seen divisions after division recede mangled and crushed and the survivors were o scratched brusied and maimed slightly in the chaces of whirling muskets and bayonets that swirled and fell. Angeline Richee Jennie' turners friend who had escaped without injury as well as her friend saw before the outbreak of the main attack a large stream of Glandelinians many miles long and hardly before they realized the treacherious character of the final assault there came the roar of musketry and artillery which grew more and more intense as the fury of the battle r progressed.

"It indeed was an evil omen." Said Angeline Richee as she and Jennie Turner were with the vivian girls for a while after the battle." It was about twenty minutes after the one hundred and seventeenth assault of the enemy that I saw the main line of the advancing with the irresistible fury of a thunderbolt. As the Glandelinians were advancing their line began to spread out and expand in the most appalling manjer, and twenty minutes later out whole line was involved in the most terrible carnage and I could not count the gaps and explosions I saw among the enemys long line of assault, a dreadful unearthly indescribable roar stunning not only me but my friend as well. So thick was the powder smoke that for a long while everything was blotted out of our view& and the only thing we saw were angry streams of flashes from the many cannon and musketry and no terrible was the scene that at times I believed it looked as if the terrible Eye of God had appeared on the battle wscene. Convulsive and torn masses of the foe at times appeared through the smoke haze but to fade away ag ain. Indeed such a scene of carnage for a time almost prostrated me and my friend with horror, and truthfully I tell you if we did not have our hearts in our mouths or at least feel that way I'm a liar. The bursting shells made flashes through the smoke as if it were some great thunder cloud were angry sky splitters would shoot in all directions. The din was wild and earsplitting to me, the smoke suffocating, and the sudden extending of such a battle line was unaccountable and frightful. For a time after we got away from the scene we could not stir or see our way so thick became the curtain of powder smoke but we made out way as best as we could. While we were grouping our way in the dense smoke, coughing, chocking and hasping for air, we heard a strange humming sound over head far above which continued and gre louder and louder untill it swelled to a horrible screech which made our hearts leap and bound with the greatest terror and horror. What it was we well know, and for God's sake how we hoped and prayed that it was not headed for us.

But it was. We managed to save ourselves by diving flat on our faces and then all around in front of us appeared something like a volcanic eruption suddenly bursting out of the ground and we were almost stunned by the sound. We were stormed with fragments of earth and stones untill almost covered with it.. Then something like a screaming squall broke around us immediately afterwards which we knew was the tremendous storm of fragments thrown everywhere by the gang-gangshell. In the distance the roar of the battle had increased to redoubled fury and everything in the direction of the christian lines seemed to be a storming ch chaces of horror and bloody slaughter. I even heard sounds like the ripping of canvas, and the smell of sulphur was in the air.

The curtain of smoke thinning somewhat by the force of the recent blast of explosion I saw behind me something like the banks of moving gray figures advancing across the region which one of the officers afterwards told me had been the grounds of Mc-Hollaster Run, then they seemed to go away or drop as it were all at once, and again everything was obscured by smoke. Indeed everything was in the greatest uproar. As we were watching the scene there was all of a sudden right before us only a hundred feet a dazzling sheet of light which almost blinded us, and which seemed to rend the sky following something like the crash of a volcanic eruption while simultaneously there was a tremendous roar that seemed to me was splitting the earth before us, then came a sensation as if somebody had been putting their hands down my throat and trying to pull my lungs out through it. Simultaneously we were prostrated by the shook the roar of this explosion being so near that it seemed to be ten times worse than the din of the worse thunder roll I ever heard. At the same time while we were lying there gasping for breath and feeling the acute senses of suffocation a hundred trees in the twinkling of an eye was sent creening to the ground in twisted wreckage and then as a score of more trees went down were we were pelted by a terrific rain of earth and debris of all kinds which came down upon us in a perfect shower while for a time from the monsterous cloud shooting upward and spreading outward a strange slight darkness settled soon to give place to light once more. Before we had been fully thrown to the ground by the concussion of the mine explosion we saw a number of bodies hurled into a chicken house in a yard opposite where we were lying and which had been torn to pieces with its a walls scattered to the four winds by the concussion. It was fortunately we did escape the maelstrome cloud of flying wreckage although we were rolled twenty yards by the concussion of another mine explosion elsewhere the two of us getting up to find ourselves after the shock each attired in a cho chicken coop which had been blown over our heads, and w which several soldiers had to break board by board before we could be free from them. It was certainly a terrible experience for us as well as an extraordinary one and if we can held help it we will never go too near a battle line again without necessary cause. Another great shell had missed us as we still grouped through the smoke laden atmosphere, and with an unearthly wail and moan had passed through the distant trees we could see dimly standing through the pall of smoke, heard the rending of timbers as the shell in its swift velocity broke branches and tree trunks, then another deafening and piercing shriek, followed by a crashing roar/ that sounded like some explosion inside the base of a volcano and dimly I saw a score of trees go down followed by a storm of earth which rained down upon us half burying us under it. As we said before never again will be go too near the firing line unless necessity compells us...."

It was believed believed by the main christian commander who was standing the seige at Evan goline Grnia that general whilliamsburger zimmermann would not follow up his crushing victory with a further counter charge, but zimmermann was not a fool as he did not allow the enemy to stop continue the horrible carnage any longer. Zimmermann did follow follow up his crushing advantage. His armies crept forward in series of waves, tore the enemys lines to pieces, and within threehours or ore the whole glandelinian army was in a disgraceful rout, and zimmermann carried all before him.The routed glandelinian retreated so fast that Zimmermanns persuing army captured all of the enemys tanks, three large batteries of the largest guns, all of the enemys provision trains, and forced the enemy evn to abandon their light artillery.So close to the rear of the retreating Glandelinians was Zimmermann that they hardly were a hundred ya h feet apart during the whole retreat, and before the enemy finally succeeded in getting away by taking recess to the mountians near Evangeline Grania Zimmermann had captured a heavy toll of prisoners.The rout had been the worse kind the enemy had ever suffered, and never again was the enemy in a worse condition as this army was now. Zimmermann instructed his armies in the vicinity where the enemy halted, and watched every movement on the part of the glandelinian armies.

WHAT OCCURS AFTER THE BATTLE OF JENNIE TURNER.

The Glandelinian Stampede.

There are scenes in this great Glandico Abbiamma war tha t would startle everybody to hear or read about. The events already past ha are startling enough, but incidents which have occured afterwards are much more greater still. I have so far predicted the mighty violence of the many great battles, and of the thrilling times that the poor Vivian Girls have experienced. I have also predicted in as long a detail as possible the horrors of child slavery and the fercity of the wicked Glandelinian soldiery to the helpless.

There are only a handful of people in probably the whole wor I presume who have not read the harrowing story of "Uncle Toms Cabin." Those who have read the book are well acquainted with the conditio of the past negro slavery, how parents and children of negroes, nay husbands and wives were cruelly torn apart and sold, and only one out of ten of them had the good luck of being bought by a good master. Uncle Tom had two good masters and one bad one.

But among the Glandelinians there were millions of men, and hundred of thousands of child slave drivers who in wickedness and brutality would ma make Simion Legree look like Good Old St Peter compared to them.

cAnd not one child slave in Glandelinia, or among Glandelinians in Glaverinia ever had a good master though in some cases ba bad masters had become good and set their slaves free.

During the whole rebellion up to now the wicked Glandelinians had exerted their utmost to overthrow the christian invasion of Calverinia, and just now it seemed an impossibil t ity. It was a very glorious cause as the wiked wicked Glandelinians thought for should the Angelinian armies be overthrown their governments would go with them, then the Glandelinians could invade Angelinia and her other states and overthrow the whole of Christianity. It had been the intention of genera General John Manley after the sic seige of Julo Callio and Norma Catherine began by the christians to organize a great a army of rebels in Northern Calverinia which if formed should move down southward and crush the christian armies underunder general Whilliamsburger Zimmermann and thus revenge the defeat of his fathers armies at Jennie Turner.

During that time his own armies had been considerably inactive on account of losses sustained in the other battles just predicted, and there he could not withdra withdraw from the immediate vinicity on account of being closely watched by seven great christian armies. His armies had sufferedsuch heavy losses that he was appalled but not disheartened, but he was nevertheless very angry ever the slowness of the Glandelinian aurthorities in supplying him more men and provisions. Armies had been repeatedly dfra dra fted into service by the wicked King of Glandeliniabut Manley nevertheless complained that it wa not new armies he needed most but better generals and more supplies.

Nevertheless Manley had recieved all he wished for in armies, supplies ,a and general officers but nevertheless the christian armies were nearly always the larger.

Angelinia through the support of her states wa was ruchier ri h richer, she could afford good pay for the soldiersin the christian christian armies better arms, and provisions, and had noneed at all to draft men into her armies.Even now despite al the armies she did have in actual service Angelinia had many standing armies, and larges hordes of home gua gura guards, ad and desperate aman as he was Manley during the early part of the struggle had had no actual hopes of winning the rebellion as the christia christians had already proved to be the better hand on the fighting line. John Manley had felt bitterly disappointed when he heard the news of the defeat of his fathers armies at the battle of Jennie Turner and of Zimmermanns irrestible advance.

The city had early in the war held against the sieg seige of Hansons army and Manley knowing the fierce character of general Hansen Vivian did not understand how Zimmermann could accomplish wi what what Hanson failedto do. In many cases Manley felt sorry that the struggle had been started as he felt sure that in thelong run it would end with the christians victorious.

easily, so that must never be. [illegible]

to move forward to take the little girls when so their surprise them suddenly on the floating ice-cake and away went the little girls

Johnston Jacken Manley had felt the defeat himself, and cursing the luck that had befallen him, and blasphemed god some t hing fearful.He had tried his utmost to crush general Concentinian Grenburg, but he had failed, and his own armies had been crushed instead.At first immediately after t he battle, Manleys armies even then had been seriously handicapped, and Manley had all he could do to prevent a wholesale scattering of his army.He had sent all his generals everywhere along t he l ne to keep order among the br igades and divisions, corps nd other columns, and thus exerting his utmost , and doing as much in effort as his generals and other under officers, the retreat of his sadly beaten army had been remark ably slow and it had taken nearly all night after the battle before the retreat was well on the progress.But even then things began to happen exactly at nine o-clock in the evening.

I guess we all know that deep snow and mud and other slush intermingled with debris of trees and other materials is sometimes a great friend and companion of our's just when we don't want it around.It was so with Manleys arkies armies during even the beginning of the retreat after the battle of Jennie Turner.On account of the deep snow and mud also left by the recent incessant snowstorms and blizzards of the terrible winter, and of the overflowing of portion of the Stanok river just from too much slushy snow in the waters, Manleys armies at the start were compelled to leave about thirteen hundred cannon behind, which became stuck and mired in deep snow and mud clean up to the hub of the wheels.The most superhuman labor failed to dislodge them.Countless baggage trains and provision wagons were also stuck in the deep snow, and a hundred or more horses could not draw one out even with the pushing and pulling of the men.

And this trouble was complicated by the soldiers floundering in snow sometimes three to five feet deep in some places on the level, and then to still make it worse, bridgescover the slow filled river waters was broken down by the weight of snow only.and in their haste to escape the persuecing christian armies, milli ons of men had been compelled to swim across, and face the risk of being drowned or overwhelmed in the slush current and waters. given any Angelinian knows that though small as it is the Stanok river is the worse stream in t he ZAngelinian world in flood time.It's waters will cover hundreds of miles of ground after a severe melting stage of snow in the late spring aided by the heavy flood rains of the severe Calverinian thunderstorms that break out near the middle of pril, and it was just lucky that at this time the Stanok river had not as yet fully overflowed.

Yet by all this trouble Manleys army was almost completelydispersed, and by the time the army had succeeded in crossing the whole regions where some half frozen floods were, half of his army was far apart apart from the main body, one third of the westward section, had been captured by the persuing christians at ten oclock at night, and the Angelinians did not seem to mind the hald frozen flood or deep snow at all, and only the rest being too far prevented more disasters rs to the foe.It took some time after the army left the flooded region that a portion of the survivors could be brought together, and with hundreds of generals working desperately this required a two hours delay, and all this while his army was seriously handicapped, and badly harassed by the advancing christian armies.Manley of course was furious but he could not do a thing, and everytime his generals tried to reform some portion of the army t hey were either frustrated by the outbreak of some severe storm of a i minutes duration during the night, a storm of dangerous character or by a desperate charge of christian cavarly, and they were compelled to resume their precipit atw retreat.

Of course once bad luck begins it is certainly going to continur no matter how much you would like it, or even pray for it to cease.First with Manleys disabled army it was deep snow and mud mud along the rivers bank nd also too much water, and slush and intense below zro weather even for that time of March.It was more than 24 below.the second was something beautiful to behold. this came in the folo following morning.A part of his army during its retreat, was recrossing a portion of the Mic-Mollester river where it was so wide that the other shore cu could not be seen at all even with a te lescope of field glass, and checked with heavy slabs and fields of jagged ice floes, checked into one mountian of ice against a strong of heavy pontoon bridges, where they crossed from Madge Evan's junction.In their wild flight, too many soldiers were on the bridges or ice floes and cakes at once, and thus the result was that in a moments time nearly sixty thousand were drowned, while the rasainder of the hundreds of thousands of soldiers who had recieved their icy bath swam to the shore, all coated with ice, and now the river was smashed in the fleest ing wreckage of the bridges and ice floes, also baggage wagons, rifles, and all other stores and provisions.Indeed about four thousand precious cannons had e been dumped into the river by the collap collaps of the many pontoon bridges, beside more than five hundred provision and ammunition wagons, and a whole train of gun cassions, and nearly a miolion ro nds rounds of ammunition having been lost this way.Over this second disaster, and so earlybin the morning, Manley and his generals who witnessed it cursed and swore worsecthan the de mons in hell could do, and even blasphemed god mostwroully and evendefied him to cause the disaster again, when in truth it was not his faul t at all but the fault of his too reckless men.This [illegible] of course caused many long and unnecessary delays, and the near approach of the christian armies, drove most of the Glandelinians into [illegible] nternation, and now despite all his efforts and the efforts of all his generals, the retreat became a panicky rout.More cannons were left behind in this wild retreat, and this retreat since it had started had covered over fit fifty miles., nd during the dreadful retreat of the later part of the morning a blinding snowstorm accompanied by [illegible] gale of wind at the temperature of twenty four below, followed the other two troubles, the wind blowing like a hurricane, and at times the snow w t snowstorm turned into the most frightful tu thunderstorm ever thought of but with snow and no t rain.This added to the consternation of the wicked Glandelinians as men dropped by hundreds overcome by the intense cold and fifty five mile an hour wind, and from overwork in plowing through the deep snow.Manley(Manleys own personal baggage wagon during t he thunderstorm and snow got stuck in a snow bank ten feet gi high, which later on was turned into a mountain of snow from the forced force of the wind accumulating all the snow in that location, and though the most frantic efforts were made by s men and horses to pull it out it could not be done, and once when it was almost successful a flash of lightning struck and killed all the horses and men at work, demolished the wagon, and almost laid Manley out while he was directing the work.

Indeed always it was that nature seemed to be the main enemy of the Glandelinians. Probably it is true that Nature at God's will would do anything to make trouble for those who were, or who are enemies of god.

Twice during the mornings retreat, Manleys army despite the blinding blizzard had been almost surrounded by the christian armies, which at times were so close during the persuit, that a Glandelinian could talk without difficulty to a Glandelinian.

And as he was, Manley was also amazed at these occurances.He had failed on accou nt account of the collasping of the bridges to cross the Mic-Mollester river, which would have insured the safe retreat of his army, and now a great storm hindered the progress of his retreat.If it had only been a plain snowstorm it would not have been so bad, but it was not a snowstorm, but a blizzard with a wild wind windstorm arrongenough to blow to whi whole regiment of towns on off the map as to say, and accompanying the windstorm there was at times great explosions set off by lightning strucking ammunition wagons, and danger of his men being caught in torrents of flood tides of the river.Only by strategy did Manley manage to escape with his army in spite of the crazy storm, almost encircled by the Nationalis as they were, and so swift was the retreat of Manleys army armies that the christians had to persue so swiftly that not even their sleigh and horse and wagon transports could hardly keep up with the army go as fast as they will, and had to come on to say by leaps and bounds, and wild speeding, while baggage sleighs wagons, and others were kept at such a gait, that horses had to be changed every hour, to keep them from being overworked.It was not really a retreat, but a marathon race between the two great armies.

since the battle of Jennie Turner the retreat of general Johnston Jacken Manley's armies had not now continued for about seventy miles, and if you would believe it ow not had lasted for thirteen hours, and all this trouble.Think of it.but Good god, more was coming, and during the storm also.

Manley after a slight rally had with the helpvof his generals succeeded in getting a good portion of his army toget her, and was still retreating along the shore portions of the Mic-Mollester un River, when up to now the storm had been growing in fearful intensity, and the wind screeching like a thousand demons and roaring through the twisting writhing masses of trees of the woods like thunder.Indeed there had been during all this time of the mornings retreat most terrible stormy weather, the pouring snow mingled with great flakes as big as feathers, n and the waves of the river where the ice had broken up swamped the ground on the line of retreat, and so the soft rich snow covered earth of these grounds beyond the great and mighty river as every Calverinian knows was also like the Stanok River, admirably suited to the greatest manu facture of mud, and here at times the mud was of unfathomable depth, and here many roads were made of rough round logs and wide planks, and sometimes out of the rich soil itself the longs being arranged transversely side byside, and coated over in their pristine freshness with earth, ice, and whatsoever may come to hand, was now hidden by deep snow and ice, and then the jr rejoicing natives calleth it a road and straightway essayth to ride thereupone

In process of time hald l half blinded by the swirling q snow which now had as this a big ¸landelinian cannon went, the horses dragging it, stumbling along, making moral reflections as under the circumstances could be expected, the gun carriage proceeding along much as follows;----bump, bum-, bum- bump reversing their positions so suddenly as to come, without any accurate judgement makes a great muster among the three hundred and sixty horses pulling the gigantic purroit gun.After various ineffectual pullings and twitchings amid all kinds of cursing, and imprecations, and amid the uproar and swirl of the cyclone storm and just as the officer of the squad of the gun crew was losing all patience, the gun suddenly rights itself with a resounding boucn bounce, but then the muzzle goes down headlong into an abyss hidden by snow, this is then right, as the two wheels of the carriage goes down into another abyss, and soldiers all t umble promiscuously into the front seat into the drivers the drivers hats are jammed over their eyes and ngse quite unceremoniously, and they consider themselves fairly extinguished, the ¸landelinians trying to work witwith divers side plunges, and sswp compound shakes as if to shake you into the air, and they began to flatter themselves that they are not so badly off after all and that the gun will be brought safily through the quagmire of mud and snow.Ah at last, with a square plunge which puts all onto their feet, and down into the mud and snowalongside the carriage with the most incredible swiftness, the gun carriage stops, and after much commotion the leader of the horses appears before thr lieutenant.

''Please sir, it's powerful bad here this spot.I don't know how we are to get out.I'm a thinking we will have to be getting rails.''

 The officer despai despairingly get's off his horse, picking gingerly for some firm foothold, down goes one foot int into an immeasureable depth--hr tries to pull it up, looses his bl balance, and tumbles over into the deep snow and mud, and he is fished out in a very desparing condition by his orderly, and helped to a firmer sop spot.Rail fences half covered in snow by this time were pulled down and all efforts were made by this time, but neither gun or caession or carriage would budge being now s unk too deeply in mud and snow, and after much cursing and swearing it had to be abandoned.This same thing happens in the very same way to more than five hundred guns and their drivers and owners.

 Much of the retreating army had just as much trouble crossing these snow covered and hidden roads, and when finally they did get through, about half the number of men seemed so coated on their lower legs with slush mud and snow and snow all over their uniforms and hats that any one would have believed they were turning into snow men.

 Many baggage and ammunition struggled across these hidden roads but only one third their number got across, the remainder being stuck so fast that they could not be released.All this time the christian army was approach ing like a storm of its own, and hindered by these roads, trees uprooting to the ground by thousands, the fury of the storm and blinding murk of the wildly swirling snow "anley and all his generals and officers were frantic and even broken hearted.He and they had decided to try and make a sort of stand but so bad was the situation of the ground all over, that safe positions could not be formed in a moment, and to fight in a blizzard of such a crazy and ferocious nature was impossible, and the retreat had only to continue tward''God only

 Gathering himself j up the general stood on his feet and was about to move on when he suddenly caught sight of something opposite him that sent arush of cold blood to his heart.

''It was apparent to Manley by this time that general Consentinian Aronburg, who is nicknamed Whillismberger Zimmermann, was indeed the ''Terrible Aronvur of Crowley'' or the''Wrath of god'' as he was gener lly known to the wicked ¸landelinians, and so seriously handicapped was Manleys whole army, by the persuit, and terrible intensity of the storm and increasing wind and cold, that Manley was repentant that he had ever dared, to engage this ''Terrible christ christian dog'' in any general battle.It was probable oneof the longest and swist set retreats of any ¸landelinian army ever heard of so far, and probably one of the mostvdisasterous.

A portion of his army almost overcome by the intensity of the terrific blizzard halted at the town of Manuela but could not rally, and thence retreated in an hours time to the villiage of gastle won where a great portion of the christian army obscured by the dense snow murk had overlapped, and this force was surprised out of the murk and captured, their leader having fled to the wooded regions of the Mis-gollester ¸un and took shelter in an old abandoned house in which he hid.The house soon collasped from the force of the wind and he had a narrow escape with his life.

 In such a condition as it was now, with the storm growing still worse and the wind more stronger, it was now evident that Manleys army were dangerous for no ¸landelinians was ever known to bear hardships patiently, and for even the slightest trial, their word was''REVENGE''.But indeed this was no small trial.Most of the army on accou nt of this misfortune met with went through a hell of trials and suf srings.Thousands had in the morning perished from the cold, overcome by the storm, and killed by falling trees or caught in deep quagmires and hiden quicksands.so the ¸landelinians had been worked up to a frenzy of fury and desire for vengance, and as it was learned by signal h that the rau guard of thr main army was r retreating slowly tward the almost storm bound town of Zeigfield, the inhibatants were warned by telegraph to take their belongings and flee, before ty 3 the foe reached it and take the chances with the storm than with the fierce rebels.Because there was no telling what the ¸landelinians might do when worked up to such a frenzy, and when they would reach the town it was adyisable to leave immediately.Massacres of the most foul kind usually follows a ¸landelinian defeat of this kind, than if a ¸landelinian army win's a victory.

 This was evidently true, for thev ¸landelinians we re very dangerous now in fact, the whole army was dangerous, and though panic stricken there was a sure fact that some division of ¸landelinians would surely work hell.The retreating ¸landelinians reached the town alright just as the last of the inhabatants had fled, and soon despite the blizzard the whole t own was in flames,and the refuggees persued as if the hounds of hell were after them.The fugitives fortunately had gotten a good start ahead and as a port ion of the christian army knowing the danger had outstripped these ¸landelinians in this situation, the rer refugees we re soon rescued, and directed to the main christian columns.

Never once that whole day did the ¸landelinian army have a respite during the re treat, not even for one moment, and thousands of men every fifteen minutes dropped from exhaustion and from being overcome by the cold and facing the storm.
Trouble a complication of troubles occured, each being something worse than the other, and worse of all the persuing ¸ngelinians would even ruthlessly open fire upon the rear of the retreating ¸landelinian army and shoot down many soldiers and officers.The ¸ngelinians were more lucky than the ¸landelinians.
They were well used to mud deep snow, andthe fofury of blizzards and the Calverinian winters, they even rescued the baggage wagons, and other things which had become stuck in the mud and deep snow which the foe could not get out and even the big cannon abandoned in the snow drifts over the log roads had been captured, and also making a great and splendid collection of prisoners.

 General ¸hnston Jacken wanley had or did have an opinion that Whillismsberger Zimmermann was not as good a leader as general Hanson ¸vivien ir his brothe r obert vivian, or as general Jacksonia Evans was, and thus was t he reason that he had made the attempt to drive this mighty christian army from t he vinicity of Jennie urner.Now Manley had found out to his sorrow that general Consentinian Aronburg was one of the best and most able bodied christian generals knows, whi though not so high in rank as his two superiors was nevertheless a good deal better t han they, and no one could falsely boast of it eit her, for it was proved by zimmermann himself, not by word but by example and by his works and doings, and also by this splendid rout of so vast a ¸landelinian army.¸ince the retreat had continued up to tward noon yesterql
Manley now had a better opaniniojy opinion of general Consentinian Aronburg;
Ith.zimmermann had captured during the retreat about tn ten million prisoners and also scattered his whole army over a wide territory in endless rout and in a conglomeration of confusion.

 Sthe zimmermann had captured about six thousand five hundred big cannons two thousand two hundred baggage wagons, plenty of ammunition, and about three

hundred gun cassion s and which had not been abandoned by the foe either, but which had been taken by desperate forays of the christian troops through the panic stricken troops of the enemy.The Angelinians had also captured three thousand cannon which had been abandoned by the enemy, besides the ammunition and wagon trains, and this indeed made a good collect9oj.

3th.Zimmermann had pressed the pursuit with the most unwonted energy and speed and never in the war itself had a longer or swifter retrat of a glandelinian army been witnessed and during this swift retreat general Zimmermann had kept his army almost within touch of the retreating rebel forces. Then Manley realized that general whilliamsberger zimmermann as Aromburg calls himself was different from many other high Abbieannian and Angelinian generals and had a way of commanding an army that was indeed amazing.He was able to push his army undaunted through the worse snow drifts without a halt, he was able to push on unchecked by the worse of Calverinian storms, and not even the wild flood of the stanck river or this blizzard now raging cho checked for a moment the swift cyclonic advance of Whilliamsberger zimmermanns men.They advanced through all obstacles as if they were notthere, and general Fell Trentonia of the christian army once remarked;

"If general zimmermann was the main commander of all t he christian armies of Angelinia, the rebellion of the foe against us and all christianity would have been overthrown long ago!

During the retreat when ever occassion presented itself, the foe had thrown obstacles in t he way of the swift christian advance, such as cutting down all trees possible, or making flood conditions in the rear worse, or trying to make snow drifts deeper and more softer but all this did not in the least check the precipi a precipitated christian advance. advance.It was amazing indeed with all the trouble and hinderances in the way that the wicked glandelinian army was able to retreat as fast as it did in so short a time.Jennie urner is said to be nearly a hundred and fift y six miles northeast of the vinicity of Pandora Calvgrinia, and within that night and one half a day of continuous retreat the glandelinian army had reached the vinicity of Pandora but not too close to the city as it was strongly guarded and was another Angelinia Agathia in itself.The retreating for army was about sixty five miles southeast of this city, and hearing of the approach of the glandelinian army a large sect ion of the christian army in that location was soon also e joining in the persuit and before long had captured a large number of prisoners.

5 l soldiers on both sidew most of them had to fairly sleep during the night of the retreat at its start while advancing or retreating, and so many glandelinians were so completely exhausted from want of sleep that they dropped by tens per minute, and they of course were captured.At one occassion the advancing chid christians captured a whole part park of artillery, and twenty thousand horses which had been abandoned by the retreating glandelinians. Manley had lost during the retreat a whole legion of his beautiful battleflags and ones a whole cavarly squadron of Gargoylians who had tried to charge the christian were captured with all their officers.

During the retreat general Manleys loosses became unspeakably heavy and terrific in men, officers, and provisions, also ammunition and guns of all sorts.Also he lost many of his best carts and provision wagons, and also a whole myriad of tents and accountierments of all descriptions.

His retreating soldiers suffered intensely during the rout from the fierce cold and wind of the Calverinian blizzard and cold wave simultaneously and worse of all for the soldiers many of them had either worn thoworn their shoes t o pieces or lost them ent irely and were forced to tramp through the deep snow barefooted and suffer from frozen feet.All of his soldiers and even most of all his best officers were in rags, and it looked more like a vast army of tramps and hoboes retreating than a once splendid glandelinian army.

And the tortures the retreating glandelinians had to endure was indescribable indeed, and mostly all their generals shared their sufferings none being excepted, and general johnston Manley began to become desperate, and he decided that something must be done to check the swift persuit of such a relentless tidal wave of christian soldiery, or his whole army would literally cease to exist.To rally the army in such a e condition and in the face of such a storm without the expected arival of a new glandelinian army was as it seemed utterly impossible, and if the storm dontinued much longer the whole army he feared would be compelled to halt and even surrender, because it could not endu endure this any longer.Nearly every foot of the way of retreat was some kind of misfortune.sometimes it was quagmires of mud under the snow, and then i again it was the collaspe of poiteon bridges as on the fatal pie-Hollester gun river.

Then it was the catching of horses and big guns in muddy roads covered over by snow, and snow sloughs in the fields, and to make matters worse this would delay a portion of the retreat, and the christians would suddenly swoop dowj down upon h these trying to get their guns out of the bogs, and capture them, guns, horses and all.Therefore the result of the great battle of Jennie

Turner had indeed been very fatal.It seemed that nothing whatever could stop the christian advance and many times Manley felt inclined to mention that general Concentinian Aronburg was not playing the game of war fair.Athdestown a portion of his army had rallied by the fierce effort of their officers, but t hough they dest o destroyed a portion of the army of persuers coming upon them they could not stand long against the rest, and were for with routed once more and worse of all, all the artillery of general Ambrose Fuller's division was captured by the christians and general Ambrose Fuller wounded.One of the worse scenes of the retreat during the frightful blizzard was the stampede of a l r large herd of horses belonging to cavarly and artillery, and which in full speed struck out for the open country.The animals scattered, knocking down fences, trampling gardens under snow and cornfields.In their wake the country looked as if a hurricane had passed.The panic stricken glandelinians, also rersced through the streets of a number of small cities and towns, racing th streams through the streets and alleys for hours, and even hundreds of short cuts were taken by the foe, through, yards, fences, sheds, stables, and even clear through one barber shop.One of the squad of glandelinians elelected to take in its course a large barber shep, and they ris rushed through the front door and out the rear door of the shep where three men were being shaved.As the ferocious glandelinians burst down the front door and tearing down most of the front wall with them, the half shaved customers after drawing guns and firing at the nearest glandelinians tumbled out windows and the rear doors in wild fright!

Also some of the retreating glandelinians rased through a large livery stable but they could not hope to make defense against the christians in this fashion and these few were compelled to surrender.Two officers of the enemy were injured in fighting the ring leader of one of the christian divisions, but the Angelinians were exultant for they had captured canvass enough to make two hundred thousand big circus tents and had finally dro driven a large force of glandelinians into surrender at Winnp winnipeg an town a few minutes later.During the wild retreat of the wicked glandelinians a large force of rebels under general jumbo Snyder struck out for the center, of the big branch of the pie-Hollester run, generally known as the Annibell un and serious things happened.

Now when too tossed by wind and storm and filled with slushy snow the Annabell is a treacherious stream, not very wide probably only one mile and three hundred feet, but extremely deep with swift under currents of which even the best swimmers could find the greatest difficulty to swim against.

A mile below this glandelinian column was a dangerous rapids .The panic stricken glandelinians feeling the wild strength of the current, and swimming desperately realized they could make no headway, and they began yelling for help.There were no boats about, and the other glandelinians on shore could only run frantically along the snow covered banks throwing ropes and lines, and calling to their respective comrades.The trapped glandelinians fought fiercely to make the shore, and succeeded one by one.Their comrades who knew that each man that went over the rapids were doomed were desperate until the last drenched and half frozen soldier had made the bank--- only four hundred feet from the cascading waters.Had all or any of these sixty hundred thousand men been lost, their officers would have been held to blame bem blame for during blizzard storm the Annabell river was no stream in which t o allow soldiers to make an attempt at crossing without s means of pontoon bridges.Their officers could have easily controlled them and had seen to it that they retreated in another direction.As it was, six million glandelinians soldiers whochad waded into this treacherious stream had been in danger of being wiped out, and now they were in danger of exposure for their clothes being first wringing wet were now frozen to their bodies,even to make matters worse, so despite the fact that glandelinians are most dangerous when in such a land conditiion of state of affairs, christian soldiers had spied on the foe, and one spy who had broken through the retreating rebel lines had secured a good portion of Manleys intent ions of what he was going to do when the retreat could be checked.He was shot at several times when making his escape but wounded as he was and ha ing been hit by seven shots he ran into the pie-Hollester Stream close by.He could not be gotten out by any number of glandelinians on boats, and charged and killed every man of them naked handed who tried to approach him in boats.At last a volley of tremendous force was fired at him from the bank, but not a bullet touched him.Then the spy was reached by another glandelinian who swam after him, but the spy was a very streng man able to lift over two hundred pounds very easily with one arm, and he grabbed this glandelinian and hurled him to the ground on the opposite w ide a distance of one hundree feet with tremendous force.The glandelinian soldier was picked up with his ribs, arms legs, and neck broken.The spy also killed another soldier who tried to seize him by also grabbing him and hurling him against a good sized young tree with such force as to cause the tree to heave to t h the ground among other glandelinians.It was the work of an instant and this glandelinian soldier was crushed to death before the other soldiers could reach the enraged and wounded spy.and the spy escaped.

wer three hours more during the continuation of the swift ,landelinian retreat heavy pole and baggagecwagons wo rs toruned over by either bouncing down deep into hidden mud pudd/es or by the force of the winds.he o most peculiar incident during this time of the rer retreat happened at two oclock in the afternoon.An Angelinian officer had reached close to the rear of the ,landelinian army and having been driven wild by excitement his gigantic horse had become unmanageable, and though two landelinians clung to him with their bayonets jabbed deep into his side in an effort to bring him down, and throw the officer, the horse plunged through the wall of one of the negly erected tents belonging to the retreating ,landelinians shaking off the two ,landelinians, and kicking at them with her hind feet.,he horses eyes were red with blood lust and fierce urmerannins forming forming a line of skirmishers headed the foremost crowd of Retreating ,landelinians scurrying across a lot and through the snow filled street of a small abandoned town outside the fences, where they tried to rally and make a stands.Others led by three young officers, who were colonels formed a great circle about the horse ,and his frantic rider, with the purpose that the horse and his rider might be headed off if he turned tward the other ,landelinians.

with him and his horse however were other fierce cavalry men, and these for three hours spent their time in burning large abandoned tents, overturning immensely heavey tent poles, and capturing many more baggage wagons, and other provisions.Onware, and onward, this fierce squadron of christians pressed, capturing many more prisoners.One of the squad of horsemen hitched to their own horses to a cage like wagon and hurled it a distance of thirty feet, through the deepest snow drift to safty and for their own purpose of use.

At the same time one portion of the troopers started for a squadron of parcially rallied ,landelinian mounted men whocwere Gargoylian ,urds, but the snarling ,landelinians with their long sabres drawn prepared for fight scared the small force of off.Seven or eight thousand of the ,landelinian cavarly outside the retreat zone did not realize that indeed the whole of Manleys army was in a panicky retreat and which so far was handicapped by the raging storm and utterly beyond control.A small tent was knocked over in a desperate fray, and the horses of persuecing cavarly men in crossing over and stamping over every square foot of the flattnend flattenedo canvass killing a number of ,landelinians who had taken refugee in it.Time and again the small body of ,landelinians cavarly charged upon the tormenting christians and the horsemen escaped some of the rushes of the christians by dashing quickly in all directions.

Once or again at the same time a large cavarly force of Tripoligonlians rushed for a great wi six pole top in which over seven hundred of the armies best draft stock of horses had been stabled during the short halt in the retreat.,he ,landelinians had been trying to get them out when this force of Abyssinkilian cavarly appeared.As these fierce horsemen approached a quick whistlecfrom the leader of the ,landelinians brought six thousand soldiers into line in front of the tent.,herecwere men in that line that had driven and nursedctheir horses for years.,hey were there to die rather than see their pets captured.,he snow pall partly obscured the thin line of prolonged steel.the Concentinian Triploigonlians charging with the fury of a cyclone, saw and understood but in a short time the horses were in theirpossession and every one in the line hf men had been cut or shot down.Meanwhile general

Henry, B Gentry had tried to rally a good portion of the ,landelinian rear guar guard during the fierce fur firing which ensued but a bullet caught him in the forehead pgiving the brain.,hree other christian soldiers opened fire upon the same ,landelinian general but unsecessarily, for the shot that first struc Gentry was fatal.slowly without a sound or struggle the officer toppled from his horse and fell stretched out on the right side.,o ended the fierce rear guard action during the foe retreat.....

Tward three oclock in the afternoon Jennie urmer had caught the sullen mutter of thousands of big guns, glimpses of many ominous flashes from north and southward and knew that about fifty miles away the ,landelinians had struck again, they were surprised to larn that it was turning out as one of the worse of the ,landelinian defeats in the war so far.At it was again along the Wie-Hollester un that the Angelinians had been seeking to dew troy the rebellion of the wicked ,landelinians in one long climatic battle.,he inhabaants of Jennie urmer had held their breathe.The future was to atone for the past.It will probably alway be Angelinia's undying pride that her sons performed so vital a part in that most crucual battle o to which the Wie-Hollester un hillsides and plains still attest.And after the victory the Angelinian advance was so amazingly rapid despite the blizzard storm that it could not be described properly.Meeting that long prepared offensive of the wicked ,landelinian troops, the mighty Angelinian armies broke through and passed all objectives and had dashed on like an irrestible sweeping hurricane.and national vigor was redoubled in them since sunset at N Sexton un and Sunbeam Creek so long before and which new flowered afresh in this battle and tempestous dawn at Jennie urmer.

Prodical youth flung the fury of hell into the shouts which ran from rank to rank during the persuit ;

''Come on boys, and soldiers of Christ, we'll beat you all to it.''Or other shouts of the christians of;

''where do we go from here boys, where do we go from here.''?

The Angelinian soldiers dropped their packs and in their fierce counter advance against the retreating numbers of the foe they outdistanced their main advancing artillery, cavarly, and supply trains and they even caused their dressing and ambulance trains and sleighs to move up by leaps and bounds.They outstripped everything including the calculations of all their lowest and highest generals. As general Concentinian Aronburg put it;

''If the ,landelinian traiters has had as hard a time running away from the mighty army of Angelinia, as the supplies and red cross trains had in keeping up with it, I'm satisfied.It was not an advance, and neither was it a retreat of the ,landeliniens.It was an obstacle race.''

Though driven for more than a hundred miles southeastward in all that blizzard storm, the retreating ,landelinian army was still in western Calverinia , but Manley was still moving southeastward as fast as he could, and now the rout of his army was utterly complete.When the advancing christian army reached the town of ,men the storm seemed to change suddenly and also the atmosphere of the land seemed to as take on a sudden change.Heavy gray clouds of smoke r from smouldering fires blotted out the snow pall and the fury of the storm itself threatened to go beyond its bounds.On f the face of the landscapes of Calverinia great scars made by gigantic eruptives explos ions appeared. Deep furrows zis-zazzed over the once beautiful meadows, and ugly patches of rusty brown wire stretched for miles after miles on either side of the roads.

Mile after mile the afte advancing forces passed through wreck and ruin, and town after town lay shattered around them.All a snow covered heap, and stumps of trees and crumbled bricks, a pile of u umbled masonry it being indeed thoroughly a hell of war.

Houses of all sizes were spilled, and the scenes was just as great or worse even as ruins of t owns and cities in France during the great ''world war''.Not a single one remained intact.Many a time two houses were seen propped up against one another as if to prevent their falling down, and the cracked windows spewed a stream of plaster and brick into the snow covered streets.The beaut iful St Anns Church seemed to stq stare at the Angelinian soldiers from nearly a hundred sightless eyes, somehoe accusing eyes.They seemed to be the voices of the dead crying out;

''If you break faith with us, who die for God and Country, we shall not sleep.''

Nothing could ever blot out the picture.Th's memory haunted the christian generals still.Poor Calverinia.Never shall t he generals and the many christian armies forget her.Never must you my dear readers forget her.Tward the evening the retre retreating forces of the foe had reached a town clossward the regionvof vivian vickey from which it also was driven, and only by being rescued by a big and new ,landelinian army was it possible for Manleys shattered forces enabled to retreat across the county tward where the high hills and mountians and the fury of the still raging blizzard protected the handicapped ,landelinian army from detection.,nd it was indeed a long time ber ore this one Landelinian army was fully reformed and rallied and reinforced by thenew army it lay for a long while at rest in the protecting vall y between the big hills.Thus the battle of Jennie urmer resulted in the fiergest andone of the most tragatic and disasterous defeats of the war for the ,landelinian armies.The battle and defeat of the foe also made good results in behalf of the christians.

Th.'s broke up the invasion of the ,landelinian army in the southeastwrn part of Calverinia and prevented a new force from coming to the aid of the besieged at vivian ickey.

Th.'s proved to general ohnston acken Manley that general Whillismberger Zimmermann was one of the best and ablest christian generals of all and able to lick ten such ,landelinian armies as himself.It is orp probable that Mis Manley will never engage Concentinian Aronburg in another battle without the aid of armies under two of his sons or from some others.There was of course some humor in the description of the rout of Manleys army but there was hardly any humor in the circumstances of the battle.It is not mentioned mentioned r probably the number f cannons in action on both sides but nevertheless with all the firing of cannons and musketry the noise was worse than a million of the loudest tu thunder rolls and thunderstorms in one, and the concussion of the fir fring was said to produce earthquake shocks simular to that of natural earth- quakes and with disasterous effects.

Manley's great defeat indeed was a great humiliation to him indeed.He had started o out tward Jennie Turner wih an enormous army.After the battle, and after the retreat was over he had only one quarter left.He had lost fourty thousand w agons fifteen thousand cannon and millions of men in prisoners. Nearly a million more suffered the effects of frozen fe feet, hands feet, and so on, and many thousands had perished by the hour during the retreat from the intense colds,and during the retreat at times the wind blew at the velocity of nearly eighty miles an hour , and it had been positively very difficult for the troops to make any headway against such a insane storm.The snow fell at the rate of seven inches an hour at its worse, and by the time fortunately when Manleys army got into its safe refue the wind reached an velocity of one hundred and fourty miles an hour and carried all before it.

During the retreat Manleys army in seperated columns had spread over a territory of over a hundred miles in length at once and extended over that distance during the full retreat. The battle of Jennie Turner had started close to the small villiage of Kittens Pischerts and hand ended with Manleys rally a d and recieving reinforcements one hun hundred and fifty miles away.

For any Glandelinian army it may have been the longest and most disasterous retreat in the whole war entirely.Too many had fallen during the battle and retreat to be stated here, but Manley afterwards reported his loss to be over eleven million in killed and 10,000,000 in wounded and as many more in prisoners. ..owever his a statements were not believed to be true t and that his losses was much below that actua, actual number.Concentinian Aronburgs army had not been able to persue any further for so tward evening the wind grew too strong for any advance and the army also had to takeshelter as much as possible.Thus with the elements positively against both sides, two ernormous armies had raced on through country and vale for miles and miles, and such confusion as occured during the retreatwould take a million volumes like these to describe in full.The main Glandelinian cavarly forces had strove with might and main during every hour of the retreat to rally some portion of the torn and shattered glandelinian army, but all their efforts had been of no avail, and many lost their lives in t ese attemps, generalsand other officers also.

General Manley himself had been wounded, three hundred of his best generals had been killed and four hundre d others wounded and thousands of officers of lower rank lost in killed wounded or missing and prisoners.

The christian losses in the battle was very great also but few in generals and other officers.But Concentinian Aronburgs army did not lose a single flag, gun or wagon, neither many in prisoners and those who had been taken by the enemy were speedily recovered.

And the battle and retreat combined covered the greatest extent of ground in twenty four hours time than anybattle or retreat had ever covered before in the war.Concentinian Aronburgs army had advanced so fast that the men had made nearly six hours a six miles in less than half an hour, by running trotting and fast walking, and had outdistanced their cavarly, and other columns which were of horse and wagon.The fact that Manleys army was ignorant to aw to the nature a d conditiin of the country caus caused it to be so seriously handicapped. nd storms of these kind when the wind is not too strong is nothing to the Angelinians at all. hey had faced worse storms than these, h had defied the ty h typhoonic elements in themselves in summer, and nothing had ever stopped their adfan advance and purpose.The concussion of the battle wrecked many towns and villiages.The battle caused many exterrific explosions which made the scene like thousands of volcanic eruptions.Therefore the large town of Burnside which was about thirteen miles south of Jennie Turner was affected by the concussion so many houses having collasped, that Thirty persons were injured the property loss being about two hundred thousand eightbhundred and sixty nine dollars while over ten thousand one hundred and eleven persons were homeless.About twenty two thousand houses were completely razed to the ground by the concussion, and the remainder partly wr4c wrecked.

DISASTERS OF WAR THAT COULD SURELY MAKE HISTORY.....!!!!!

OCCURING DURING AND AFTER THE BATTLE OF JENNIE TURNER!

During the severe fighting at the bloody battle of Jennie Turner there occured out of many in the immediate vicinity an explosion through the efforts of the enemy to check the christian advance which tore a crater in the ground 1,280 feet in diameter of which it was quaintly said, that its concussion was felt with the most startling effects for the distance of nearly two hundred miles or fifty more and with force enough to do great damage for that extent.

The towns that reported damage, were New Calverine, Riverview, , Meldonburg Phelantonia, Allendorn, Flanders, Madge Evans, pig Betsy Bess, Aleonie, Hellington Bell, and North Turner junction.The cloud hurled upward by the explosion was observed for the distance of fifty miles in the direction where the battle was going on. During the day of the battle there had been quite a strong breeze from the northwest and those who observed the smoke clouds at a closer distance declared that they appeared somewhat similar similar to those accompanying violent thunderstorms, unusually black and reaching one third way up to the zenith, and probably from the force of the blast the upper edge was indented and formed many rolling shapes.

This cloud however was different from the common explosion cloud being one ernormous sheet of rolling smoke like the uppush of vapor and volcanic ash and lava debris during a violent volcanic eruption.This cloud was seen rising upward between two and ten minutes after.

Persons who happened to be on high hills during the time of the explosion had an excellent view of it as it crashed like a volcano blowing itself asunder.It was like an ernormous funnel shaped rolling black cloud probably about two thousand yards in diameter nearest the ground.It was so dense that their eyes could not penetrate it and at the crash of the explosion it appeared luminous, peals like loud thunder seeming to roll along the ground.The cloud then spread upward and outward with great force and rapidity, the noise of the explosion have been productive of an awful undulating roar that caused feelings of great terror to arise in the hearts of the spectators.

The immense cloud still widening out sped along in a most majestic manner as though sliding on an unseen plane.When it came quite near tye big sheet of cloud instantly divided horizontally at a short distance from the ground as though a strong wind had dashed it asunder, the upper part still appearing to rise with the same speed, and the lower to spread itse f even with that above.

In the instant of the great explosion thecloud and eruption of debris apparently seemed to burst from the ground like the worse volcanic outburst, spread hundreds of yards into the air then roll instantly forward the whole cloud being charged with large sections of stone and wooden fences, huge limbs of trees, who whole trees, immense masses of earth, masses of boards, large volumes of bricks, clouds of timbers, shingles, huge clouds of hay and thousands of similar articles which were continually continually crashing against eadh other as they fell back to the ground in huge torrents.

I missed the explosion had unusually great force.scattering a rain of debris far and wide.In the town of Meldon Bickwell and Jennie Turner herself and also Madge Evans a few large clots of.earth and some showers of stones and even water fell, but in the city of Angeline Riches and others and the surrounding country, mad water, wrecka: wreckage of allkinds, showers of stones, and deluges of grass and flowers, and huge limbs of tree,s andcarticles of every description besides large sections of houses descended in such quanities that many houses were demolished, the streets and outlying country were inundated, tye descending materials causing great damage.

The inhabatants believed it was from some terrific volcanic disturbance.The concussion of the explosion and the effects of the air waves destroyed all before it as if the region was swept by exterrific tornado, houses barns, and other buildings in all the cities and towns named here being utterly shattered, large fields of Indian corn ,flax and all other kinds of crops blown away or ruined.

So fierce was the concussion near Jennie Turner and Madge Evens that a farm house of considerable size fairly jumped fifty feet into the air and came down with great force demolishing itself into a pile of ruins.Those inside narrowly escaped with their lives.

[illegible] easily. He that must never be. My [illegible] He have forward to take the little girls when so their surprise [illegible] suddenly on the floating ice cake and away went the little girls

A great many stacks of hay within near reach of the explosion were scattered by the force of of the air waves over the country for miles much of it being flung into a woods two miles away and left like thick moss on the tops of all the trees which also were wrecked. ithin a quarter of a mile from the concussion or of the general explosion large apple orchards whose trees were bending under a great quanity of ripening fruit and peach pear and cheery trees were torn out by the roots by the force of the far reaching blast or were twisted off near the ground, clouds of the largest apples and other fruit being hurled like a tremendous hailstorm for more than three miles. In the city of Kittens ieoherts the apples and other fruits came into the streets, through roofs and windows with the force of projectiles hurled from a gun. Many persons were hit by these fruits and fatally injured or instantly killed. One man in in a house had his head knocked completely off by an apple which crashed through a window pane with such velocity that it left a hole as if a big bullet had gone through.

Near the closest location of the explosion immense masses of the biggest and strongest forest trees, timber and shade trees were also torn up by the roots and hurled high into the air or also twisted off at the trunks and thrown long distances with cartloads of earth and rocks clinging to some of them being dropped in field, meadow, glen, or streets of numerous near by towns. whole groves of the finest young trees were utterly destroyed.

The toughest saplings and closest paint pasture white oaks and other trees a mile away from the scene of the explosion were fairly twisted off by the sudden air waves and even woven together, their largest and smallest boughs appearing as if they had been struck upon stones repeatedly. ong lines of fences, and strong ten foot stone and concrete and even iron walls and fences were leveled to the ground by the concussion, and countless articles such as huge stones, logs and huge trunks of trees weighing several hundred pounds were u hurled high into the air by the force of the explosion and fell in places scores of miles away.

In some localities the velocity of the flying articles tore the sward off the ground to the depth of seven inches as it did near Angeline ichee where Apples and even Peaches fairly went through the sides of wooden houses like cannon balls. In the low pasture for cows belonging to a ich farmer apples and other fruits lay as thick as fallen hail stones some buried deep in the ground. Twenty of his cows and four of his horses had been killedby these objects.

Strips of the ground and sward were torn off several hundred feet in length and from twenty to fourty gfeet in breadth. The evidence clearly showed that the force of the flying fruit and wreckage itself tore the turf from the underlying strata of gravel. There were t no trees, bushes or brakes growing upon the sod upon which the sudden air waves of the explosion could exert its strength in the ordinary manner nor were there any trees hurled across any of the spots where the flying debris hurled by the explosion could plow the ground. Several groups of men women and even children were standing in the vicinity of the pasture when a big rock volley passed and noticed that a strange heavy undulating sound like thung thunder at a great distance u issued from the volley of flying rocks as they struck against each other.

This explosion however did not slay very many people. he wreckage though severe did cause some loss of life but falling and flying objects caused the greater death list. ut thousands in every city alone were injured. Hundreds of millions of dollars worth of property was destroyed, railroad tracks were flung off from the ties by the concussion, coaches and other railroad cars were thrown every which way as if a tornado swept them, and many engines were demolished. The largest woods near by shook so violently that their branches were broken, and all their leaves fell, and in some localities great fires broke out and burned for days days.

The total loss of property was never fully estimated. The heaviest sufferer from the concussion was the city of Madge Evans. ourty thousand houses were razed by the shock and all the rest damaged either severely or enough to be noticed. The streets were smashed in debris and fallen objects, and a fire started which would have consumed the whole city if it had not bee for a terrific rainstorm that broke loose just in time. Jennie urner however suffered next to the propertydamage but suffered greater loss of life. adge vans reported one thousand injured and eight hundred killed. Jennie urners loss in dead persons was nearly four thousand and over sixty thousand were hurt and nearly a million ho eless. The total number of homeless was nearly seven million throughout the district injured by the explosion. For a time the statement of the farmers house fairly jumping into the air was not believed even when the news papers recorded it as it seemed a freak to be too real.

This occured however only within two miles away from the explosion where the shoo was the greatest and many had actually witnessed it, some narrl narrowling escaping the flying fragments of the wooden building when it afterwards crashed violently to the earth. At the time the building did this freak the farm, his wife, mother, and sister, and his three children two boys and a girl were within the structure and how they escaped death was a wonder They however were badly injured. The city of B r Burnside ten miles south of Jennie urner was leveled to the ground completely and its fal ing ruins clouded th a the air with dust.

been gazing at the [illegible] something happened. Probably he had met with [illegible] and fallen.

Gathering himself j up the general stood on his feet and was about to move on when he suddenly caught sight of something opposite him that sent a rush of cold blood to his heart.

The small village or city of Angelintire was the same as distance north of Jennie Turmer a nd and damage also occured here greater than at Burnside but with less number of persons injured, the porperty los less being three thousand six hundred and fourty one while over 28,226 were homeless. About thirty thousand houses were wrecked of which ten thousand were totally destroyed by fire which followed the dreadful disaster. The city of Attillia on the Mc-Hellester Run about seventy miles away was wrecked totally all the houses being blown in by the concus concussion of the loudest part of the cannonading.. Ten persons were injur ed of which six were fatal fatally and the po property less was $4,400. 41,221 persons were made heml homeless.

The town of Sunbeam still greater in distance from Jennie Turmer but west of her was severely v.mita visited about three thousand of its thirty thousand houses being wrecked while about fourty theu two persons were fatally injured. The money loss was 1,220, by the shock, and fourty thousand persons were made homeless by a conl conflargraion which followed.

It was indeed awful

The big city of Angel n Angeline Calverinia wa was situated about sixty three miles of Jennie Turmer and was so severely wrecked by the concussion of the battle that it was uncomprehesi comprehensible.

Terrible indeed was the number of killed ad and injured, but was too high to be accurately estimated but the property less was about $100,000,000. About 6,234,456.persons were homeless and about one hundred thousand houses were totally destroyed and about five hundred thousand parcially wrecked.

Kramer about ten miles north of Jennie Turmer a small town was totally wrecked of all its houses with the loss of ninty six n in injured, and thirty in killed, while the property loss was $22,222.. Two million and seventy were made homeless. Gerinth the same disastance east was also severely effected and fourty persons were injured, the property less being $4,240.. Over three million were homeless and all the houses were wrecked but not totally.

The people had fled from the town on account of the enemy thus the reason so many were homeless in these two latter towns Sacremento twenty miles east was not severely damaged the property loss being three thousand three hundred dollars, and ten persons were slightly injured. The enemy having been in possession of the town, the inhib atents having fled so about three million two hundred twenty six thousand, stwo hundred fourty eight persons were rendered homeless. Regular cities almost the size or greater in size than New Yerks were thus handicapped in that fashion. Vivian Wickey the Gigantic Calverinian city theugh two hundred miles northwest of Jennie Yurmer was effected also by the concussion but not badly. About twenty Glmie Glandelinian soldiers were injured by the falling of wreckage. The less was only $1,300 but about 1,222,244 Glandelinian soldiers had fled from the positions at Vivian Wickey to the main fortifications & at Ruth Elsie Mc-Whirther and thus the city was free of over a million Glandelinians less.

The o town or city of Marcuocian a regular Chicago of Calver inia was severely effected with a property loss of a bout $1,900,000 The total number of dead were not known, but at least 1,200 persons were injured in which nine extra persons were reported fatally. on account of damaged houses and homes and other residences about 284,284 persons were without homes were sheltered by the near by christian armies. Angeline Ford wa was sixteen miles southwest of Jennie Turmer and though not too badly effected by the concussion of the battle nevertheless reported a property loss of $3,642 with fourty persons injured, and on account of fleeing from the near approach of the foe 964,228 persons were homeless.

Jennie Town half the distance from Jennie Turmer as Vivian Wickey is and north of her suffered quite heavily in damaged houses but no persons were killed though ninty were injured. The property loss was at first believed to be only $2,000 but came out to be eighteen million dollars. Ioe 100,649 persons were rendered homeless by fires which followed. Gretchen on the Mc-Whirther Run about seventy miles west of Jennie Turmer was severely wrecked in about one quarter of all its houses. It was a regular New York of Calverinia The loss of life was five hundred sixty, while over eight theusand persons were injured. 1000 were fatally injured. The total property less was not accurately estimated but was declared to be over 2 $28,000,000 and six hundred thousand persons were without homes and had to be sheltered by friends.

[illegible] easily, so that must never be. They assembled together and was [illegible] to move forward to take the little girls when so their surprise [illegible] suddenly on the floating ice cake and away went the little girls

Greta a small neightobring city of Gretchen and only three miles away was damaged greatly also thirty persons being wounded. The pr operty loss damaged greatly also thirty persons being wounded. The property loss for her size was thirty six thousand dolla dollars and three hundred and one thousand four hundred one were rendered homeless by fires. Nancy was one of the biggest cities in Calverinia in that location and was nearly a hundred miles south of Jennie Turmor but she wa not far enough to escape the shock of the battle and many houses were daman damaged to the loss of thirty six thousand fourty one dollars and 401,40 persons were made homeless by the wreckage of their homes, and by flood and fire that followed the disaster.. Norma Catherine thirty miles north of Jennie Turmer was heavily effected one thousand persons mostly the prisoners kept there being injured and six hundred and thirty thousand being without shelter as the Glandeliniens would not repair the many wrecked buildings. The property loss in Norma Catherine was considered as thirty thousand dollars also. Catherine Decie was ten miles from Norma Catherine and which were guarded by the besieing christians. Sixty persons were injured, none killed, and the por property loss wa s h about ten thousand two hundred and five dollars and one hundred and seventy thousand persons were rendered homeless.

Evangelistia aneighboring cityof Juclo Callio also still besieged by the christians was damaged slightly for its size ninty being injured and sixteen killed. 10,000 d dollars was considered the property loss though later it was found to abb amount to 8,000,000 dollars. 120,030 w persons were made homeless.

Julo Callio was also effected but not so severely this city being h h about a mile south of Norma Catherine . No one was injured or killed but about half a dozen houses wr were wrecked.

Angeline Turmer two miles north of her siste r s city reported ninty four persons killed, and three hundred and four injue injured. The property loss was stated to be fourty thousand dollars when in reality it was $10,000,999. 203,040 persons were homeless.

The city of Jennie Turns another Calverinian Chicago was badly effected. 1642 persons were reported killed, and 29,964 persons were injured. The property loss was stated at the first to be only eighty thousand dollars when it was really thirty six million dollars.

One hundred thirty thousand p persons were rendered homeless.

St Virgins was a town about the size of St Lious in our co ntry and it reported the loss of three hundred persojs killed and over six thousand injured and a property loss of about 11 1,111,600 dollars. 120,000 persons were homeless.

Cecillia the same size as St Virgins repot reported a loss of three thousand dollars, with one hundred injured. The loss in property seemed pretty small in report considering that over three hundred persons were homeless. Very few of these towns named reported a list of dea dead.

Rossanna thirty miles northeast of Jennie Turmer reported thirty hundred killed and over three thousand injured making over six thousan thousand als altogether. Fourty thousand was predicted the property loss considering that 1,200,000 persons were said to be homeless and no enemy within sight. The property loss la ter on was found to be 18,789,999 dollars. The great city of Mo-Hollester Mo-shirther was unusually effected by the shock of the battle though ten score of miles west of Jennie Turmer. Her loss reported in dead two weeks after the battle was 1,200,000 while thirty one million persons consisting of soldiers besides men women and children were slightly and badly injured or buried in the sea of wreckage. Considering that 11,286,000 persons were homeless the property loss must ammount up to about 8,300,300 dollars when in really it was nearly $45,678,976.

One of the first biggest cities next to Vivian Wickey is the guardian city of Vivian Wickey called Annie Ac Aonburg about thirty six miles south of Vivian Wickey on the coast, and nearly two hundred miles northwest of Jennie Turmer. Despite considering the distance the shock it recieved was uncommoningly severe for the property loss was80,000,000 dollars. (88 988,993 persons were killed, by falling wreckage or in their houses, and and thirty four persons mostly soldiers going or taking possession of the city to guard it were injured about a quarter of the number being women and children.. Three thirds of them were injured fatally or laid u for life.

The number renderless homeless was reported by Angelinian Aurthorities to be about32,333,420. It was certainly dreadful indeed. The neight Neighborning town of Federal the same or little greater distance northwest of Jennie Turmer and only two miles south of A.onburg was equally effected considering that the loss in dead was not accurately estimated though reportedas far as possible to be probable nearly 9,898,999. The loss in j injured was totally unestimated because of the number burned to ashes in the ruins that started from a great conflargration. The property loss was less severe however being 4,400,000 dollars but on account of fires in great manisions and residences the homeless was great bi h being nearly eighty four million, said to be 84,233,000.

Chamberlane a neighbor of Lucillie Rickson and Glorimma reported nearly an equal loss in lives going as far as 9,998,964 persons killed. The same results came for the number of wounded, unaccurate on account of h ndres of thousands being burned to a crisp or ashes in conflagrations that followed. Thirty million dollars was declared the property loss and fourty million were homeless. The total property loss wa was $150,000,987.

Phelantonburg a hundred miles southwest of Jennie Turmer was also effected unusually about three million six hundred thousand persons having lost their lives as many injured were burned in the fires. Nearly a quarter of the number of houses were leveled to the ground by the concussion. The number of injued were not estimated and if known they were not given. Property loss was $38,964,000. Homeless; 30,000,000.

The great city of Catherine Stanck nearly as big as the city of Calvei Calverine and thirty miles northwest of Jennie Turmer had al the number of persons cauh caught in the avalanch of wreckage annihilae annihilated in the debris either by suffocation, or sudden death, and by great fires that followed. There was no injured as no injured persons could be saved and the death total was said to reach 2,300,000 The pr.operty losses was considered as $98,123,400. The homeless was 16,300,000.

The town of Wicke/ Lansin only six miles of Jennie Turmer direction omitted reported a loss o of nine thousand injured, and two hundred dead, total property wiped out ammounting to fourty two thousand dollars, and one million men women ,children and soldiers for a time without shelter.

The big city of Agathia was heavily damaged the death list not be being given though the wounded was nine thousand. Two million, one hundred thirty thousand do llars was the property loss, and eleven million were said to be homeless on account of the whole city being threatened by a conflargration that all the firedepartments could not check.

Melfort was damaged, a mighty metroplis of Calverinia and so hea y was the death list that it was not fully estimated. Thirty four t million persons were said to be injured in the city and all the villiages a round. The property loss was considered as six million three hundred thousand dollars, and thirty four mi million, two hundred thirty eight thousand four hundred and twenty two were rendered without homes and shelter.

Angeln Angeline Beldon a large city half in size to that of Wi Vivian Wickey was the hardest hit. It was only ten miles straight east of Jennie Turmer. Fortunately the loss of life was not so great as in other cities, being only two hundred thousand, but fourty four million the remainder of the population were all injured either slightly or severely, and the property loss was $333,100,000. 20,220,000 were rendered without homes.

The town of Mosiea was ten miles from Jennie Turmer on the banks of the river, direction omitted,. The death list was dreadful the total city being rai raxed, but the dead was unestimated though three million were reported to be dreadfully cut up or injured in all ways and that none of the total number of injured were wounded slightly. The total losses in peo property was twelve million to fourty three million extra of dollars, and twenty one million two hundred and twenty the thousand were homeless.

...ssily. We that must never be. They assembled together and was ...to move forward to take the little girls when so their surprise ...them suddenly on the floating ice cake and away went the little girls

One of the small cities called ST. Anges was leveled to the ground by the concussion . Houses were wrecked as if by a tornado, a and the death list was five thousand while over twenty thousand persons all old men women and children were injured. The losses in property damage was predicted to be at first a as far as thirty thousand dollars when it ran into the millions and two million four hundred thousand persons were rendered rendered without homes. Hedda Junction another very large city was not totally damage d & damaged or razed by the concussion of the battle but nevertheless the damage ammounted to thirteen million insted instead of twenty million a as at first predicted and one million pos persons were killed outright when buried in the fallen wreckage, while nine hundred thousand others perished in the floods and fires that followed. The Numer of injured was I,000,333 while the po property was considered damaged to the ammount of eighty million dollars. Three million pr pers persons were homeless.

The town of Confection the nearest neighbor of Jennie Turmer reported a list of one thousand dead and two million injured, and a property loss of twenty million dollars. One million were believed to be homeless. The big city of Jennie Turmer suffered in damage nearly as severe as Angeline Beldon being estimated & at two hundred and fifty million dollars. Eighty million nine hundred and ninty nine persons were rendered homeless.

On account of the din and concussion of the battle of Jennie Turmer about fourty cities and towns were damaged. The ruined town of Amens makes the fourthieth one. It ind ee was one of the most frightfullest disasters of the whole warup to this time and not only that but had caused the cities to suffer because on account of the war the there was hardly any chance of their being repaired as fa fast as need be. Too much noise for a battle.

PART TWO OF CHAPTER FOURTY NINE.

THE

THE EXPERIENCE OF VIOLET AND HER SISTERS
AT THE SAME TIME BETWEEN FEB. AND MARCH AND DURING GENERAL
HANSON 'S ADVANCE ON TORRINGTON.!!!..

Violet and her sisters who had been with general Hanson army dru during the advance on the rebel or Landelinian armies near Torrington had wishedthemselves to have a fair chance to rescue a little child slabe slave at no matter whatever the risk and at first clever as they were the brave little girls did not know where they could procure the permissio permission to attempt the rescue of one as they dreaded from the risk it may take that their uncle would not permit them to do so and they did not want to go without askin asking first.

"I do so ernestly wish to have the permission to rescue a litl little chid child slave." Violet had said to one of the generals sheemet during the time the christian a advance had been halted for the night. Can you not tell me where I can get the chance to rescue one without facing too much peril about it and cause my uncle or father much worry. My sisters would like to know..?"

"Oh that can be easily managed if you will only do so." Said the officer. "They are as easily to secure as harley corn if you only know how to go about the b business business. Just leave the lines and if any of the sentries ask you where you are going tell them that you are hav after some fodder for your horses and procure some so as to make it not a lie.. If you do this you will see what you will see."

"Thank you...." Said Violet and her sisters looked pleased and happy. and she gave the general twelve dollars flr for giving her and her sisters the information. Then she andher sisters went to their own building and prepared to go on their quest. In On their window sill inside the house to make the room look more cheerful and chase away as much as possible the winter scenery they had in a large flower pot a wonderful and beautiful flower which looked like a gigantic gathering himself up the general stood on the roof and was about to move on when he suddenly caught sight of something opposite him that sent arush of cold blood to his heart.

tuli p but thebeautiful lis leaves were tightly closed as though it were at ill a bug bud but at night it was open and as large as nasunflower.

"That isa beautiful flower you little goils got therd." Said the man who ha had broughttheir horses. "It id a real Angelinian t ulip and in the beautiful green velvet stamens or in the middle of the flower therd there was a centre of beautiful color from which there came a benutiful oder.

"It's ours "Said the little graceful delicate looking maidinn who was Jennie. "From the little story of Maya I have read in childrens book I have called the Flower "Thumbelinia "Tulip.."

"It is a fine name for it." Said the man with a smile as he saluted them and went off.

One of the attendants of violet and her sisters wondered how it could be possible that the vivian girls had such benutiful places to sleep in or eat in when the generals themselves of the highest rank usu ally slept in a tent, barn or r m ramshacks shakis house. Their little beds were of a neat walnut woodwork, with matresses covered with blue violet leaves for decorations and the coverlets were designed beautifully with rosses rose leaves and even Tulips. Indeed he thought they had beautiful beds to sleep in at night with near the bed a wreath of flowers around it whose stalks were in the water and on the water was seen to swim a great Tulip leaf . That looked very pretty indeed but he did not dare to impose on them by asking any questions as he felt they would feel offended. He had noticedalso that violet and her sisters could sing and indeed so delicately and sweetly that the like had never been heard and their voices beat the most best singing in the world.

As violet and her sisters in the disguise as Calverinian peasant girls started out they saw in the distance on the roadside two men riding forward on horseback and they were Gargolie Kurds and the hedious disguises of their heads astruck violet and her sisters as something completely uncommon. One or two had the heads of toads, another had a mask in the form of a mouse and rat and another like a mole and words robes of dark gray ol color with the name "KU Klux Klan of landelind engraved upon their chests..

"I have seen in the books called Dorothy and the Wizard In Oz the postures of those peculiar wooden Gargloies" Said violet but "but those Landelinians called by the same name can beat those wooden creatures in hediousness. Look out sisters that they don't see us or we may be detained and investigated.."

Not far away there ran a great and large brook but the mar margin was swampy and soft and here the little girls went and behind some trees to hide themselves.

Ugh. The disguises of the Gargloies or the Landelinians was ugly and looked just like gigantic frogheaded n humans. To prevent the rebe's becoming suspicious violet decided to make the sound of a frog which she could and so she started;

"Croak. Croak. Brex-kex-kex."

At first violet did not think it being us unusual to make rebels think of frogs in the winter time.

"Don't make so much noise with your sabre scabbards" Said one of the Gargolians to his men. "Did you not hear the croak of a frog or toad."

"Yes" Said one of the others "but is i it is peculiar for them to be around in winter. Look out Jameson watch your horse which is getting scared or she will run away with us in panic. We saw some creatures not a moment ago run away into the swamp and they seemed to move like creatures as light as a bit of swans down. They went or seemed to go across the brook. I don't know if it were some Angelinian children or escaped child slaves but whatever they were I don't believe they can get away. Bt ."

"But I don't think it is so." Said the leader. "I'm afraid we are riding into an m ambush."

Out in the brook where in summer there always grew many large water lillies with broad green leaves there was laying farthest out a large cake of floating ice and violet and her sisters decided to urge their horses to swim out across the brr brook but the horses were scared of the cold water. Over having such a sudden encounter with rebels violet and her sisters felt so bad they could have cried very bitterly but they did not, but as there was water on every side of them, they felt they could not get to the better land at all because the horses were obstinate and they did not wish to leave the horses bes behind. hey urged again and again but only one of the horses started to swim out but could not be compelled to go any further than afew feet and so they had been compelled to dismount and hide behind the trees with pistols drawn in case of necessary use.

"were is" My son" said o the Gargolian leader" Is the hoofprints of strange horses in the snow in the road. here are some enemies in the marsh in hiding I'll be bound."

"Croak. Croak. Brek-kex-kex." was a ll the answer the surprised rebels could get. violet sat alone upon a log and almost wept for she did not like to have the adventure turn out like this, t and to have to encoune encounter Gargolians like this at an untimely moment was embrassing. The little fishes no doubt still swimmi ng in the deepest part of the creek where the water was warm had seen the rebels approach and had scurred away for even the fishes of the most tame character dreaded the approach of the Landelinians. One of the Gargolians happened to ride forward tward where the footprints of the horses led to and an as soon as he saw one of the little girls in hiding he considered her a fugiti ve child slave and so pretty that he felt sorry that she should have been able to escape from her master so easily. so that must never be. hey assembled together and was preparing to move forward to take the little girls when so their surprise they saw them suddenly on the floating ice cake and away went the little girls far away down the strem where the surprised and embrassed re els having no guns with them but sabres and lances could not get at them. Nevertheless violet and her sisters had been compelled to leave their horses behind which the glandelinians qi quickly secud secured. Violet and her sisters all dripping wet and shivering from the cold, but not daring to get off the ice cake yet sailed by many encampments and the little sparrows which sat in bushes or in the treetops saw them they must have thought in their own bird languages)

"My what lowely little girls. They must be too delicate and pretty to be humans."

The ice cake continued to swim away with them farther and fart her, so hat Violet and her sisters fearing they would travel clean out of the country and go into one of the big rivers decided to get off and first propell the ice cake iwth a a stick they had brought nearer to the shore so they would not have to swim that icy water again. As daylight was approaching a grw graceful little slarrpw sparrow always fluttering around the m at last alighted on the ice cake expecti g to find something to eat. The little girls pleased the sparrow with what food they had to throw to him and then afterwards Violet took the pole she had with her and star ted to use it as a ferryman uses his to get the boat across the river and by this mean 'eans they glided along faster but now tward the shore. After they had landed with their clothes half frozen to their bodies they saw a house in the distance and no sooner had they reached the house, made a little fire in the fire place and dried out their clothes my how frightened they were when they saw approaching near the house a large column of glandelinian generals and officers and adivision of cavarly troops al all G Gargi Gargolies by their disguises they wore and all carried long rifles and sabres. But especially they were were sorry for the pretty children they had with them bound with their hands tied behind them for they reali realized that if the poor children could not free themselves they would be carried into slavery and it evidently looked as if they had been kidnapped from some christian Galverinians home or family. General Cockchafer was the leader of these glandelinian troopers and so violet and her sisters decided to try and save them if they could even at the risk of capture themselves. The glandelinians they knew were called "the Cockchafer squadron of Gargolians who were the worse of the lot when aroused and violet looking at her sisters said:

"It is certainly a wretched appearance to se those children in their midst. We will have to rescue them at any cost."

"Most of those glandelinians wear masks that look like t the heads of beetles with feelers" Said Violet as she looked at them out of the window. "How ugly they look. And see how terrified their captives are. I believe they are going to murder the children."

they expected that the Gargolies would stop at the house and even general Cockchafer who rode in the foremost of them stopped at the house but when a'l the others opposed the idea of stopping t here the leader yeilded to their wishes at last, and so did not dismount from their horses telling the men that they can take the child captives whether they liked best . violet and her sisters feeling that it was almost impossible to rescue those children alone almost wept yet these loveliest little creatures that one could ever imagine, di decided not to give up yet, and as soon as the column of glandelinians had rode pass the house, they left the building and cautiously followed the rebels at a safe distance . .

To violet and her sisters this kind of work was sport in the summer. The whole summer through they had lived quite alone at this sport of following rebels, rescueing their captives and the like but now summer and even autum had pas sed away and winter was still on despis despite the fact it was so late in February and it seemed as winter was never going to end. /ll the birds that had sang so sweetly to the little girls that morning before had flew away, and now as they followed the glandelinians they felt dreadfully cold, for their clothes were torn, and they themselves were so frail and delicate that they felt they were in danger of being frozen but they still did not give up. It now began to snow and snow fiercely the air was growing dark and finally the storm grew so heavy that it seemed as if whole shovel fulls were being whirled in their faces by the wind. Violet's clothes was torj in the middle on account of their esc exciting escape from the enemy the night before and they felt miserable indeed shivering with the cold but they were not thinking of themselves. They were were bound to secure the little friends or die in the attempt. close to the wood in which they saw the rebel squadron go with their ten child captives lay a large pine and fir forest and the forest was so thick indeed that any enemy could hide in it. These to the little girls seemed like an enchanted forest to wander through and though oh how they trembled with the cold they still gallantly followed the glandelinians, and finally arived at the outer edge of the woods, and found there a cavern. I can't say really how the little girls succeeded in getting the children but they did, that night, and persued by a score of glandelinians found the cavern which proved to be a warm inside and covered its small entrance with shrubbery and so frustrated the intentions of the rebels to locate the children who had kidnapped children. The cavern as I said before had a sma'l roe for an entrance almost too small for a man to get through but the interior of the cavern was large, warm and comfortable, and inside was found many provisions and a glorious kitchen and larder which had probably been aband oned by a hermit when the Glandelinians approached the region. Poor violet and her sisters indeed stood before the rescued children two b boys and the others six and seven year old girls, like poor beggar girls, and at first believed they had been seized by these pretty beggars so that they would ask if they could have the barley corn.

"Yiu You poor little creatures" Said violet--for after all she had accomplished she felt sorrowful for their own plight and did not care about themselves at all" come into the warmer part of the cavern for the night and you will be safe till we can go out to morrow o morning."

As violet and her sisters were pleased with the child ren they had rescued Jennie herself said:

"If you like to stay with us through the night you may do so" Said violet to the boys and girls she and her sisters had rescued "But if you want to be free you must do as we tell you to morrow, for we are the vivian girls and have rescued you from the enemy."
And the children realizing the true state of affairs promished to do as the kind vivian girls bade them, and for the early part of the night had a very good fire of it in the cave.

"No it may be probable that we shall have visitors." Said Joice. "Afterwhat we have accomplished the glandelinians are in a h habit of visiting me when ever they had have the op ortunity. The glandelinians are better off in knowledge of our doing than we are sometimes and we have to be careful. If you boys and girls would like to change clothes wit h us you and I will be provided for and not be discovered. If we are detained we can tell the glandelinians very pretty stories and therefore get out of it."

But the little boys and girls said they did not care to meet the glandelinians again or any other, they t hought nothing of the glandelinians whatever, for to them they were f worse than moles or dragons and they feared them exceedingly, and told the little girls why they had been carried off. They had been seized from a christian christian Cav Calverinian Orphan Asylum and were to have been carried off into slavery. They feared exceedingly that the glandelinians would come and pay the govern a visit but none appeared as their hiding place was not found though the lande indians Glandelinians were combing the whole region for them. To cheer the boys and girls and to keep them from being scared violet and her sisters played with them and even sang such son s as "Oppo Cockchafer! fly away" and "When the Parson goes afield, some of the boys who had been rescued almost fell in love with the brave vivian girls because of their exceedingly great beauty and del delicate voice but they dared not to say anything for they were sedate. The man who had used the cavern as shelter had dug a long passage through the earth from the cavern to another way and suspecting that it led somewhere violet and Jennie decided to walk through this passage and find where it lead to. Leaving their sisters with the rescued children in the cave they went off and were gone to their surprise and anxiety almost two hours when suddenly they rep reappeared. Violet explained explained first to her sisters what they had discovered and then her sisters told the children a tunnel led to the outside far from the region of the enemy. Before they started violet and her sisters begged the children they had secured from the enemy not to please be afraid of the dark or anything peculiar that may lay in the passage. After they had gone a little ways with the help of torches they made and lighted they came upon an entire man to their surprise lying on the floor o floor of the passage and Violet and her sisters were susurprised that their two sisters had not seen him before. They believed the man must have been a fugitive shot by the enemy and seeking refuge in the cavern had died there a short time before they them selves entered with the rescued children and was now lying just on the floor of the passage. The glimmering fire of their fagots showed plainly where he had been shot these torches lighting them through the long dark passage. When they had come to where the supposed dead man lay Violet thrust the torch up higher so throw the light much further. As he lay in the middle of the passage. Near the man lay a dead swallow his beautiful little wings pressed c o close against his sides and his head and feet were drawn back under his feathers, the poor bird certainly having died of cold. Violet and her sisters felt very sorry for this and the other children were curious and fright ened s me of them felt more about the bird than about the man for he wore a gray uniform, and they especially were very 'o fond of little boids who had sung and twittered so prettily before them through the whole sumn summer but one of the boys gave the body of the grayoat a push or touch with his legs and said:

"Now he won't be persuading us any more. It must be miserable to be a slave like the others are."

violet and her sisters and the other 'itt little girls did not say anything but when the others went on a little way violet and her sisters bent down, put the feathers aside which covered the mans head and kissed the poor bird upon his closed ques eyes.

"Perhaps it was he who sang so retill prettily before us al' summer long." Thought Jennie. "How much plesur pleasure these poor little birds have given me the dear pretty little boids."

Not daring to go any further unless they could see whether the man was rea, lly dead or alive and fearing they could not sleep at all they quickly made a beautiful carpet of hay and carried it and spread it over the dead manand bird, and laid some softer clothin clothes at the mans side so that if he was really dead he might lie soft in the or on the ground. First after that Violet searched through the pockets of his uniform and from what she found she discovered he was an asso ed Angelinian fugitive who had been s spy and who sh chased by the enemy had got shot and thus either died from the wounds in the cave or from exposure to the cold intense winter air outside.

"Farewell you poor spy of God" Said Violet "arewell. nd thanks to you for your help in obtaining the information and important papers from the enemy."

And then picking up the poor little bird she laid the bird upon the mans chest. But forbunately the man was not dead; he having ly laid torpid from the effects of the cold and from his wounds and now as he had been warmed, and he came to life again Violet and her sisters fairly trembled they were so startled, for the man may be a Glandelinian after all and no one could tell and he was very large and powerful powerful compared to them who all newup together would be more quarrowmain his grasp should he prove to be an enemy. ut nevertheless they took courage, laid the cotton closer around the poor mans manh head and brought a blanket that was found in the cavern and laid it over his head. Anximusly and hopefully all of the now expectant children waited for a while and soon he stirred, and tried to arise, but was quite weak, he cautiously open his eyes for a single mo ent, and look at the children around h him or the vivi n girls who stood before and about him with a bit of torch in their hands for they had not a single lantheen.

"I thank you you pretty little children" Said the sick and wounded man. "I have been fame f miously nursed. I hope I soon will be able to get my strength back again, and then we shall all be able to fly back to the christian lines."

"Oh" she said. "It is horribly cold without." It is snowing like a wild blizzard. We will have to stay in here for to night anyway, and I will nurse you. The Angelinians will be looking for us and one of us being on guard will lead them here if she sees them come."

Then a laving helped the man into the cavern where it was warmer she helped with her sisters t o get onto the couch while Jennie afterwards brought wayer in a small pitcher from a little lake in the cave and the wounded man took a drink, and told how he had spied on the enemy, secured inf r information and in escaping with important dispatches he had secured had been persued and shot. Despite his wound he had escaped tward the cavern unseen by his persuers and had in trying to get in tore one of his arms in a throon bush, and thus had not been able to get away so fast as he wished and so being over o overcome from pain and exposure all day fained as soon as he reached the passage. All the whole night the man and the children remained there, and violet and her sisters nursed and tended him carefully. As soon as the first dawn of morning came, the man found himself a little better and then Violet went to the opening to see if any one had come. where was no sign of the Angelinians around but outside the sun was shining gloriously, and Jennie who had been on guard proposed to go tward the christian lines to bring soldiers to their rescue and asked violet if she would go with them her. But violet felt sure that the man would be grieved if she herself left him so she said;

"No I cannot. "nd I cannot let you go either. If no one comes we will have to remain here untill the man get's well and then find our way to another christian army in case general Hanson had left the region."

As she said this the tears came in to her eyes for she was heartily fond of her sister and did not wish her to go out and face the perils of the forest alone with so many landelinians swarming about. Violet and her sisters indeed felt very sad. they could not dare go out into the sunshine for fear of the rebels who they knew were scouring the woods for them since they got the children. nd now they had a sick and injured man on them. The woods which was above the cavern grew high up into the air and it was quick a quite a thick wood for the poor girls to venture forth l a alone when so many enemies were about.

"You little girls have been so kind to me in my condition that I wish you were woman and I could have been betrothed to one of you" Said the man gratefully. "That in the only kind of a reward I h could have given. hat great fort une should await poor good little children like you who have done all this for me while fugitives from the enemy yourselves. Now you have seemed to work or have worked at t he profit of the enemy and yet you lacked nothing in kindness and braver n bravery and have saved me."

For tw days and nightsthey remained in the cavern. Violet and her sisters did all they could for him and every evening some of the other children came to him not afraid of him any more and he always said that he hoped when the war would soon draw to a close when the sun would not shine nearly so hot he could hope to reward them. Violet and her sisters were not glad at all of their enforced delay of getting out of the cavern for she di and her sisters did not like the idea of being kept like the prisoners in a cavern but they could not an aban on the wounded man and yet no Angelinians had come near their quarter. For those two mornings when the sun arose and every evening when it went down eve one of the little girls took turns at watching for signs of Angelininns always creeping as near to the exit as they dared and when the winds blew the snowdrifts into ridges and they could see the clear blue sky, they then thought how bright and beautiful it was out here, and wished heartily to see their dear friends in the christian lines again. But after three and four days passed no one of the Angelininns came, and it was doubtless that none of the Angelinians if they he issed the little girls had come into these woods t o look for them. When the next evening came the man wasmuch better.

"I'm afraid it will take me four weeks to get well." Said the man. "I'
I'm glad there is enough pro isions in this c avern to last that long.
"Then probably in four weeks we shall all try to find our way to the christian lines."

But violet and her sisters wept and declared that she that they did not understand why it was not that the Angelinians did not come and look for them.

"Nonsense" Said the wounded soldier and spy: "Don't be losing hope. The Angelinians probably do not know you are missing as you told me yourselves that you left the lines without leaving word you were going. We have plently here, the whole cavern is full of provisions and we can find some other christian army if Hansons are gone. Be thank Thankful of your good fortune that the enemy have not discovered our hiding place....."

It seemed upon apparent indeed that violet and her sisters and the other children with the man man would have to remain deep under the earth for weeks and never to come out in the beautiful sunshine untill it was safe to go back to their lines again. Poor violet and her sisters were very sorrowful and they felt that t it was nearly time for them to say farewell to the glorious sun, which after all had had hardly seen from the threshold of the cavern door and no other way..

"Farewell, though bright sun." they said, and stretched out their arms tward it and walked a little distance forth from the entrance of the cavern, for now the main fury of winter seemed to have been spent as it was near March." Farewell she and her sisters repeated twining their arms round a s some small little trees which still bloomed or grew there." I wish some one would have greeted the Angelinians for me."

"Tweet-tweet. tweet-tweet. a peculiar voice suddenly sounded over her head and looking up h they saw a swarm of sn sparrows flying by in apparent fright. when sudde l suddenly from the woods burst a small column of Angelinians. They suddenly saw Violet and her sisters and were indeed ve very glad and when they were embraced they told them how they had nursed a wounded man they found in a cavern and how they had rescued children and re ained cooped up there for nearly a week and that from fear of the enemy who were searching for them they had lived ddeep under the eart h, where the sun never shone. And from excitement and emotion the little girls could not refrainfrom wee ing weeping.

"The spring is soon coming now." S id one of the soldiers who was an officer. "We have left the lines on an a scouting tour and suddenly saw you little girls out here.. Will you come back to the lines with us now. You little girls can sit upon the backs of our horses then we shall fly away from these ugly woods and this d dark cavern, away, far away over the streams, andhills, where the sun shines much warmer than here."

"Yes we will go with you." Said Violet, and after the wounded man was helped onto a horse and the other children also, Violet and her sisters seated themselves on the horses back and the off the whole party rushed through the forest and though the little children still felt the cold bleak bleak air they nevertheless wore their blankets ab ove them and so they did not feel it too much. At last they came within sight of the christian lines. The sun was shining brighter the sky seemed to them twice as highand the air was crips and cold but not so severe as in recent days and soon under the most glorious green trees of evergreen they saw encampments of general Hansons army which was encamped near a beautiful blue half frozen lake and near by stood a building looking more like a palace of dazzling li white marble. Leafless vines clustered around the lofy lofty pillars at the top were many abandoned swallows nests.

"That is general Hanson vians headquarters." Said one of the Angelinian officers. "It is not properly arranged a great deal but as long as we remain here you may I hope be contented with it. you can as soon as you enter select for yourselves the most splendid beds in the building, while the children you had rescued wh will be taken care of and the men also. No one knew about your absence all this time not even Hanson himself and now you may have everything you can wish."

"That is capital" "Ofie Cried violet as she clapped her little hands. Near the bi building lay a great marble pillar which probably had fallen to the ground and had been broken into three pieces. As soon as the little girls had entered the building what was their surprise. There say sat by a table a little boy seemingly as transparent as if he had been made of glass, he wore the neatest boyscout uniform and he himself was not much bigger than any of the youngest vivian girls. He appeared to them to even be so bright and pretty that they could have believed him to be Thumbelinin's Angle of the flower. In the whole room was a swarm a n swarm of boyscouts but this one seemed to be the leader of them all.

"Oh how beautifulthe little girls are." Whispered one of the boys to another. Some of the boys were verymuch awed and shy at the strange ragged little girls so suddenly entering, but when they rep reappa reappeared again with their own clothing on and tthey saw them in their best the boys were very glad to know they were the much heard of vivian girls and felt sure they were the prettiest little maidians they had ever seen.

The next day the rescue of the other children by the vivian girls had been known and Violet and her sisters recieved a beautiful party for rew ard which for that time made them forget the grim buisness of the war. During the party violet and Jennie were crowned queens of the boyscouts of Angelinia and therefore one of the eldest boys presideing at the party took two artificial golden crowns crown crowns and put it upon their heads and so pretty did violet and her sisters look that they appeared to the boys like Fairy queens of the flowers. Then out of many bif paper flowers of bright and beautiful clors came a boy or a girl daintily dressed so pretty to behold that it was a delight, and each one brought violet and her sisters a present, and each child a had a pair of artificial wings fastened to their back s. ₥hen there was much rejoicing and one of the little boys sat above them and sang a sweet Fairy song which he accordingly did as well as he could, but yet in his heart he was sad, for he was so fond, of oh so fond of ₩iolet and her sisters, and would have liked never to part from them. ₣inally after the party the boy with a heavy heart went off to his command of boyscouts.. In the party the whole attendance ate beautiful green grapes, le mad leo onnde and oranges, the i air inside the house was fragrant with myrtles andhalsamns and indeed it was the biggest bunch of loviliest Angelinian children who had ever gathered to a party held by the beautiful and brave ₩ivian ₢irls who would risk anything to obtain what they wished to get.

GERTRUDE ANGELINE AND HERPART IN THE BATTLE OF JENNIE TURNER .

Since general Concentinian Aronburgs army had left the region of Vivian Wickey, and was marching on tward Jennie ₥urner Gertrude Angeline who was with this division was surprised indeed to see such an army of immense size and so many soldiers in endless streams marching backwards and forward and starting to form positions andclines of battle not far from Jennie ₥urner. ₥he big cities of tents in the fields put up in the previous days of the armys et opping hadalready been taken down and carried away in immense trains of wagons, and there was the most immense ai stir Gertrude Angeline had ever seen in her life.There had been so many great rumors that the main body of the enemy had been coming to make an effort tostop general Concentinian Aronburgs ad v nce on Jennis Turner and that theremight be a battle near there.Gertrude Angeline had a little friend with her who was so youngthat she did not know or understand anymore of it thanan any ant would. Gertrude Angeline however gave her such a gloomy account that o soon her little friend readily agreed with her that war was something worse than a scourage.As for Gertrude Angeline however, she had been a child slave and also seemed to have been born in abattle in the way she seemed to be about it and probablyif she had been born in a battle she could not have been more unconcerned. In probably a day or two it was known that the main bodies of the christin christian armies was some little way off on low ridges and in strong positions and that the enemyunder general johnston Jacka Manley had taken up its position on higher hills beyond not far distant, and to make it more peculiar Gertrude Angeline found that her headquarters which she had selected was between them, and so fearing a strif she prepared to leave for another no locat ion but as yet there was no battle.Each army seemed ot was starting to entrench itself and in a little while there was long black and red banks stretched across the far edge of vast fields before t he house when Gertrude Angeline to,d her little friend was''Breastworks or sailents'' for the christian lines especially for the pickets and the little girl asking Gertrude another quest ion pointed something out to her who blinked and yawned as if she did not care in the least bit if they were there or not.

Next morning if you would believe it a large squadron of Angelinian cavarly came gallopping swiftly by.A body of the main enemy had been seen, and they were belog belonging to a scouting party and they were going to see what it meant. In a little while they came back in a big hurry. As they r o rode by in a gallop they urged Gertrude Angelina either toleave tothe house which they said was between the firing lines or atonce go down into the basement where she and her friend might be safe from the storm of bullets and sh shells.Then they galloped across the field to get the rest of the men who were in the trenches beyond. Before they reached there GertrueGertrude saw a lot of squadrons of men appeare on the edge of the wood in the front of the house f but far beyond and they wore the garb of the Gargolies.

At first they were all on horseback but there was a sudden roar of muskets and some cannons from the trenches from the field in front of thw ho s house opposite the woods and the rebels rode back hastily and did not come out any more that day if you please to mention.The following morning however they too had dug a long trdnche trench, and Gertrude Angeline hearing some scouts say thnt these trenches was the picket linsof Gthe ₢landelinians became suspicious and from a window watched the further proceeding.At about seven o-clock in the mawning the Glandelinians began tocome out i into the fields from the woods and were spreading themselves out behind a long rise or knool in front of the house and they seemed to ail at once be scores of thousands. ₥he little girls teeth were just chattering with excitement and feari ng something would be up Gertrude seized her litle fr friend and rushed with her down stairs and then for several minutes there was an uproar asif the worlds last hour had come.There was a tremendous roar of musketry and cannon up from be the direction behind the house and the roar was repeated with redoubled fury from the otherside. When the uproar had ₥ulled Gertrude Angeline sh suddenly remembered her friendwa missing. ₩here in the world was she now?The last time she had seen her was about half an hour befofe before when she had been taken down stairs with her. For a few more minutes now after the lull there was a wilder uproar of firing than before and Gertrude Angeline despite the uproar da dragged a celiar w chair to the hi h cellar window and looked out.

Her heart almost stopped, for there out in the yard quite clear of the outhouses was her little girl friend standing some way up on the stoughrw t branch of a tree looking around as h if she was frightened.Her little white dress shone like a patch of snow against the dark brown bark of the oak tree and was indeed a conspicious markfor the ₢landelinians who were firing beyond..

''Jane. Jane. Jane.''she called.''Jane please come here. ₥oYou will be killed. ₢ome here Jane.''

Jane however seemed to be in for some kind of a game for as men in gray uniforms seemed to be approaching the child climbed higher up into the tree and Gertrude was amazed for she never knew a child so young could climb a tree and wondered where she learned t o do so..

''Jane for heavens sake come down do you hear?. Jane Jane. ₢ome down.''Gertrude called running up to the tree and holding up her arms to her. ₥he little girl probably would have liked to come down but she though able toclimb a treewas afraid to come down ever even if she could s do so, for she wasnow hif h up and saw with the greatest terror more of the gray uniformed men swarmed nearer and nearer and firing like blazes.₢he then looked down first over one shoulder and then over the other but she felt it was too high to jump.She even grew so dizzy that she was afraid she might fall and so clinging to the stoughtest branch above her she screamed and then began to cry as she pointedctwardthe approaching ₢landelinians.. Gertrude Angeline would have run back to the house and get a ladder but she was afraid that her friend might be killed by the approaching ₢landelinians and so she was afraid to let her get out of her si ht.. Indeed she was socompletely absorbed in J n Jane that she forgot about everything else, so seei ng if her pistols were in readiness, and that her little cartridge belt was full she hastily climbed the tree with her friend.

Just as the main leaderof one of the picket lines of christian soldiers was about to give an order to his men to make a sudden dash for some of the rebel trenches to his horror he saw tw two little goils both in white dresses and with flying hair suddenly run out of the into the clear space richt between him and the soliders on the other side, and closest to the enemy and stop first and then climb a tall oak tree just in the line of their fire. Indeed I must confess his heart seemed to jump into his mouth as he sprang to his feet and waved his arms wildly and yelled loudly to call the attention of the children..₥he was commelled to shout to himmen to charge the ₢landelinians who were approaching the place, and at the head of them he rushed out in front of the line and came ar a rapid stride down the slope.₢ome of the others all stop stood still and commenced a heavy firing at the ₢landelinians others held their breaths for fear if they didshoot they would hit the childre ni instead of the enemy. Gertrude Angeline was so busey watching the movements of the enemy that she did not notice anything at all thatwas unusual untill she heard some one call out down below;

''Well what on earth are you christian dogs doing out here??''''

The speaker was a young man with a mustache seemingly three inches long on each side and with gold braids on the sleeves of his gray jacket and his sholders decorated-like that of a King of t he world if there ever was such a man. He was a ₢landelinian lieutenant..''I'm

''I'm going to let you know that we are not christian dogs and you will not get us.'' n Answered Gertrude first with a ra mischievious smile and then looking at the tree with a little wave of her hand tward where the force of Angelinians was approaching swift ly.The little girl had stopped crying suddenly as if she felt it unsafe to be crying o in front of the gray uniformed stranger and Gertrude who had herself climbed carefully up to the highest limb peered cautiously and curiously over thithe rebels with a look of great satisfact ion in her pretty face as much to say.;

''Now I and my friend are safe . I'd like to you you Confederates of Angelinia get us if you can.''

Gertrude was stroking her friends hair and was looking at her very intently when a voice called to the man down below from the other side;

''Hellp e Hello, Johnoe Andersener. ₥hat's the matter?''

''Two christian dogs up in the tree.''Was the answer.

Gertrude looked around and saw another rebel o officer coming tward them. He was older than the first ₢lande inian and had on a gray coat with more blue in the gra-grayness. ₢he knew one was a Gargolinn and another was a ₡immermannian and for a second the little child with her was afraid Gertrude who had her hand onher gun would shoot the two men but she did not yet and the young ₢landelinian officer called out to the ₢landelinian soldiers coming younder;

''Two christian dogs up the tree.₢ome ahead.''

They came on and looked for a second up at the two children but they looked at Gertrude Angelina red, hard and one of them suddenly stopped down and picked up a ribbon that Gertrude had lost from herhead in her quick scramble up the t ree.The little girl seeing the ₢landelinians did not seem to do anything got over her fear in a minute. By this time other gray-coated men began to come up with their guns over over their arms.

''Hello what is up.''some of them called out immediately.

''We have two children of the christian dogs treed.''Said the foist two ₢landelinians and to make good their words, the timid child with Gertrude not liking the presence of so many graycoats that looked mean faced to her shifted her position again and went up to a fresh limb, from which she ag in peoped over at them.

''₩hay what are you two christian dogs doing out here in the tree?''They asked and to all Gertrude made the same reply;

''Come and getus if you can.''''''

Suddenly some more glandelinians came up. The two rebel officers went up and spoke to them but the men still crowded around the tree.

"Those two little goils will soon come down."Said one of the Gergoliss."All you have to do is point your guns at them and threaten to shoot."

"I don't know about one of them but I know the elder one won't."Said another glandelinian."They won't come down. It makes my head swim to hink how reckless she is."

Suddenly the other little girl h gave a faint cry which said that she wanted go go home to her mother. Gertrudes big blue eyes flii filled with tearns..

"I will protect you even with my life if necessary."She sn d said her lip trembling.

Instantly a dozen of the glandelinians had unbuckledtheir belts some laid their guns on the ground, and pulled off their coatho coats ol cold as it was, and soon each man was the first to try and climb the tree but the ugly looking gun Gertrude suddenly pointed at them made them hesitate. nd also the glandelinians found that the tree was too large for them to reach far enough around to get a gol good hold on it and so climbing it was found to be far mofe difficult that it looked to be and they wondered how the two children ever managed it.

"Why don'T you shoot them?"Suggested one rebel.

"Or cut down the tree!"suggested another.

But ths officer cried out that one of the children was a child slave and another was the dangerous Angelinian amazon called Angelinia Aronburg and that they wished to x capture them alive.At lnst it was proposed that one man should stand against the tree and another should climbup his hshoulders when he might get his arms far enough around it to work his way up the tree. Astout glandelinian with a gray jacket on planted himself firal firmly against the trunk of the oak tree, and one who had taken off his gray jacket climbed up on his shoulders. At length four of the landelinians got good Holds and went slowly up one after the other,, emid such n encour aging shouts from their friends on the ground below as ;

"Go it Jack, your comrade h r almost got as ahead of you. " "Look Out Johny Frances they are right behind you while the two children gazed in blank astonishment below from above and Gertrude was almost breathless in surprise. With such pulling and kicking four men finally got up to the lowest limb. A new difficulty however presented itself. he higher they climbed the higher the little girls climbed untill they were agay up on one of the topmost brahces. To Gertrude did not wish to shoot o unless the landelinians had intentions to do so themselves. Gertrude turned and looked back in alternate alarm but with satisfaction expressed in her face. If the men stirred she stood ready now to shoot, if they kept stil l she settled down and taunted them. Once or twice as s they moved, her friend took fright, and looked almost as if about to jump. Gertrude was breathless with ex excitement but she warned her companion not to jump or she would be killed. he glandelinians too wishinv wishing to getboth of them alive wereoveranixious to prevent that. hey finally called to them tocome down and surrender, held out their hands, coaxed and made promishes but it was all in vain. No promishes, no threats, were of the least avail and Gertrude knowing the character of the lande glandelinians knew what the results would be if she gave into them. he and her companion was safe out of their reach, and there she would remain with the child seve seventy feet avove the ground. suddenly she saw something strange occuring below.she heard an order given;

go back to the fence you men and get your rifles" and saw e whole lot of landelinians go running off to the fence two f yards away and presently came back with their rifles while two other glandelinians had their arms fu ll of blankets which they begin to unroll and hold open all around the tree.

"Ah "IThought Gertrude""It is a wicked trap."And she uncocked her revolver and made up her mind that nothing should induce her togive in. Presently she heard the glandelinian soldiers in the tree under her call to those on the ground.

"Are you fellows ready."''

"And they said."All Right."

Ah"Thought Gertrude."They cannot get down either. Serves them right."

but suddenly they all waved their arms at the little girls and cried;

"If you don't give in you will wish you had."

She however clung to theboung which was quite tn tender up there and it was well she and her companion did for she heard some one call something below that sounded like shak "shake them down" and before she or her friend knew it the two glandelinians nearest her reached up and seized the limb on which they were scrowed upthair faces and goodness-sit nearly shook the teeth out of their mouth and the eyes out of their heads. Shake, hake, hake.It came again each time nearly tearing their finger nails out of their sockets and scaring them to death. she saw the ground swim far below her, and felt that she would be mashed to death. she tried to hit their hands with the revolver butt but there was nothing but shake, shake,shake. she felt she could not hold out much longer so she formed a desperate resolve.She would get even with them. with a fierce cry partly ofrage partly of fear, Gertrude let go, whirled suddenly, and flung h erself upon the face of the upturned face of the man next beneath her, from him to the man below him, and finally sprang with a wild clear leap clear of the boughs and shot wis wi whizzing out into the air, while the two men thrown off their guard by the suddenness of the att ack, loosed their hold and went crashing down through the w forks of branches upon those below and caused all to fall from the pressure.

Before they could see where she was the other little girl taking the nerve did the same thing Gertrude had done and then as she a thoughed the ground without being injured shot like a wild sky rocket hissing across the yard and both children then vanished. OOh such a shout as there was from the glandelinian soldiers. Gertrude and her friend heard them yelling as she and the goil ran off across the field tward the aporoaching christianssoldiers. The glandelinians even howled with delight as the men in the tree with scratched faces and torn clothes came crawling down. hey looked very sheepish as they landed among their comrades and then retreated with the rest from the approaching christian skirmishers. Ever afterwards when Jane saw a glandelinian soldier approaching or any soldier wearing a gray uniform, she would run for life and hide as far back in a house as she could get and never come out untill she was sure he was gone.

During the christian advance on Jennis Jennie turner a little girl had an experience herself, which thou gh tame was not pleasant. She feared the Angelinians as much as she feared the glandelinians. Her mother not far from the town living in a small house was just taking out some meat from the oven of the stove. suddenly a p atter of flying feet sounded outside in the hard snow; thedoor of the kitchen was sl flung hast ily open and a little ten year old girl in a long red cloak came running in.The little girls name in this story was supposed to be

Lotinia Martin and herveyes were wide upon with surprise and also terror and before her astonished o mother com could comment u on her sudden disordered appearance the child gs gasped out;

"Oh mother a la large army of purple and red coated soldiers are crossing the turner Sexton Valley and one of my friends said they will come here in no time. Oh Mama there are millions of them coming, and I heard an awful noise not far away and I.m afraid they are cou going to have a terrible fight near here.He told e to tell you a d papa that we must hasten to depart at once or we may be killed. He will give us some horses and we must accompany him to the houses prepared for battle fugitives on the sides of the distant mountians where we may be safe."""""

"He m s must be a very kindly man."Said her mother feeling a little alarmed but not so terrified as her daughter. Xalm thyself child and don't be so frightened. he Angelinians won't do us no harm. It is the glandelinians who would and if the Angelinians re approaching we may be still more safe. when you have regained your breath, run to the other side of the house and bid your father to come hast ily for us.Alas for these cruel troublesome times when us aged and children flee before the march of Angelinians and glandelinians combined."""

With a sad anxious face she made preparations to leave, while her little daughter hurriedly pulled her red hood over her beautiful brown curls and then sped down the path tward the other house. The noise she had heard had grown in terribly fierce intensity and tremendous reports like hundreds of thunderclaps crashed some where every minute and she met her father coming hoxward in great ex excitement.

He was quite old and even a little feeble and bent and clad in ccivial clothes.

"Wort in"He sni d to her as she trotted along at his side;

"Do not foo fill your poor mother to day with foolish terrors but lend your help like a little heroine you should be and remember think that all things come from the hand of the lord. The Angelinians we need not far but it is dangerous of course to remain if the battle approaches too near us. Remember the heriones called the vivian Girls who are the daughters of general vivian. hey are bever afraid of anything."

The little girl whi was as pretty as a daisy glanced up pitiously at his face.

"But will not the Angelinians spoil our house of all the goods, furniture and also perhaps burn our home and everything and render us homl homeless papa, and now you are an old man without any sons, and papa too so old?"

"I know not my daughter. So far the Good Lord and His Blessed Mother had spared my gray hairs though this great rebellion have taken all my six sons brave fine lands too."His voice shook."But my daughter you must be brave like they are. You are our only daughter."

"I will then try to remain brave. Not another tear will i I shed. But it is so ard to see our homes go."

They entered the snow covered yard and found the old woman busily packing whats she could into any of the secret places, and piling up household t reasures to hide or for to bury in the woods so that neither party could hold of them. The little girl flittere flittered hither and thither and you all day long, her nimble little feet and clever headsaving the old people much fatigue. The little girl was kneeling in a roomy closet upstairs, searching out her mothers cloak, when sudde ly her bright eyes fell on her fathers ink bottle an d ink pen and holder lying on some large blotter.

Seeing the ink bottle and the pen also she suddenly thought of a good suggestion. Slowly and most thoughtfully her fingers guided the inkpen across one large sheet and then across another. When the task was finished the little girl raised her flushed and pale face and surveyed the results with great satisfaction. The letter ran as follows:

TO THE ANGELINIANS OR REDCOATED SOLDIERS:

I am Letitia Martin, aged ten who live in this small house with my old parents who have lost their six sons who are my brothers. My poor mother and father are very old and feeble, are gentle n and are peaceful to all friends as well as foes. I pray you please For the Sake of God and His blessed Mother dear Angelinians spare the house to them, and do not burn or ruin our hom home or allow the glandelinians to do so either. Perhaps yourgeneral or any of you may have a litt le girl or boy like me or my grown brothers in Angelinia who m you were compelled to leave behind, and also old parents. I'm sure you could not burn the roof from over their own heads, and in such pity and mercy spares oursif not for our sake for the sake of God. We leave you as much a to eat as we h v have and would leave you muc much more if our stores were larger.

LETITIA MORTIA...'''

THIS was written as neatly as possible on both papers if you please to mention and Letitia tucking them into her pocket slipped off to her duties with a much brighter heart . She felt sure about the Angelinians, but she knew surely if the glandelinians came instead they would in ignore the note so matter how touchingly it was written. The last preparations was soon made, and tward evening they ar star started to join the little calvcade already in line to r travel up the sides of the distant mountians to the tents and houses erected there in readiness for such incidents as this.

''Alas my chickens and ducks.'' Ho Exclaimed Mortia when they had turned their backs on the low gray house; ''The fowl are still in the pen mother. Let me hasten back and turn them loose.''''''

Permission wasgiven to her to do this and away she darted to the pens which held the chickens and ducks. there were her snow white ducks and also a gay gander and a flock of chickens with smaller chicks. They were indeed the little girls part idiler pride and care, andknew her well, but only stopping to stroke one smooth back she oped opened the wicket of both pens and drove them squaking and honking and and hissing into the distant woods. Then she pulled the papers from her pocket and hastily slipping one below the main kitchen door, she fastened the other on the front door knocker hoping the Angelinians would come hither and see it and not the glandelinians the latter whom she knew would spare nothing and would only blaspheme if they saw the notes.

Then she rejoined her parents and was soon mounted behind her father in the small procession which wound slowly up the rough mountian road to safty. Far off to the north could be seen a haze of smoke and still the distant noise was heard but it had receded a great distance. At sunset the first column of victorious christians in bright shining red uniforms reached the village followed by large forces of purple coated soldiers on horseback. The peas peaceful quiet and neat ness of the Mortia homestead was invaded by the stamp of heavy boots and the clink of many spurs. One of the officers who was a general soon found and read the note that the little girl had left under the knocker, and hewas general Concentinian Aronburg himself. The other note similiary written was read or spelled out in the kit hen by another officer who was general Vivianenna. General Concentinian Aronburg or Whilliamsburger Zimmermann as he called himself looked thoughtfully at the note for a minute and his stern war hardened face softened.

''You are indeed a bold little lass, and a loyal one liky my own little neice Gertrude Angeline as she calls herself.'' He mutt ered. ''You must surely take us for fiends if we would destroy your homes. And we will assure you no rebels will comehere as they are running like sheep.''''''

His thoughtsthen drifted to his own Angelinian home, his wn little lassin his army Angelinia Aronburg who was his neice. There was a christian heart under that terrible red uniform coat. Striding into the kitchen he found a knot of officers commenting on the other latter and his order soon went forth that no pilliage was to be indulged in as this was a christian home not a rebels and so no damage was done to goofs or furniture and not even the stores was touched. Just as the men outside hungry and tired were searching for supper along the half frozen brrok vrook came a vunch of strange geese no doubt turned loose by some rebels not long ago, and they were quickly seized and dispatched. The chickens leLetitia had let loose and also the ducks and the gander were found by other soldiers but not one of these were injured and were chaz chased ito the house to be sheltered. When

One of the An elinian soldiers had a long knife or his saire in his hand ready to kill one of the squaking hens belonging to the little girl when he suddenly realised it was one of her own prope ties and so he said to himself;

''Mistress Mortia shies this and the other birds may be thine I'll spare him and the others out of courtesy for you and he popped the old mother hen into the open pens with the rest of the fowls. ''They will at least make for you and your parents a good roast for the coming New Yr Years.'' so the e chickens escaped with its life. Next night fell at sunset the bugs suddenly blew the m r marching signals and the whole army started after the enemy onad more in the persuit and the generals and their soldiers left the villiage and proceeded on with ther armies. In the little huts and tens and houses in the forest on themountian top e very one there was watching anxiously for the red glow in the sky hich would tell themthe ir homes wet were burning but the night fell and passed completely untill morning broke and not even the slightest glimmer shone and so the whole swarm returned to the villiage and found everything intact. Letitia Mortias h little heart beat with thankfulness. As she and her parents came to their own door, they saw a solitary gander which never had belonged to them.

''Thank Heaven the whole flock is safe and still with us and they have even placed them inide the pens.'' Said her mother. ''What what has the strange fo l on her long neck. uch a burden I never saw on any fowl before.''

Letitia Martin sprang forward immediately and kneeling down took off a large paper an bi na bag and a slip of paper. The bag had money in paper bills and a pretty dimpled smile broke on the little ir girls face as she read what was written on the slip. It was signed by the colonel or by the general Concentinian Aronburg himself and by a large number of his generals and soldiers also. When she cried gleefully;

''Listen father and mother what this is;;

Sweet mit mistress of heaven we have finished the fight;
So Us Angelinian soldiers will bid you a fair good night;
Is I t is time for all of us soldiers of God to wander;
To you fair child we have brought you a lot of geese;
And gave you ten dollar rolls apiece;
And left the change with the strange and lonesome gander.

Though terrible Angelinian redcoats though we be
From our good actions you will plainly see;
That to little innocent children we know how to grant a fair and prompt petition;
We are all rought soldiers but mesod care
so with Heavens granted wish we have endeavored to spare
Every thing you own and hope for in a decent condition.

The in quick reply to her parents and to the astonished people around her she finally told them all about her petition to the Angelinians.

''It is as you have declared papa dear'' she said as she fed corn to her returned chickens. ''General Concentinian Aronburg has wta ed the stayed the hands of his soldiers and also stayed the hands of the enemy too, and perhaps'' stopping to grab some more corn from the pan while a sweet innocent look came into her pretty face ''some day the glandelinians themselves may have hearts like ours.''''

''Aye it is impossible as they have no obedient l daughters like you to teach them to good deeds.'' Said her mother as she lovingly kissed her little girls upp upturned faces.

I will have to wri te a short description of a heroic deed done by a solder during the height of the battle of Jennie Turner when it seemed probable that the enemy was about to win the hot co ntest. When the glandelinians had made one of their most gigantic onslaughts and the Angelinian columns had been almost like a turned floor burned through and falling through from a ceiling one of the Angelinian officers by the name of T Thomas Ford saw full within his view through that fearful fire storm of the glandelinian cannon and charging columns a new and bigger column far to the right rushing alo ng, and with cavarly creeping higher and higher and already overwhelmed one of general Vivianannas right wings and was turning it. When amid all the din of the conflict what a shout from millions of voices. Oh how the Angelinian generals and all other officers also shouted.

''For Heavens sake men/ save that division from being overwhelmed.''

Again and again and sti again divisions of fresh troops had been sent to stem the approaching tide of disaster but the rebel troops being overwhelming in numbers at this point held them back like a wall of stone. The officer could hear the wilder uproar of yells, the deafening crash of fresh cannons, a new and m re heavier roll of countless musketry, and could see columns upon columns of Angelinians with torn and g ragged flags and banners go to it with might and main but to no avail. When the young officer shouted:

"Never mind boys. I will try to bring a rally."

when in answer to him his comrades of his division shouted:

"We are coming to your suppoe support as fast as we can."

Through the smoke of battle they could not at first see him, but the officer soul and collected sat on a snow covered mane bam horse his large round blue hat carefully placed by his side and his eyes stared in bewilderment and surprise at the immense columns of the advancing enemy. Still he as he viewed them he was calm and conscious as the columns of the foe crept nearer and nearer through the sea of musketry smoke. The roar of cannons increased and the noise of myriads of explosions, the shouts of the millions of Angelinians, the "Devil Yell" of the enemy and the noise of musketry all over kept the sound of many commands of officers and generals from ele-hoking their ed orders and signals were made. This young officer however saw and heard one of the grim warnings it coming again and again. Oh god god what a cry. It came again and again. The roar of cannons and musketry and the yells of both sides waxed faster, the young officer saw the columns of panic stricken Angelinians flying to the rear in a stampede ep stampede, he saw the earth fly up in the force of thousands of mighty explosions. The Angelinians at the guns worked like tigers, not minded the terrific enemy musketry fires. The infantry line buckled and bended in, the officer saw it giving way; then with the crash of hell roared anew the cannons, down went platoons of glandelinians per shot, but the survivors in gray scattered over the works andmanny the canjons with a dash, and the officers jumping and dashing this way and that among their stampeding christian columns thought now it was all up for the christian line and one of them brought his arm to hide the sight of the coming disaster there, when swift at their side came new columns led by a young officer rushed by with a thrilling shout, and went right through the smoke and flame of battle straight as a tornado strikes a town. They closed with the surprised rebel line there was a wavering of men in gray then a gradually drawing backwards and the others rallied and dressed forward, some shouting and crying but the day was saved and sounds who battle was won. Oh how the men raved, shouted cried, and hurrahed and waved their tattered colors, when more and more rallied to their works once more and rushed at the enemy like tigers and fought most desperately lest the surprised and disconcerted glandelinians should rally themselves and reinve their success. Unhappily however the poor young officer lay dead across the works having given his life to rally the christian lines.

Oh ye readers I know would admire to have seen this bravest of heroes who at the risk of his young life saved the christian line from being broken.

Now is it not true that you would have liked to admire him for his brave deeds.

A MISHOUNDED WITH CALVERINIANS WHO THREATENED TO JOIN THE REBELLION.

Most of the Calverinians in the west though not loving the glandelinians had been discouraged because of the seemingly or positive fact of the coming failure of the Angelinians in their efforts to supress the rebellion and had regared all of the glandelinians already as heroes because of their many victi victories, and the daring deeds accomplished by the n insurgents which they have counted, and of the immense stores of provisions they have already seized and the gallent defense of Calverins, Crowley and vivian vickery. The glory of the Manley generals, Miss Hollester johnston and the other glandelinian chiefs depended mainly onttheir bravery rather than on the fact that they were rebellious Angelinians.

Yet indeed there always should be rotes among any of these stories for the account of a brave Angelinian officer who was a Calverinian himself by birth who by his most wise counsel to a Calverinian conspirator of a hostile Calverinian section saved many lives both of Calverinians and Angelinians, and lessened the number of those Calverinians in joining the glandelinians. After the battle of Jamie murmer at the time of the rout of the glandelinians for thirty thirty seven miles after general Thorntyshon glandelinian division he been annihilated, the Angelinians halting a /i little encamplec encamped within full sight of the also baited enemy and during the time this Angelinian officer was employed with a squadron to go out and scout on the enemys On the headwayers of the dangerous Stanek river he w as mounting in advance of the command in company with fourteen Angelinians and twenty Abyssinkilians. On that evening before sundown the party saw far off on a small pa prairie a Calverinian who showed a white flag and came slowly toward them. When had come very near, the soldiers pro proposed to kill him though he wore the garb of a civial and race report to the government that the man killed was a Calverinian insurgent and one of the rebels they were looking for.

But the young Angelinian officer said:

"No indeed. We should not shoot any one who has a white flag of truce. It may be he is some man carrying a dispatch or perhaps he is an Angelinian spy disguised as a Calverinin Calverinian farmers."

When the man had come very close to them they saw that he was dressed indeed lik like a farmer but he did not have the fringe of hair over the forehead band for forehead that the Calverinian farmers wear and he had no beard or whiskers. The Angelinian officer asked him in Calverinian Latan if he was alone and did not have any Creole Confederates with him or hidden in ambush somewhere to which he replied in Angelinian that he was accurately alone and had no one with him at all. Then the young Angelinian officer inquired of him when he really was. The stranger made the sign and said he was a Calverinian in birth. He was however made him a prisoner and took him into the christian encampments and after alittle who while the young Angelinian officer began to talk to him in Calverinian. He could not at all understand a word of it. Then the young officer said to him:

"My friend ye are a rebel Calverinian and refuse to speak Calverinian."

The man was compelled to acklowledge that he was. When the young officer said to him and talked to him patiently and gave him much good advice.

He said:

"My friend, you are a Calverinian but you and Angelinians are of the same kind of people, talk the same language, and should have nothing to dowith the wicked rebellious glandelinians and what I am going to tell you now is for your own good and for the good of your fellow peopleand countrymen. I speak toy you as a friend and not as an enemy enemy and what I will say to you now is so that you may save your women and your children from being torn from you and you Calverinians seized and deported in exile as traitors. It is of no use for you Calverinians to try and fight the Angelinians and you know their cause is justas glandelinin's is wicked. I am a Calverinian myself and have been among the Angelinians for a year now, and I know how many soldiers there are and how many armies they have mustered. They are thicker than the grass in a million a parks and lawns. Even if you were to kill a hundred thousand it would be nothing at all and it would be like only killing a few flies and see the same back in thousands. There would be doubly as many more left to kill. If you try to fight us our soldiers will even hunt you like an army of terrible spirits and ghosts. Here ever you go as fugitives the Angelinians will follow after you like demons and you never will get no rest. All the soldiers will be incessantly on your trackes. Even if you were to go on the top of the highest mountains or seeking hiding places in the deepest caverns and seemingly where no one else would and could come the Angelinian soldiers will follow you, and if they cannot capture you they will get around you and wait even if it takes a hundred and fifty years. All the Angelinians would have plenty to eat, and they could wait untill they starved you into surrender or untill you died of starvation. Where is one Angelinian general dressed more than any other, more terrible than the highest christian commander in himself and he is general Consentin in Consentinian Arenburg and what he says must be done. It is no use to fight him or any of the other Angelinians. Now if you and your other Calverinians who have followed you in this plot are good and wise you will go out and get all your people to turn away from glandelinin's cause, and bring them in before general Consentinian Arenburg and give yourselves up to Angelinin's cause instead. It will be better for all of you in the end. I speak y to you as a friend and not as an enemy because we are both of the same blood, and I hope w you will be reasonable and listen to my worlds words you't committ suicide by fighting Angelinia".

The Calverinian after some hesitation finally said:

"My friend your words seem good and I thank you indeed for your friendly advise you have given me. But I cannot follow it and neither will my followers agree to do as you pr propose. your cause a though right or wrong is on the losing side and so why should we take chances with terrible glandelinin."

Then the young Angelinian officer said in answer:

"The glandelinians are not have so terrible as the Angelinians if you rebel against here. The Angelinians will do doubly terrible things, will carry off all you possess and should we win Calverinia would be thrown into the provinces of Glandelinia as a seconded and rebellious state, a traitor state, and will not be allowed never to come under the union of Abbiesinia again. How would that suit you?"

After some consideration the Calverinian said:

"If my people will take your advise I will follow it. But if not we will rebel that is all."

"But will you pro promish to try and change their views."

"Yes."

"How do you Calverinians make a promish?"

The Calverinian answered:

"By raising our right hands to the One Above."

The young Angelinian officer then said:

"The same is the custom among all the Angelinians."

The Calverinian then raised his hand and made the promish. After he had been detained two or three days he was allowed to go a and about several days afterwards he brought in a band of men but he said that through his influence he only succeeded in getting one third of them to change their views stating that the rest would not listen to him and go turned against him and went over to the enemy. However he was thankful to the young officer for saving him from running into disgrace.

The evening of the day after the christian victory at Jennie Turner came on with a strong nort heast wind blowing, a dull gray sky filled or covered with heavy clouds and with all the unwelcome appearances of the approach of one of the late winter storms.At this time having heard of the circumstances that had led from the results of the battle the vivian girls had been at Jack Evans headquarters, and they also heard that most of the generals seeing the chance were go going to do celebrate the victory in as true a style as possible. When they questioned Jack Evans about it he said;

"I have been thinking about it, and it would be a good idea for you girls yourselves to form the celebration itself and also have a little fun between times.The generals knowing who you are wish you to do so. What say you my dear Princesses of Abbisannia."?

Violet and her sisters looked at each other, and Jennie asked;

"Between what?" "Why any time you choose so it's not too long a wait."

"Oh yes Jack"cried Violet clapping her hands"I and my sisters are ready for anyt hing."but then" she added half aloud and half playfyully"you forget that we are like prisoners, like the Princesses we have read about."

"Never were prisoners unless you were in the hands of the enemy"he exclaimed"It may be however that the threatening storm may prove to be your jailer fro now onehowever over through other circumstances, you know you are as free as the air and most of the highest generals even have to do as you say."

"Let's see, what shall we have for the celebration"Joice said thank th taking no t notice at this happy turn of affairs and spea ing very slowly and deliberately just as if she was not wiling to settle the matter on the subject at all."Let me see.What shall the Celebration be.Ah I have a happy thought.We'll have a general Carnaval."

"what's that Joice Dear?"asked general Evans with half suspidion in his voice.

"you don't know what a Carnaval is"exclaimed Violet in half astonishment."Well upon my word Ja k j ack you are the limit."It did not occur to her to mention the idea what a real Carnaval was for she suspected that Evans was only playing with her and knew just as well as she did.Yet she said

"The Carnaval I mean in is in this fashion;

"We will throw the whole christian camp open from six in the morning till eleven or twelve at night.It means fun in every barracks for the soldiers, music and all kinds of great games they can play, story telling feasting and everything else known in carnavals, with candy pulling, sliding courtains in our own headquarters, tinking tinkling of many bells, and all kinds of funny performances in t he libary and other rooms, it also means almost any right thing within bounds that you and about all the christian generals in our rank besides other officers of all ranks choose to make it, with the hose house house thrown open as long as you like."

"o We out of doors at all"asked Angeline doubtfully but with sparkling eyes.

"Oh yes all we can wish providing the storm is not too severe; but from pre present appearances, there'll be a big blizzard for March, which may last for a full week, and that will only make the celebration all the more pleasant."

"o it will, how splendid"cired Catherine"Jack Evans can take out bi our big covers covered wagon and go for all the generals who are willing to come, snowy or not, while we can plan the best of the fun.We'll try all sorts of queer and all out of sort ways for the carnaval.good for the Celebration over general Concantinian Aronburg victory at Jennie Turner."

"Good for the Carnaval for the same purpu purpose"shouted the rest becoming as enthusiastic as the vivian girls.

"Oh Jack dear"continued Jennie"You are too lovely for anything. You are too good to us.How did you happen to think i of it?"

"Well you see dear vivian girls"said Jack Evans with a glow look in his face "I thought my poor little Abbisannian Princesses friends had been always good and patient, forgiving, and loving under all the persecutions of the r cruel Clandelinians who also are supposed to be your faithful and loyal subjects, and so si since the christian armies under general Aronburg won such a brilliant victory at Jennie Turner we all had decided to have a great frolic by a way of change since for the time present we have not been called upon to march, and there are no enemy armies cwithin sight."

"How far a has general johnston Manley gone in his retrt retreat since t he battle I wonder?" thought Angeline(strange to sq say neither she or her sisters had known how really disastercus wew Manleys defeat)but she said aloud"We are ever so glad to hear of the victory Jack dear.No of besides all the generals we also should invite as many children as possible.Now whom shall we invite."?

"Oh do hear that whom?"will you"exclaimed C Daist Daisy in well feig feigned disgust while Hettie went on gaily"Let's have plenty of girls and boys. Don't you say so ,sisters."?

"Oh yes lets have all the boy and girl scouts in our own army.Let's invite the two Turner sisters, Angeline Richee, Mildren Maxwell Gertrude Angeline, and Fenrod and his friends.It would be such a treat for them, you know they never as yet had a cyance to go to a party of our own making."

"It is a good sugge dear girls, but how about Walter Starring, Jack Hans and the others?"

"Oh no we could not include them even if we wanted to Jack dear.They are all to far away in other armies just now, and cannot come if we did invite them.At any rate if we could locate them I'd like to ask them?"

"Then you have it"said Jack Evans."Now let us go and prepare for our supper."

Joice ran on ahead so have as to have a word with Angelinia Aronburg on the delightful subject of the coming carnaval, but the others lingering strolled Evans with a whispered;

"How did General Christian Aronburg ever thrash Manley so completely.That Manley was said to be a fellow that no general could even outwitt."

"I have not heard anything to the effect"was his reply."Manley was just whipped like a runaway slave."

"Oh "said Jennie in a disappointed tone"I hoped Manley and his army had been captured."

"I have perhaps"returned Evans, smiling gravely"heard that nevertheless he had recieved the most disgraceful defeat on record for any defeated army in the world of wars so far."

The little girls looked up eagerly, hoping earnestly to hear more, but Evans without another word led the way tobhis supper room.

The prepared Carnaval proved a most complete success.In the first place, not only all the christian generals and other commissioned officers came, but all the boy and girl scouts, and as many re scued child slaves as possible, all of whose names had been added to the list, secondly a most terrific and yet lovely Early March snowstorm, one of the blinding dry kind with below zero weather at the same time, and the storm evidently had come to say for days as it seemed, thirdly all the guests who had been invited made it a great d erolic from the start, and every long sleigh load driven to the door by Jack Evans himself came in singing, and tooting horns and making all the noise generally he heard on a wild noisy New Years night and a fourth Of july Celebration at the same time, fourthly, Emperor Vivian himself as the little girls said was splendidly uniformed, and good as a saint, and the vivian girls were said by the others to be too lovely for anything, fifthly the big house from t op to bottom was bright like a Carnaval hall, homelike and most beautiful, and lastly, hardly anything was broken, and the building was not burned d the ground--all of which J Jack Evans and others agreed was indeed more greater than usual.

Such a wonderful day for the ben beginning as this w one was was very difficult to describe indeed.No one could hardly imagine the scene properly I believe.The great squadre halls of t he building were beautifully decorated especially those on the first and second floors,c also were the broad stairways, and fine open rooms, and beautiful flowers of all kinds were seen , and pretty boys and girls scouts and other children, flitting, gathering, everywhere, from garret to kitchsken, now scattered, now s crowded thickly/ now listening to stories, now running, now hiding hiding, now gazing at an impromptu performando of some kind, now sitting in a big demure circle of any size, with a napkin on every lap--you you know whyim maybe--now playing child ish games and showing their boy and girl scout skill, and the like, now having a race on the snow covered company street in front of the house, or playingplaying games on the broad fle freshly swept piazza that extended along every side of the building, now giving three cheers for their generals and their flag, and then beginning all over again.It lasted more than ten hours, yet nobody as yet was tired(untill the next day), and all the guests finally declared in one way or another, that it was the very nicest time they had ever known in their lives.Violet and her sisters were as delightful as they looked or as they were beautiful, and acted as host and hostess.They also enjoyed everything, were on the alert for every ones pleasure, and by their good humor, courtesy, and beautiful manners, and kindness for every ones pleasure, unconsciously set an an example to all those at the celebration.Jack Evans--oh now what could he himself say.Enthusiased by the example of the vivian girls, he threw all his military cares to the wind, proposed all kinds of games, invt invented capti capital" forfeits"sprang all kinds of great surprises upon the generals themselves and upon t he children, laughed and played like a boy , and better yet, wore his best smiling look all the time.

"How handsome h general Evans"thought more than one guest among the children themselves."Yet they say he looks like a bulldog when he is angry.No wonder the beautiful vivian girls like him so well.No what are we going to do now?"

When indeed would follow a merry well ordered rush to this or that part of the house, according to the special attraction of the moment.But really it is very much night impossible for any writer r to describe the day properly or fully.The only way is to give the reader and many others a few descriptions of the observations th at could have been taken on the spot.

he was thankful to the young officer for saving him from running into disgrace.

The first main part of it started in the great kitchen.There stood the beautiful vivian girl Princesses like the most beautiful little queens in the world.But violet herself if she was to be the real queen had the sceptre.It was a big spoon made of hard woon wood.she and her sisters and a dozen or more girl scouts including the two little urmer sisters, Angelinia Aronburg and some others were also crowded about the big kitchen st ove.all had large towels pinned over their uniform dresses of purple, almost in the same fashion of the way Topsy wore in in Uncle oms Cabin, close to the throat, tight around the skirt , and the arms left free.What in theworld were they making do you suppose.nothing but Taffy candy.It was nearly done.If any one can cook anything better than the vivian irls, let him or her come and see me.A After the boiling and stirring that the Taffy Candy had recieved from the many girls it had been near the finishing point as soon as it should have been.inally Violet herself held forward a small pan of water, cold water not warm.Jennie carefully dipping out a large spoonful of the fragrant candy dropped it into the water.It sizzled , and then stiffened, and with a cry of hurrah the girls were ready to take it from the fire.

''It is cool enough now.Come boy and girl scouts every one of you.''cried Jack Evans.

''But here put these on every one of you''cried Violet, her arms now loaded with coarse towels to be used as aprons, which she had specially prepared for the occasion.ut fer heavens sakes children be carefully.on't burn yourselves.'' ut it seemed that no one heard them They were at the candy pulling without delay.Boys and girls worked in pairs; with their hands daintly washed and greased and taking soft lumps of the now cooling comfection drawing them out into long shinning ribbons, doubling and drawing them out again, untill they became lighter and lighter in color, and finally the beautiful strands were declared ready for more artistic handling.hen followed a great scene of royal fun and even rivalry each young one trying to outdo the other in the work.ome twisted the soft candy into all forms of shapes and laid them aside to cool, some made them into charming braids, others made little walking canes and ornaments, one and all indluging meantime in falvorsome morsels, and finally shouting with delight over the masterpiece of Jennie. ivian which she had placed upon a table for inspection and which he called a andelinian soldier at ''Present arms.

''Ha, ha''shouted Jack Evans''Prett y good.But suppose it had been a andelinian soldier presenting arms with his legs.o guess it could be more reliable for military drills.He looks like a Jackass with his gun on the wrong shoulder.B ut that sarcastic and well informed young general was hardly heqrd in the loud laughing commotion.Then what a washing of hands came.yor the fun of it, Evans had caugh caused warm water to be put into a great rounded wooden tub big enough to bath a elephant in and still have room, which stood upon the floor nearly three feet high on a large bench, and now all the candy pullers were taking their turn in a close ring around it all frantically feeling and struggling for thecsoap which repeatedly bobbed to the surface, only to be quickly dashedc out of sight again by some desperate little hand.

While this merry crowd of little cooks and pullers were working and frolicking in the kitchen, under the watchful eyes of the beautiful and good ivian girls, a few or a large part of the company of generals would have been fou found on in other parts of the old mansion, amusing themselves in their own fashion. one of the younger generals were playing their own kind of games, and one or two older ones who as it happened, had seen quite enough of the kitchen in their own headquarters preferred to enjor themselves in the finer and more beautifu ly decorated apartments.

Let I and the reader look in to general Evans council room the door of which stood slightly ajar.Angelinia Aronburg almost as beautiful and good as the vivian irls was there alone.she was sitting in general Evans big chair with a volume of typewritten pieces of paper in her lap, forgetting for the present the party, forgetting that she had laboriously smoothed her golden hair for the occasion, forgetting that she had put on her best lavender unifora, now brand new, forgetting the new collar and pretty bow at her throat, a girf from violet herself, conscious only that she was examining something very mysterious which she had found in the place, all accounts of some unknown writer or war correspondence who had taken up in tpyewriten form all the accounts of the war so far.She also had found various pictures of children and a phonograph with a hunxred hundred and fifty records which she had played all day and tired herself out with them and the efforts of so much continual winding of t he crank untill her right arm felt as if it was stiff.She Angelinia Aronburg smiled to herself as she was now looking at one sheet of paper after another, feeling that after all there was a great deal of life and spirit in this great war, and that it was not an imagination.he felt sure she could take these written accounts and make a perfect history out of them.hen as she read on, the great comfprtable arm chair, the soft carpet, the well filled book shelves, and the s subdued light gave a her a vague delightful sense of having improvedc herself already as she saw herself many times of her heroism in the accounts writing down.

[illegible] Sterring, Jack ane and the others!''

During the whole time that general Hanson ivian or his Brother, and Concentinia Aronu or Aronburg had been besieging the city of ivian [illegible] as she saw herself m ny times of her he roism written down.

Now let us go and look into the other rooms if you don't mind.No one but generals and other officers at some private work were in what was supposed to be known as the pla parlor, ad as well as in the back sitting room, the dinning room was locked for a while, but high up on the garret stairs, sat Penrod the Rattlesnake boy scout, and three wide eyed, open mouthed other youngsters listening to Penrod and the Rattlesnake boy tell of their recent experiences.

''True indeed it is''he was saying, ''of course I'm telling the truth. I know the outcome also of other experiences of people I know--the experience of general Edwin unther for one thing.He is said to be a great general now.I'll tell you boys how it was he got his promotion.He was out on a scouting tour with a party of generals including Evans way off before Meldon icknell town.He also had a force of cavarly to help him, I believe to watch out for a scouting forve force of andelinians.hey had ridden into a most desolate place, and at this time of the year the andelinian scouting arties were so numerous and troublesome that they were dangerous.e General Edwin unther nor all his party never went outside the christian lines without being armed to the teeth, and they always went out in a large body so as to be ready for an attack.One morning when on scouting as I daid before, they heard the roar of horses approaching from their rear.hey had ten thousand men out with them at this time, noe none of your small party scouting parties I'll tell you, but a strong force also all well mounted. ''

'' Why did they go out in such a strong party''asked one of the listeners.

''Why for the sake of safty.He'll general unther knew by what he and his party heard that a large force of andelinians was approaching, and not knowing who they might be, and not knowing how far from the christian lines he was, he welled his forceand deployed it near the edge of a woods, and just in time for he saw a very strong force of andelinians called the Gargoylian gurds coming forward like a tidal wave.hat did Edwin unther do but deliv deliberately form a deadly ambushcade, and his whole force let go at the rebels as soon as they got a certain way into the woods, discharging every weapon at them.Only heaven knowns how many of the andelinians were killed or wounded, and the other rebels though overwhelming in number were so scared and mystified by thecsudden fire from unseen rec resources, and so many of their m number killed, out of the very woods as it seemed to them that they wheeled their horses and galloped away as fast as possible.he hidden christian force then rushed out of their place of concealment and ro rode so hard down upon the rebels that they could not escape and after another encounter the survivors were forced to surrender.

After this encounter unther did not dare to go no nearer to the re bel lines than before.But the most wonderful part yet a is o to come.This party that was captured was only the van guard of the main andelinian cavarly t hat was advancing.hey had heard the heavy firing of the engagement , and fearing a disaster came on in all their force--but I declare if Edwin unther did not save his force through t he utmost difficulties and retain his prisoners as well.Gunther and his party were persued and followe, and trailed for nearly a hundred miles, driven from one shelter to another, attacked from everywhere a every day and night, but they never could capture him or his men and regain their lost comrades.''

''It's a shame the way the andelinians kill children''at last exclaimed one of the boy scouts.''My father said the child slaves have always been imposed upon and abused as long as they had been slaves.He said we ought to massacre all the andelinian soldiers we can find and not give them any quarter at untill unti untill t hey stop t heir massacresof children.''

''That's so too''said another of the boys nodding his head emphatically.''My general himself said t hat.''

''Every body does''said the Rattlesnake boy in in mild wrathe.''And why should nent they.Y Yet it is said it was fair to do that.What are you going t o do when the andelinians sneak upon the children and murder them behind their backs eh.Open your book and give the m a spelling or reading lesson?Guess not.They should never recieve quarter untill the war is over at leaste.''

All of which would have been very impressive and very convincing to the young hearers, did not Jennie urmer herself at this moment coming stepping gaily across the hall and shouting at the boys as she saw them;

''ome on Penrod.and you boys.They are making candy in the kitchen.Come on.''

And down they ran like a avalanch--all but Penrod who preferred to go through the house in search of adventures.He opened a door to see a large ring of the prettily dressed ivian girls and others a with boys hand in hand singing ing; and playing ing around the rosy.Being so bashful in the presence of the ivian girls, he yet longed to be with them, but nevertheless his fear and awesomeness made him beat a hasty retreat before they saw him.

he was thankful to the young officer for saving him from running into disgrace.

However there were signs of great commotions coming from general Evans room on the other side of one of the main and grand halls, but Penrod hearing Walyer starrings voice, turned aside, and went slowly down the stairs up, feel ing rather bored for a minute, since there were no one as it appeared to listen any more to his grand stories.Soon he worked his way into the main kitchen, laughing at with the rest at the expressive masteropiece that Jennie Vivian had made from the taffy candy, but secretly resolving never to go into company again untill he could have the nerve and bravery to have the Vivian Girls all to himself for once.The presence of the Vivian Girls as he felt this-day did not seem to him as scary as they did the first day he had seen them, and for the first timein his life good as he tried to be(youbage)) he almost envied the other boys and scouts who were with the Vivian Girls almost the whole live long day, abd and being dressed in uniforms that may have been given So them by millionaire fathers or officers..Talking of Penrods almost envy, perhaps this was surely a time a fitting time(I did not tell you to take a fit) to explain the commotion that Penrod heard in generalvJack Evans council room. A moment or a little sooner before and in the midst of a certain lively planning a middle sized boy scout, whose name was Tony Andon had strayed slowly and cautiously from the candy pulling(maybe he did not likework) and appeared at the threshhold at tof this apartment, where Jennie turner, her sister, Angeline Lichee, Mildren Mildred Maxwell, and three or four boys were assembled.

''All right''shouted one of the boys excitedly, as Tony entered''Come along Tony Andon, you can play in the game too.Wow Jennie Turner, look out for yourself .We are going to have a great game.''

At first Tony refused, saying he did not wish to play, but would rather roam around the building and see what it is like.

''Oh please do Tony, and be quick to join''cried Jennie Turner. ''We have made the game up all to our selves, and the boy is going to lead us to us.''

''That's right''said Mildred Maxwell, with approving looks.''If you refuse it will be an awful game and we'll be hurt.We all might get killed.''

''Then very naturally Tony decided to join in .

''Now every one of you.''cried the boy who was to lead the game and whose name was Randy Caldwell''every one of you take your places all over. Every one of you girls are to be the Angelinians, and the boys will be the Glandelinians.And I alone will be one of those they call a Scoodler.There will be a battle and the Glandelinians will charge us.''

So saying the girls took up their line, and the boys also, and each with broom sticks struck the attitude children usually do before playing battle.

''Now when we fight, you must pretend your you are firing at each other and at the same time, go go a howling and yelling and screeching like all them do in the battle, and I&ll be a reinforcement for the rebels, and pounce upon you Angelinians from behind.When I attack you must all pretend to q fall back, and as you do so you must roar awful.''

''Hah.Where's the game in that.''cried Angeline Turner, scornfully.

''Why let's see'' said the boy rather puzzled at first.''Oh yes, the one side that wins get's the best prize.''

''All right.''exclaimed Tony Andon.''That's first rate.Let's begin. And the game began.Such roaring, and growling, and yelling, and shouting were probably never heard in any human habitation before.The boy playing as the Scoodler made a captial reinforcement, while thevothers pretended to shoot right and left, or use boye et, untill the played conflict seemed to reach its height with both sides having the same advantage.Then the Scoodler went in.But those intended to be the Angelinians did not fall back.Still they fought on now beginning to drive back the boys.

Bang went the boys gun the broom and pressed in great style against his shoulder.

But si still the Angelinians did not fall back.

The scoodler boy took more careful aim at their rear and again hecfired.

Bang.

Still the Angelinian girls pressed backthe boys gaining the advantage completely.

''Bang, bang''he cried.Don't you hear me say bang you girls girls .Why don't you fall back.''

''H you have not struck our rear yet, it is protested''retorted Jennie Turner -taking wonderful leaps.Look out. Pretty soon I'll jump on your Gla elinians Glandelinians and smash them to bits.''

''No you won't either''cried the pretended scoolder growing very red and again taking fresh aim.

Bang.Bang.

Unlucky shots. Jennie Turner and her sister were on him in a minute.....

ans and the others!''

During the whole time that general Hanson Vivian or his Brother, and Concentinian Aromu or Aronburg had been headening the

''Wow sirs.''Growled J Turner, pretending to crush him as a rebel force- ''hat's the next part this game.Or who is beaten.''

''I saw.you win.''gasped the boy boy.Get off me.you are too heavy.I'm crushed I surrender.''

This was too much for the others, either rebels or Angelinians, and they began to make it a laugh.Jennie Turner then laughed as heartily as any of the others, and so did half a dozen boy and girl scouts, who had by this time assembled in the open door way.

''Stop laughing all of you''shoute t t shouted the Scoolder still struggling under Jennie Turner,''and all of you who have been fighting stop thisminute. Don't you see I'm down and the battle is supposed to be over.So that is the End of the game.Let's play something else, and------where did you get that?''he added as soon as he was a free man, because a boy scout he knew suddenly appeared eathing a piece of fu Taffy candy.

''I got it down stairs.We all have been making loads of it. did you not know it''was the muffled rply.

''own stairs.Come every one.We'll get some too.''cried the Coodlser. And a hint indeed was enough.And it may have been hardly necessary to say that in a twinkling, the Angelinian boys, and girls stopped the game, and all had sued for piece by joining the crowd in the kitchen and feasting upon the carmels of taffy, and other various candies.

''What ever shall we girls do, Evans dear''said the distressed Violet Vivian Girls''to stop the eating of the candy.They'll all soon be sick Evans, every one of them, if they keep on, and thus spoil the Carnaval.''

''Tell them all to wash their hands ans faces and come to the great parlor.We are going to have a great picture gallery game now''he answered.

''aco accordingly, some of the girl scouts were sent through the house to bring the whole cokpany toget her.Meantime general Hanson Vivian himself had arived to join in, being in his best uniform, and therefore had cleared the whole scene for action.All were in the immense parlor and were soon perfectly seated.That is all excepting Evans n and twenty or more, who h hardly could be missed fromsuch a big rom room full.General Hanson Vivian himself had did his best to arrange the chairs in several long straight rows, facing a great opening where there mos must have been an immense old fashioned sliding surtain or door, that seperated the biggest parlor in the world, from an equally as large sitting room, and on these were seaed, subduded and expectant boyscout and girl scoutsincluding what appeared to be the Vivian Girls bt some others pretending to be them, wh all gazing at the closed doors, while the youngest of the guests sat on the floor in front of the chairs, half frightened, half delighted at t the prospect of seeing something unusual.

By this time the snowstorm outside had reachedcits worse, and a flood of falling snow hid the nearest objects so that no one could see anything out outside thw windows.Whispered comments upon the change in the storm arose coupled with remarks that there would be good work the next day, then came other remarks, and light laughter, which occasional clapping of hands when suddenly Jack E a Evans appeared at the side entrance which led into the hall;

''Young Ladies and gent lemen.You are now to see as we calls it a real live Picture Gallery, and we ask for your favor or criticism upon these paintings and photographs, begging you to be merciful in your remarks, and not to bee too funny while you try to make the picture laugh, for I u must tell you as well as you must all know, that if any of our pictures in the gallety is even guilty of the slightest grin, or smile, it must instantly pop out of sight, leaving an empty frame.When all the frames are thus deserted, we shall expect some of you to be willing to fill them again and take your turn at this game. In fact each picture in the present exhibition is to select his or her substitute for the next time.''

At this some of the boys and girls for a moment or so looked slightly troubled, but s then some of the girls tittered, then all clapped in heart applause of general Evans little speech.Then came the tinkling of a little bell to make the announcement that all was ready, Hanson Vivian and another general pushed back the great sliding doors, and there in the great square doorway was the most immense picture gallery ever witnessed by human eyes in any such game.To make a strictly correct description the writer that is mineself should call this gallery a black and gray wall, apparently or really hung from top to bottom, with fine and excellent portraits in broad or oblong guilt frames, and all lookingwonderfully like like, and yet unatural, for when a live portrait must not laugh, how can it feel at ease?At first all the spectators were too surprised and astonished to speak or move.Then came a murmur of great admiration, with cries of ''good, good'' from the boys, and''Oh how lovely''from the girls, while Gertrude Angeline who was standing by the parlor door, calpped her dainty hands in silent rapture at the beautiful game show.....

he was thankful to the young officer for saving him from running into disgrace.

It was indeed a very beautiful se scene, and well noted to have been invented by an a man or woman of rich means.All the portraits were as fresh and glowing as though they had been ''Painted yesterday''The drawing was perfect, the coloring mostve xquisite, and so well indeed were the beautiful pictures lighted, and so cunningly provided with the backgrounds better suited for their colors and designs, that they seemed real paintings and not human ones at all.violet and her sisters, disguised as angels with feathery wings, with bared necks and arms and their golden hair combed thei its best looked too pretty for many and many were heard to sigh.Jennie urmer was in a red cloak and purple hood, and made a charming Angelinian gypsy , her sister with her brown eyes, and rosy cheeks, was a remarkably handsome and beautiful pr portrait of herself, and a sallow black haired general in a uniform cloak and slouched hait a hat of a rebel officer, with a sabre in his scabbard, scowled as if he were a brigand Glandelinian officer.he other poc pictures though content to be simply faces trying their level best not to even look serious were really bright and most effective, and a credict to any great artists.

''Well''exclaimed general Jack Evans in a moment''hat have the critics to say about this now.''What do you think of the beautiful Gypsy gypsy for instance. who will buy it.It only cost seventy five pazaza's.e.

''I won't shouted Fenrod.''It's more like a chromo to me than a portrait.''

The one posing as a beautiful gypsy twitched very slightly, and all the other pictures put on increased so, solemnity of expression, even pretending to look mad, for they felt that their time too was coming.''

''no you throw in the frame, or throw it out!''asked the Rattlesnake boyhimself.

''It appears that the right eye of the gypsy is a little too far on one side of her head.''said Mildred Maxwell, who was an expert at drawing faces and plans like Fenrod could.

This made the picture laugh, and presto, the frame was empty.After this though all the remarks made were not so brilliant or so irrestibly funny, the great poc picture gallery soon suffered a severe loss.o small a thing will indee indeed make any one laugh when we all try to look our gravest.The brigand general fairly exploded at a cutting remark or allusion to his sword as it being too long to even reach the stars, and the sister of Jennie urmer yeilded to a screaming laughter to a profound remark concerning to her uniform, other faces grinned,the instance they were specially alluded to, and finally the protraits of the ivian irls were the only ones left in their frw frames.Their bright and beautiful little countenances stared into the room so defiantly, that even Evans, general Hanson, mperor ivian, many other generals, tried with the rest to conquer them.In vain all the worse or funniest criticisms, the portraits appeared to have gone deaf.In vain they tried to be as funny as they could, to say things as beautiful as they could, the pictures were completely obdurate.In vain they all shouted at it, laughed at them, called them funny names.Not a smile from any of them.yuo violet and her sisters were little girls of greatprincipal, and they felt bound in honor to do their duty.hen all of the boys called the picture names.Fenrod even made a claim that they were his sisters whom he said chased him into a sewer gutter, and fell in ther e with him themselves.Others called them, the name of every monkey in the world, gril trmaps, kittens, cats, ells, centepedes, and hop toads and every name known in their language.verybody tried their hardest to think of something too funny for them to resist.hen Fenrod again said;

''o tha they are not animals at all.Let's see.What do angels really look like anyway.Ah one of them has her wings on upsidedown.Look at the other.Her hair is not combed at all but standing up like wire.nd look at the third.Her eyes are not in ri h right.They are where her ears should be.nd look at the fourth.hat's she wearing on her arm.A wrist breselet or a wringworm.nd look at the fir fifth portrait.The robe is too white to be really cotton.It must be White wash.And look at the sixth.Why she is the funniest of all.he is wearing her head upside down on her neck.nd look at the seventh.Ah it is the funniest target of all.Don't you see she has only one eye and four ears and eight mouths. and her dress s is too black to be yellow.''

Not one smile.

''Bring a pot of tar and some feathers.''er ied the Rattlesnake boy''.he pictures are so dull we'll shine it up a little them up a little, and put on feathers. Then they'll look like black roosters and hens.''

Suddenly another howl was heard, to every bodys surprise, for one of the boy scouts who seemed to have begn evidently forgotten shouted out;

''Here, here take them down. hat's the matterwith the vivian irls.hey are not angels, they are only goils.''

Somehow or other this boy unconsciously won the victory, when every one else had tried and failed.The vivian irls then laughed with the rest, and almost instantly disappeared, as though they had been blown out like a lamp light. They were soon in the parlor casting however saucy but laughable glances at the rest of the company, meanwhile with a merry shake of their heads as if you would say''You thought you could make us laugh, did you not!No indeed you could not.''

ame and the others?''

During the whole time that general Hanson ivian orhis Brother, and concentinian Aronu or Aronburg had been besieging the

Now while Hanson ivian was closing the main folding door,s if there were any, a new set of pictures more like the first but of different persons were being made then the children could hear the bells t inkle agin, and the great game went on as before.If you don't believe it ask them.here hung twenty six frames in the same place upon the gray wall, but the portraits we re brand new and very effective, though they were more hard to conquier or make to laugh than the others were.ut as usual they were soon vacated and we re filled with another portrait in full view of the company.hen however the emp tied frame happened to be on the lower part of the gray wall, the new poc picture h only had to kneel upon a capr carpet upon the floor or even to kneel beh nd the frame, but if any of them happened to be much higher up, he or she was obliged to climb upon either a ladder, chair of table or anything of convience, or whichever might be necessart to enable to the picture to appear at the propper place.or you must know my dear readers if possible that this gray wall, was made of a very large canvass cloth painted of a dark gray color, but without any fullness, and was stretched tightly across the open doorway and behind the sliding doors.and with large squares and oblong pieces or squares cut out of it here and there.

Each open space thus left was bordered with a strip of gilt paper thus forming any kind of an empty picture frame.violet and her sisters who indeed were t he ones who had made the whole thing themselves the day before, were therefore very happy at the success of their own slef made picture gallery, and esepecially the fun it created.

They had also pr ovided the highest pictures with small dark curtains fastened above t he backs of the frames, and hanging loosely enough to be drawnbhind the living persons or pictures, s so as to re form the required colored backgrounds.

Also a draped cloth or cloth gorse answeredthe same purpose for the lower pictures.ll of this explanatio n and more was given by violet and her sisters at the very carnaval to many of the eager listeners, who themselves wished to get up exactly, such a picture gallery at their own headquarters and elsewhere some other time when they wishe to make up some show ofvtheir own kind.gut while they were talking about it someone at the organ struck up a Abbissannian march and almost before they knew it the guests found themselves marching to the musmusic three or four by four in a procession across the great long corridor or hall, now lighted by a almost countless number of candles.

violet and her sisters was in front of the merry line, even themselves wondering what was about to happe n when to their great surprise.h that sly General jack Evans, and Hanson ivian) the double doors leading to the main dining room we re slowly flung u open, and there , sparkling in the light of a hundred and fifty wax candles, was a collation fit for the richest king in the world.I will never be able to descrie describe it, for fear that to describe and name all of the good things might take up too many sheets of paper.Imagine however what you will, and there can be believed there was just something in the same fashion, even quite as good, upon that long delightful tables, o so beautiful with their airy, fairy structures of candied fruit, frostings and many different sea kinds of flowers, their jaggedcrocks of ice where many chickens and turtles, made of ice s cream were resting on every peak and crag creamy,their gold tinted jellies, and their snowy temples.oon all these yal yeilded to the ruthless hungry boys, who crowned around with the greatest eagerness to serve every one of the girls with plateful of the deliscacies, quite ignoring the rolling eyes of the soldiers who had been sent up from the ranks with the feast, and who had fully expected to do the honors of waiting upon them, themselves.Meanwhile general Hanson ivian in his fullpurple uniform was looking after the younger guests, resolved that all of the little''dears'' should not disgrace their motherly care by eating too much or by taking the wrong things.

''It is not possible of course that everything on this table can harm any of the children''he said softly to violet, as she gave a bit of sponge cake and a large saucer of blanc-mange to one of the childre children''I and your sisters and yourself are looking out for that, but their dear little stomaches are too tender you n know and we cannot be too careful.There's the reason as you know why were are so careful and so particular to.sere serve out sad an sandwitche and other things ear,oearlier in the day.gut I m worry about that taft taffy candy.I cannot help worrying about that.''

Yet violet and even her mades failed to make any reply to that beyond a pleasant nod, for in truth they felt too busy at that moment for conv conversation to have any charms for them just then.They were even too happy with their own thoughts to notice even a tifle.Besides Gertrude Angeline at that moment an momen t came to lay a fresh supply on the table, and that gave Hanson an opportunity to ask her if she had ever seen any children have a more delightful time.

And she bravely and truthfully admitted that she did.

he was thankful to the young officer for saving him from running into disgrace.

At this very moment, Jennie Turner, was quite unconscious of the great feast going on up stairs, and therefore was having her own private table in the general kitchen. Having grown g hungry for her unusual supper she had gone into the ,itchen and secured something for herself to eat. Imagine herosurri surps surprse if you will, w on taking her first mouthful, she saw Angelinia Aronburg rush into the room, with a large platter of white grapes.

"My goodness Jennie Turner," exclaimed the surprised Gertrue Angeline in a loud excited tone("Im almost ashamed of you. What you stuffing yourself with the common ar y supper for when there's a big party upstairs! splendid things to eat , and all made of sugar and other sweets, just what you would like. Come on now and eat there and not here."

Again the march struck up, he feasting was over, he boys And girls and the others led by Violet and her sisters, who seemed the happiest children of f them all, went back to the parlor, which meanwhile had been rearranged, and there producing a great plump a great plump tissue paper bag he hung it up to a gr eat great ch andelier that was suspended from the middle of the parlor ceiling. I should like to tell my dear readers a great deal about this chandelier, how it was covered with hundreds of long three sideded colored glass danglers, that swung glittered, and flashed in a splendid way, now that all its wax candles were lighted, but that probably would interrupt all theconcern about the big paper bag. This bag was full of something they were sure. General Jack Evans blind folded Gertrude Angeline with a handkerchief, and putting a wooden rod into her hand told her to turn around three times and then to try her best to strike the bag with the stick with all her might.

"S Stand back everybody" cried Penrod, as she made the last turn if that was what she was diddinge "Now hit hard Gertrude. Hard enough to break it. And don't make a mistake and hit any of us."

Gertrude Angeline did hit hard. But she hit the air u just where the bag did not hang(formurder) and then all the rest laughed and shouted, and then begged to be blind folded, for they were sure they could do it. Jack Evans gave each a chance in turn but each failed just as n absurdely as Ger r Gertrude Angeline did.

Finally by exn or acclamantion he bandage was put over Jennie vivians dancing eyes, though she wasxsure she could never---never--never could-- and lo after revoli revolving like a lovely c angel, the litle blindfolded damsel, with a spring and with one vigorous stroke tore the bag open from one side to the other.

Down fell all the contents upon the floor, all kindsof pink mottoes, white mottos blue ones and mottoes of gold and silver paper, al and all colors except black, all fringed and scalloped and tied with beautifully colored ribbons, and every one of them plump wih sugar almonds and other kinds of good candy. Now the guests rushed and scrambled for them---how all the boys rolled over each other in their delight --and how the young folks t ore open the pretty papers, put the candy into their pockets and slyly handed or sent the printed mottoes to each other. Penrod in his own exoptement handed a cop couplet to one of the pretty ivian girls and then seeing her pout as she looked at it, ran over to her again with a quick "let me see it please" what does it say?" she heldcout the little bit of paper without letting it go, and Penrod seizing it at the other end read quickly and in laughing dismay;

"You are one of the funniest little boys that the world ever knew.
and that's the reason all the kittens said MeO-O-O-w."

He recovered himself instantly however, and wagging his handsome head at her, exclaimed emphatically;

"Good girl you are I meant, don't you see. I meant good girl. It's the wrong motto. It's splesposterous to think I meant it to say this, because you are not a boy, don't you see mottoes are always fol foolish anyway. Come over into the hall and see the gold fishes swimming in the "quarium" and off they ran together as happy as two beautiful birds.

Tyen came a grand dance. Two thirds of the young company, including Violet and her sisters, were gra great singers and all also graceful dancers and all just put the scene as great as mad magnificence would allow, and Jack Evans knowing how good the ivian girls could either dance or sing, had s r surprised them by secretly engaging the best band of the regiment, and their well marked time and spirited playing put added life even into the younger children that flitted through the rooms. Gertrude Angeline looked on in rapt delight. One or two more dances brought this amuzement to an end and then after a few moan moments of rest came a startling and mysterious order for prepare for the lastgame of the Carnavale pane and the others!"

During the whole time that general Hanson ivian orvhis Brother, and Concentinian Aronu or Aronburg had been hostaging the

It was called the "Pra Present game".

"hat in the world is that kind of a game!" asked one of the boy scouts, of iolet and her sisters, and the hostesses candidly admitted that they did not have the slightest idea, what k nd of n game it was, for they had never in their lives heardof it beforeuntill now when it was mentioned.

"all then how can it be possible for us all to play it." insisted the litt le spokespeople.....

"I do not know" answered Jennie vivian, looking in a puzzled way at the door. All of a sudden cried a voice as loud loudly as possible;

"All join hands and form a large circle."

every one at once arose, and soon the biggest circle of children stood expectant.

"Your great, great angel guardian is coming right now to see you, and see if you are good children." exclaimed the voice. "He is slightly rall, but you must not mind that."

"Oh, non, one" oi cried the laughing circle "not in the least."

"he brings one of the big fat soldiers with her or him." said the invisible voice of the speaker. "and don't let fatty know your names at all of even guess them, or he willobe liable to get you into a lot of trouble and so on."

"No, no, no" cried the circle as wildly as savages.

A slight stirring was then heard in the hall, the doors opened, and in walked the tallest angels the children had ever seen, and her one fat companion. He was in all appearance a very tall angel with apparent wings on its back, but wearing for designs a ruffled white cap instead of a halo, and a long white robe. The fat soldier as he was supposed to be, wwhore a uniform of gray instead of purple. Yet the rest of his body appeared to be dressed in a dark gray i pillow case, with large arm holes cut in it. It was gathered at its belt or his belt , gathered also by a large purple ribben tried around his throat, the corners of the pillow case being tied with narrow ribboned things to form his make belief a ears, and there was a large white bandage over his eyes, and a round opening for his peculiar mouth. The angel guardian dragged in a large sack, and the fat soldier bore a long yellow or golden stick wit h tinkling bells at the end.

"Let me into t he ring dears." "said the angel guardian.

"Let me into the ring dear s" "growled the soldier."

the circle obeyed.

"Now my dears." said the angel guardian "I b have brought you all a bagful of all i n kinds of good things, lovely things that you will all want, but you must know that only those who can thinkb my soldier here can retain the presents.

All I can do is to let you each take out a g gift when your turn comes, but wa when you send me a "thank you" answer don't let my soldier friend know who it is, for if he guesses your name by the sound of your voice, you must put the gift back without opening the paper. But if he chances to guess the grong name, then you may keep the gift. So now beging children one at a time. Keep the large circle moving untill my soldier companionknockes jknocks four times."

Around went the circle, eager with fun and also with expectation. uddenly the blind folded fat soldier, pounded four times wit h his stick, and then pointed it straight in front of him, jingling the little bells. Penrod was was the happy youth pointed at .

"Help yourself my dear boy" said the apparent guardian angel, as he held the sack tward him. He suddenly but carefully plunged his arm into the opening, and brought out a neat paper pach package.

"Hey what did you say y dear" said the guardian angel. "Take hold of the stick."

Penrod si seized the end of the stick, and said in a hearse disguised tone "take you my guardian angel".

"That is Walter Starring." growled the fat soldier. "Put it back again, put it back."

But it was not walte r Starring, and so Penrod was allowed to keep the parcel.

Again the circle moved around again. Again the fat soldier knocked four times n and this time pointed the stick to violet ivian, one of the ivian girls. she tried to be polite, and direct the hand of one of her sisters into it, but the apparent guardian angel would not hear of it.

"Help yourself little Princess of Ab' Abbiennia" he said, and therefore violet did. The paper parcel which she drew from the sack was so tempting and pretty, all tied with beautifully colored ribbons that she really tried very hard to disguise her "thankyou my dear guardian angel" but the blind foldad soldier recognizes her voice being too sharp for her.

"o, no" he growled "that's violet ivian. Put it back, Princess, put it back."

And she with aplayful air of protest, dropped the pretty parcel into the bag again.

he was thankful to the young officer for saving him from running into disgrace.

g this merry game went on for a long time(get your dime), some escaped detection, and saved their handsome gifts, some were detected and lost them, but the guardian angel would not suffer those who had parcels to try again, and therefore in the course of the game, those who failed at first, succeeded after a whi e while.When all had parcels, and the bag was nearly epl empty, what did the ng angel guardian do but straighten up, throw of the disguise,---and if it was not general Hanson vivian himself, very red in the face, and very glad indeed to be out of his prison.Instantly one and all discovered that they had known all along it was he.
''Ha,ha,''tn they laughed''qn and now''---starting ih persuit''Let's see who the fat old soldier is.''
They caught him before he reached the door, and were very astonished, when they discovered it was emperor vivian himself.
''This then was a royal game''declared all.''It was grand.''
''As good as Christmas without war.''said one of the vivian girls.When they all opened their parcels, and there was great rejoicing indeed.Emperor vivi n as violet and her sisters declared, was not a king to do things by halves and he certainly had distinguished himself in this ''Present game'' Every gift though raided from the enemys camp was wor worty werth having for children.There were lovely bon,bon boxes, pretty trinkets of expensive price, penknives,, lead penciles of all colors, military presents for the boy and girl scouts, paint boxes, crayons, and all different kinds of other neice things.
''hat delighted''Oh,Oh's, and merry''ha, Ha's'' rang through thatbig parlor.
All who had the best had great fun displaying their things, but no one wished or tried to trade.After a great deal of laughter and merry making, the band played ''Home sweet home'' Soon sleigh bells were jingling outside, and one of the drivers was stamping his feet t o knock the snow off his boots, and stating that it was a fierce blizzard storm outside.Some other soldiers were there do, driving other sleighs filled with st raw and hay, and oh what a bundling up there was.What scrambling for fer tippets, shawls, hoods,, cloaks and overcoats and so on, what laughter and frolic, what good byes, and goodbyes, what honest thank you's to the general and violet and her sisters, and what shouting and singing, and hurrahing, as the noisy sleighs glided away through the deep snow, and above all, what an ''Oh you dear, dear Uncle Hanson, from violet and her sisters, as they standing by t he Emperor Generals side heard the last sleigh bell jingle from the door.

ans and the others!''

During the whole time that general Hanson vivian or his Brother, and Constantinian Arcou or Aronburg had been besieging the city of vivian lckoy and lending ahelping hand to general Hanson himself violet and her sisters had indeed a long series of experiences since December to March which will take nearly half a volume to write about and which I will unk undertake to do.It was on the afternnon of the day of pe cember twenty seventh if you please to mention that one of the vivian girls propo sed to her sisters to all dress as beggar girls nd go scouting on the enemys what they encountered prevented their purpose that day. That same very afterp afternoon violet and her sistr sisters had an oportunity without the slightest doubts of proving to any one who knew them or not whether they were really as good in ther features as in their very souls and character. hey had went out despite the cold weather and blizzard storm to spy i onthe enemy in their ragged condition and never had the cnalue of approaching the rebel lines as the actions of the sentries, the suspicious looking guns of rebel batteries, and the wild fury of thestorm itxw itself prevented them from getting within half a hundred f eet of the Glandolinian encampments.It was a most dreadful afternoon indeed and one of the most dreadful afternoons theyhad ever had been out intheir lives or everagain will be.For several days before it had snowed continously with a high hirr hurricane like wind; no it did not snow, it was simply a cloudbtu burst of the white precipitation, the wooded country was chilly and cold, the wind blew fiercely in fdreadful gusts, there was high snow drifts everywhere, and over everything the snow made a fog shroud of its own which at times hid objec ts for nearly twenty feet away if you could believe it, literally snowing at four to five feet a day.....

Of course as it happened to be it waw was a long and tiresome distance back to the christian lines------it seemed to violet and her sisters that the distance had to be very long on days like thesess these, and violet and her sister s had went from one point to another again and again and still again unable to find heir way back to the lines on account of being snowbound and their shabby clothing which they had put on for a disguise was so covered with snow that they looked like the snow themselves.The absurd old fathers on their old forlorn hats which they wore and which was muchtoo large for them were more be draggled and snow covered than ever and more absurd than ever, and their down trodden snows sn shoes were so covered with snow and so wet inside that they could not hold any more snow or water either.Added to thi s on account of being o lost in the storm and not being able to find their way to the christian lines violet and her sisters had been deprived of their dinner and supper, and indeed they felt ve very hungry. so cold andhungry they were that their faces had pit pinched looks, and they were tired out every one and then some Glandolinian scouting parties passed them but no one of them glanced at the children with any sympathy and not only that but had tried to capture them but found they couldmake no headway against the fugitives in thre storm.
Being bound under n any condition to find their way to the christian lines violet and her sisters hurried one on trying to comfort themselves, by thinking of how God and His Blessed Mother had suffered for mankind but this time it was really harder than they had ever found it, and once or twice they felt it almost made them feel much more misra miserable, colder and more hungry instead of less so.
But being brave and obsintate they perserved obstinately.

''uppose we go to some place in some town which we may arive to and raid a place for dry clothes. ''Suggested Violet blowing into her cold hands.

''To secure some good shoes, a long thick cla coat and stockins stockings and something to eat also.''Said violet'' and then we can findd our way to some beckery that may be supplying the rebels secure hot buns and other things to eat and make off. We can eat them all without stopping in the our efforts to find the christian lines.''

''but how can we find a town when we cannot see a thing ahead of us?'' Asked Jennie. ''See how it is snowing.''To my op inion you can hardly see for twenty feer feet away.''''

''Let's Trust in god for that...''''Was Joice's answer.

However some very unusually oddthings happen in any place in this world or the unreal world sometimes. It certainly was an of odd thing which happened to violet and her sisters.violet and her sisters were crossing a small but not steep ravine in the wooded country just as they were speaking among themselves-----
------the depth of the snow being dreadful---they almost having had towade. to wade.violet and her sisters picked their way as carefully as they could so they would not encounter any pitfalls in the way, but nevertheless they could not save themselves very much, only in picking their s way they had to either look forward or mostly down at their feet and the ''Beautiful beautiful snow''When you donAt want it,
- and in looking down, they had just reached the other side of the ravine--- violet happened to see an opening in the forest and not far off a long line of tents of blue color shining if showing themselves dimly through the snow murk.

As they progressed onward they saw the encampmentwas flanked by a small snowbound village. 'a As they approached the village Violet took out of the left pocket of her ragged dress a small piece of silver a tiny piece f you want to know handled by many a person but still having enough spiri spirit in it to shine like new.. .. It was a Abbiennian dime.It one second it was in her cold,little red and bluehand ab and then back in its pocket again'....

''Oh''gasped Jennie we are coming to a town. And it is or was belonging to a rebel. It is true. We will be able to obtain something now.''''''

And then dear readers if you will believe me she and her sisters looked straight before them endeavoring to find a clothing shop and soon found one directly faci ng them. And not far away was a large bakery, and a cheerful stout, but glandelinian civilian with rosy cheeks was just taking from one of the windows a tray of many delicious hot buns, large plump shiny buns, with many currant in them. For a few moments it almost made Violet and her sisters feel faint for the shock and the sight of the buns themselves and the delightful odors of warm bread and other cakes floating floating up through the baskorys cellar window was almost too much for them then. Violet knew that she never needed to hesistate to use the little piece of money. But it was evi evidently an Abbiannian dime, and she felt that it would make them suspe suspicious if she was to pass on them an Abbiannian dime but nevertheless she determined to take the chance and if they refused to give anything she and her sisters would therefore seize it.

''If that man won't sell us the bread and buns for the dime.''Said Violet we will compell them to supply us with something to eat. It is fair in war you know and the glandelinians make war on usthey do.''

So she and her sisters crossed the small encampment without being stopped or questioned and had put h Violet had put her wet snowcovered foot on the step of the backery shop when as she did so she and her sisters saw something which made them stop. It was a strange little figure much more forlorn than their own--a little figure which was not much more than a bundle of small rags from which small bare red and muddy feet peeped out--only because her rags with which the wearer was trying to cover them were not long enough. Above rags was a shock head of tangled hair, and a most dirty little face, with big hollow-and hungry eyes. She greatly reminded Violet and her sisters of the ''Little Match girl''she and they had read of.Indeed Violet and her sisters knew the childand big hollow hungry eyes the moment they saw them, and they felt a sudden strong sympathy.

''This little gir; girl''They thought to themselves with a sigh''Must have been one of the runaway child slaves risking anything, even death, from starvation and cold rather than be captured again--and she is much more hungry than we are.''

The child--------who indeed was an ex escaped child slave--starred up at Violet and her sisters, and then with a moan shuffled herself aside a little, so as to give them more room. Indeed she was used to being made to give room to everyone she saw. nd she knew that if a glandelinian soldier saw her, he would make it worse for her than it was now. Violet sti clutched her dime and hesi tated a few seconds while her sisters looked on pityingly. hen Violet spoke to her.

''My little friend you aren child slave I can see that. U you must be hungry.'' he poor child shuffled herself and her rags a little more and looked startled and miserable.

''Have you failed to get anythin anything to eat sin ce you ran away?'' Asked violet.

''I have not eaten any dinner, breakfast, or supper or anything.''Was the timid answer.

''since when?''Asked Violet.

''I don't know.I have asked and asked and no one will give me anything. I'm afraid to ask even.''

Just to look at her made Violet and her sisters feel more hungry and faint and they talked to themselves as though they were sick at heart.

''If I and my sisters are tryin to make out oursel ves heroines''Said violet to herself))''If we are the vivian girls, when we are not poor in realty and t yet driven from our homes because of the insurrection--we could and should always share with poorer ones and especially with the fugitive child slaves if even we met one that was more poor and hungrier than ourselves. And we are not really hard up.We are only in prevation because the storm keeps us fromfinding our way ba ck to the christian lines. This little girl is out of luck altogether and cannot get anywhere and is star ving sure. We must share something with her. I believe the buns are a penny each. If this ddime had only been a glandelinian dime. We could have bought the buns. B t I'm afraid the man won't sell u to us. It seemd nothinf enough for either os us but to force the man to give up something------but it will be better than nothing.. ..''

''Then as her sisters went in she said to the beggar child;

''Wait a minute.''

hen she follwed her sisters into the shop. It being warm and smelling delightfully Violet got the child to come in. he fat man was just going to put more hot buns in the window when the eight ragged looking children entered.....

''If you please''Said violet''We are lost in the storm and have found an Abbiannian dime. Would you mind selling to us twenty hot buns.?? ?''

And she held the forlorn little piece of money out to the fat man. he man looked at it and at her and her sisters and the little beggar girl, at their intense little faces, and dragged clothesxand i mediately rec gnized violet and her sisters as the famlious vivian girls.

''No indeed I could not use National money.''he answered.''did you say you found it.''?

''I din didn't say I found it.''Said violet.''I only asked if you could use it.''

''Keep it then''''Said the man.''It can stay with you a week and goon hgoodness knowns how much longer but we rebels cannot use it.''

''I thouh thought so.''''''Said violet.''But I thought I would ask you. But anyway she added suddenly drawing a small gun. you arethen going to give us some thing to eat for nothing since you refuse to sell. If you refuse we will let you know pretty quick who we are..''''

''Not way many would suspo ct you were the vivian girls but I did the moment i looked at you.''Answered the man looking puzzled and interested, and good natured and not at all afraid of the gun.''And put up your gun little girl . I did not say I refused to give. If you wish to have something you may have allyou want providing you wont say anything about it to any one else.''

''Well then''Said violet putting up her gun''''''Give us twenty four buns, and some rollx is rolls if you please,and for nothing too..''

The old fat man went to the window promptly and put a large number of rolls, and buns in alarge paper bag,violet and her sisters noticed that the man but six more than she had ordered.....

''I said only twenty four if you please..''''he explained.''I ordered no more.''

''I'll throw in the six to make weight..''''Said the fat man with his good natured look. I dare say you little girls can say eat them all sometime. I believe you are surely hungry after being so long away from the christian lines.....''

A mist rose before the eyes of Violet and her sisters.....

''Yes we are.''hey a answered. ''We are very hungry and have trabeled far.and we are much obligsd to you for yor your kindless. you aresonly a few among the glandelinian glandelinians who would really befriend little girls and children.''nd she was going to add''We have a real beggar childamong us who is more hungry than we are.'' but just at that moment two or three glandelinian officers came stridingin at once and each one seemed in a hurry to buy something and so not wishing to be recognized by the insurgents violet and her sisters could only thank the fat man again and go ouid.'

The little beggar child looked frightful in her wet and dirty clothes, and though She slowly followed violet and her sisters she was staring with a most stupid look of suffering and sorrow straight before her, and violet and her sisters sudde l suddenly saw her draw the back of her roughened and black hand across t her eyes to run rub away the tears which seemed to have surprised her by forcing their wau way under her lids.. She seemed to be muttering to herself. Violet opened the bag and took o t one of the hot buns which had already warmed her cold hands a little.

''See''he said to the beggar child putting the bun in her hands.''hat bun is nice and hot. Eat it while we are on o r way to the lines where we will take you and you will not be so hungr hungry..''''''

The child started and stared, up at violet then she took the bun and began to cram it into her mouth indeed with great wolfish bites.

''Ohmy God. Oh My God.''Violet and her sisters heard her say hoarsely but in wild delight. Oh My Gd god how good you have been to my me to day..'''

Violet took out three more buns and put them into the beggar girls hands.

''She s is hungrier than we are at least .''Violet said to her self.''he is starving. But her h and trembled when she gave her the fourth and fifth bun.

''We are not starving''She said to her sisters and she gave the child still another bun. Alittle later the lines had been found and the little starving child was still nsmatchingvand devouring when violet and her sisters turned the child over to the care of the soldiers and an army surgeon. he poor child was too ravenous to give any thanks to violet and her sisters even if she had been taught any politeness--which of course she had not. he only was like a poor little animal.

'Goodbye to you.''Said violet and her sisters.

When they started down the company street Violet alone looked back. The beggar child now in the custody of christian soldiers had some buns o in both hands, ad had stopped in the middle of a bite to watch the fair creatures who had befrin befriended her. Violet gave her a little nod--and the child after another short stare- a curious most longing stare--jerked her shaggy head in responnse, and untill violet and her sisters were out of sight she did not take even another bite or even finish the one she had begun and went quietly to where the soldiers led her..''''

During the time the big battle of Aurandscallio was raging if you please to mention one of the big Angolinian divisions of troops under general Brola wasvery late having been delayed considerably in the advance by deep snows and opposition of the Glandelinians calledthe Mungaboos.This division should have arived at the scene of action at noon day but it was nearly five o-clock or half past five in the afternoon and the gray evening was shading into the east the sun had set and it was growing dark when this division slowly came up to its own position of a long snow fort that was to have served as a breastwork. At the division filed into their places and formed for line of battle the Angolinian generals yelled out as they waved their sabres!!!!!!

The ''The glandelinians have captured Hugsons Sliding. they are coming here and we are going to let go as we will never get at them again.''

Atvence at the moment the whole line of infantry let go with artillery and musketry at the approaching wave of glandelinians violet and her sisters who had come in one of the wagon trains rose from the bottom of the wagon they had been in, and each got out through the rear door of the enclosed carriage violet carrying a small wicker suitcase in one hand and a long but narrow li ht light rifle in another while Jennie had a sabre tucked under her left arm. It seemed as if they were about to go out and take a share in the conflict. The driver or the wagon helped each little go girls off the wagon and then the other driveror driver started his wagon or team of horses with the crack of the whip, andthe wheels of the coach sunk deep in snow and mire groaned and revolved slowly away and the wagon train followed so as to be in the rear out of range of the rebel fire.

I suppose the reason the Angolinian column had been so late was because of all through the night a snow storm had been raging, the enemy had made attempts to stop their advance, and at the sam time there were hours when thesolid earth shook and trees trembled under their feet from the concussion of explosions, the noise of shells and the roar of many guns pounding the fortifications d ri during the recent battle on of Thumbe inin raging at the same time.

The generals and officers had been afreid that at any moment a force of rebels would spread around the angolinian columns andn disaster might happen to the christian division. so he the main general had been compelled to move the troops forward slowly and advance wigh with caution.....

After leaving the wagon of the wagon train violet and her sisters stood still to watch until the last of the wagons had disappeared then hearing the terrible noise of battle they turned to see where they was. One of the nearest of the christian positions which proved to be a long rifle pit was bare of any troops save for the slatis of trees which did not look very inviting for the enemy as it was no doubt an Angolinian machine gun nest. As violet and her sisters finally peeed peered through the soft gray light of the swiftly approaching night not a whole house of any sort was visible near the christian lines, nor was any other person in sight but the christian troops marching to the firing lines, but after looking around for a while and deeming it more prudent to keep as far as possible from the firing lines the fair children of Angolinia discovered a number of tey mares standing near a group of trees each horse being tied to a tree and stand ing moticnless with their heads hangingdown almost to the ground. Each one was a big horse and of the same color tall and strong looking with long legs and large k nees and hoofs and looked to them like race horses, though the best one had a fair resemblance of Black Beauty. they co the The horses were so stout that not even a rib could be seen yet their heads looked like the heads of racing steeds. Their tails were short and scraggly, and it a ppeared as if their harness had been bro broken in manyplaces and fastened together again with cords and even bits of wire, which evidently gave signs that these horses had been cavarly horses and seen many a desperate battle. Each of the horses seemed almost new for their hair were very shiny and the saddles were splendid and looked like those kings used to ride. Getting around in front of the horses so that they l could look at them more closely Violet and her sisters sawnear by a soldier clad in the Calverinian gray curled up on a log by a big camp fire in the rear of the lines fast asleep despite the uproar of the tremendous conflict.Violet poked the manwith her finger violently. Presently the soldier woke up, rose suddenly to a sitting osition and rubbed his eyes brisk t briskly and then getting startled suddenly drew his gun at leveled it at them. but seeing them he hastily put it away.

''Hello ''He said''I thought I was surprised by rebels.Are you violet and her sisters the Vivian girls!''''''

''Yes we are ''Answered violet looking gravely at his tousled hair under his bit round hat, and his blinking eyes.''Those horses have youthere. Or are you waiting to take us girls to general Hansons hea quarters!!''

''Of course I have little girls.''He answered.''Is the expected division of troops in now.''!

''Us girls could not be here if it was not in!''Answered Joice.''You see to be little sarcastic sir.''

He laughed heartily at that, and they saw his laugh was merry and frank and that they had no need to fear him. Jumping from the log he put the suitcase of one of the little girls under the saddle of the horse he was to ride and helpled them to mount the other horses.

''You l t little girls seem as cheerful as canary birds.''He said.

''Oh no we are not Canary birds. We came in general Eureka's division of troops.' I thought that was the best way to come without encountering too many insurgents.''''''

The Angolinian soldier in gray mode nodded.....

eureka's a very funny name for a general ain't it!''He remarked pleasantly.

''I supposed the general has that name because some one found him.''Explained Jennie seeing the nature of his joke and adding one of her own.''My uncle general Hanson once told me that Eureka is a laton word and means ''That a man finds some thing or ''I have found it ot this.''''''

''a AA All right Jennie hop on the horse.''

Jennie did so and he followed her getting on him. when off all but one started and the horse the man was on did not stir. the soldier picked up the reins shook them violently and said to the horse almost impatiently!

''gid-dap.''

To his surprise the horse did not stir. Jennie sh saw the horse wiggle one of his earg but that was all and she looked to see what the trouble was.

''id-dap. id-dap.''called the soldier again puting in his spurge spurs. Still the horse stood still and Jennie had to laugh.

''Perhaps my man''she said at-last''If you thought first of untying him from the tree he would go. He can't take the tree you know.''''

The soldier then gave a cheerful laugh, and jumping from the horse untied the ri line and then said;

''I believe I was half asleep yet. put the horse certainly knows his business don't you Carl.''And he patted the long nose of his steed. then he got onto his own mount again and took the reins and the horse at once started to back away from the trees turned slowly around and began to trot down the snow crusted road wh c ehich was just visible in the dim light.

''I thought for a ti e that division of troo s would never come and the fight would be lost.''Observed the soldier.''I have waited here by that big camp fire for over five hours. .''

''we have had a lot of trouble coming here and lots of shocks also from concussions of explosions.''Said violet.''did you not feel the ground shake when there was so many cannons thundering near the river sections yesterday and to day.''!

''Yes''Answered the soldier''but as it is so continuous we are used to such things near vivian wickey. they don't scare us soldiers much. We fear the shells more than the shocks.''''''

''The general eureka said it was the worse shocks produced by explosions he ever knew.''

''did he!''then it must have happened while I was asleep.''He saidthoughtfully. ''But I have seen bad shocks myself.''

'''How is papa and Uncle Hanson getting l along in repelling the foe!''Jennie inquired after a pause during which the horses of all o continued to troy trot with long regular strides.

''They are holding the enemy at a stand still and it looks like their plans will turn out pretty well. General Robert vivian and his brother with their armies have been having a fine time and the foe losses are dreadful.''

.''Is general Whilliamsberger Zimmermann near here too!''Angeline asked.

''Yes. General Whilliamsber ger Zimmermann hav has marred the rebel lines considerably but he is not engaged in this contest but do you know Angolinia Aronburg your friend is his neice!''said the soldier in an amused tone. I ''I have served under him for two months and have found out. por carrying a message for him once he gave me six dollars and a good feed.''

''That is a great deal tfor a general to do for a private.''Said violet.

''does not that show his good character agood deal!''Asked Catherine doubtfully.

''Why it is a great deal for general Whilliamsberger Zimmermann to do, but not for me. I'm a splendid worker for him and he is a good general at that and never boasts of anything he does. And I work as well as I sleep.''He added with a laugh.

''But is your name!''Asked Daisy vivian thinking she liked the manner of the soldier and the cheery tone of his voice.

''It is not a very fashin fashionable one at that ''He answered as if a little ashamed.''My whole name is Herdruder Truder, but the soldiers all around just call be Tub.You little girls have been in vivian wickey a little before Christ mas and got out by rescue haven't you!''''''

''Yes a man by the name of Gannon e helped us during the conflarge tion .''

Angeline herself answered.''We went there to see how the child slave conditions were in the section called Andrean and general Hanson vivian never knew if of it at all and only papa was very much worried while we stayed there a few months in the city section doing what we could for so many of our little friends.''

''How long will you be with us!''He asked.

''Only a day. To morrow general Hanson if he does not succeed here will start his armies tward Battery Line and St Damenican and I must start back with my sisters to General Rober Rovertson vivinnnn army in Concentinian Aronburg command which we like the best. We've been away a long time youknow and we are anxious to get back there again.''

The soldier urged on the horse a little faster as he saw the others gains gaining,a little ahead and he looked thoughtful. when he started to say something to Hattie vivian his nearest little companion now but before he could speak, he heard a loud noise in the distance like a roll of thunder and trees on both sides of him shooks shook their branches as ifin a hurricane, a h use near by swayed dangerously from side to side andthe earth seemed to rock while a great cloud far to their left seemed to rise a legion of miles into the sky.At the same instant elsewhere there was another great roar as if a million cannon were shot off simultaneously and a sharp crash, and far off to the distance Violet and her sisters saw the ground open into eruption like a volcano and then rise into the air in an immense flame of flashes and clouds of debris and smoke.

"Goodness Gracious" "cried Violet grasping the reins more tightly. "What was those explosions for. What is that anyway?"

"They must have been two awful mines." "Replied Tub." My but they made an awful quake. The shock almost got us that time girls. We had a narrow escape from shell shock." "and his face was white and blanched...

The horses also terrified had stopped short and stood firm as a rock. The little girls took the reins and shook them and urged the horses to go and though for a moment the steeds were stubborn they touched the animals flanks with the spurs more sharply and after a series of moans of protest the horses started at a rapid rapid gate. Neither the man or the little girls spoke again for some minutes. There was a breath of terrible danger in the air, and every few minutes came other great explosions in the distance and the earth would shake very violently. The ears of each of the steeds were standing erect upon their heads, and every muscles of their big body bodies were tense as they trot-trotted onward. They were not however going very fast as it did not seem necessary but on their flanks specks of foam began to appear and at times the poor horses seemed to be trembling like leaves. The sky had grown dark with the smoke of fires and clouds, and the wind though not blowing fast made queer sobbing sounds as it swept through the atmpsp atmosphere. Suddenly there was a terrific rending tearing sound as if the earth was fairly splitting to pieces and in a moment all were showered with fal falling debris. Just at this moment Violet and her sisters saw a queer column of horsemen ap approaching toward them just as a gre great rock fell near were their horses were standing.

"They are the Gargolis Glandelinians the Ku Klux Klans of the Glandelinians themselves" "Gasped Violet."

With a wild yell of terror they turned their horses and dashed down the road in another direction. Violet grabbed fast hold of the horses mane with one hand and her sisters did the same and leaned low of t over the horses neck as they drew their little pistols. the sudden rush of the horses seemingly into forward space confused them so they could not even think but they did not check them. Blackness from a thick cloud of smoke from the explosion engulfed them all a on every side, and in bren blessa silence, they waited for the volley they expected to come from the Glandelinians which would kill their horses and probably cause them to have a fall in which they would be crushed under their heavy bodies or another explosion to break so close to them as to crush them under tons of jagged rocks and the storm of falling earth and other debris to close in on them and bury them forever under th its dreadful piles. The horrible sensation of the danger threatening them so suddenly, and darkness, the terrifying noises from the yelling persuers, and the roar of battle seemed for a moment to be more than the vivian girls could endure, and for a few mon moments it seemed as if they were about to lose consciousnessconsciousness but being brave and collected they did not faint. But nevertheless cornered by explosions explos one and persued by the fiercest of the glandelinians they were badly frig t frightened and clung to their horses manes with a tight grip on the reins at the same time and having the pistols in the right hands, yet expecting every moment to be their last. But the glandelinians did not fire and also seemed to be loning the race as their yells and commands, shouts and threats, and curses were receding.

When Violet and her sisters recollected themselves,,, their horses were still racing on swiftly but not quite so as fast as efore. The smoke of another distant explosion seems to go through the air in the form of alarge white parachute or an umbrella filled with wind and this form of cloudat first floated a little downard downward and then upward with a gentle motion that was not so very disagreeable to see.

The worse thing was their terrorof some of the fierce Gargle Gargolins overtaking them and the natural fear that sudden death was about to overtake them at any moment as a mine may eve even be under the road and they may ride over it just as it goes off. crash after crash, and then a salvoes of crashes loud like deafening thunder sounded far a o above their heads as shells exploded in great numbers, and stones and hunks of clay and other debris rattled around them on every side every side. These however they could not hardly see as it was now growing dark, but they could feel them pelting them all over and Jennie was hit on the head by a stone screamed almost like a lost soul from the pain it made her and a stone also struck violet on her lap but did no k injury. The stones did not really hurt violet n and her sisters of or their horses either because the stones were not large enough to do damage only the stones and rubbish shot upward bythe great explosions fe fell faster than the horses could run to get away from their descent and for a time the terrified children were more frightened than injured. How long this stage of things continued Violet and her sisters could not even guess for their lives,, they were so greatly bewildered. But bye and bye as the little girls stared into the black abyss of darkness in the rear of them with wildly beating hearts, they begi began to see di simly the forms of their persuers far behind the hands of the horses of the rebels high up in the air or down their ears are erect and their long long legs seemingly galloping like the motor of a electric machine as they raced as after the fugitives.....

Also toining their little heads they found they could see the troops all around and the soldier stillwith them who had untill now remained as still and as silent as they themselves. As yet neither had to the need to use their guns. Violet and her sisters seeing they hadoutdistanced the rebels sighed and commenced to breathe easier. Violet and her sisters began to realize that death at the hand of the persuers was not in store for them, after all but that they had merely started upon another of their adventures which they experienced in the strife which pro bably promished to be just as queer and unusual as were thosethey had before encountered.

With this thought in their minds,, the little girls took heart once more and sitting more erect on their horses leanded over a little to see more plainly where the in the distance the strange lights were coming from. Far beyond in the distance where the rebel lines of Aurandocallio was supposed to be there seemed to be great ba gl wing balls of colors shooting high up in the air and dropping down in the form of colored suns and the largest and centre central one was white and reminded them of the sun only that it was not so bright and only pierced the darkness only a short distance. It must be signals among the enemy. Following these at times in the form of five pointed stars were other large glowing balls one being rose colored, one violent, another yellow, one bule, another orange, and still others green, pink, and brown. These splendid groups of flashing and scorning colored glowing balls of light seemed to sent rays of great brightness like from searchilights darting about in every direction, and as the little girls slowed their horses down a little the rays increasing in number began to take on all the tints of the rainbow growing more and more distinct every moment untill the sky in that direction became brilliant illuminated. Violet and her sisters were too surprised and dazed to say much but she wa violet watched one of her sisters ears turn to violen violet, and the other to rose, and wondered that her horses tail should be almost yellow and his body stripped with blue and orange like the stripe of a fierce zebra. When she looked at the soldier who was in their rear whose face appeared to be blue for a moment and whose hair seemed to be pink, and gave a laugh that sounded a little bit nervious.

"Is not the rays from the rebel signal colored searchlights funny?" "he said.

The soldier was startled and his eyes were big. Jennie suddenly had a green streak through the center of her pretty face where the blue and yellow lights suddenly met their beams in one place and her appearance seemed to add to his and her sisters fright.

"I don'ts-see any-anything funny---about it. He stammered." If the rebels see us with their lights we will get a volley of shells and it won't be a laughing matter." "

They however continued to go onward Violet swerving her course a little her horse almost tipping over to one side as Jennies also did the same. All together at once they continued on in their race and swiftly as the horses were galloping Violet and her sisters to the surprise of the man had no difficulty in remaining in the saddles, just as they were before. Quickly seeing they had completly outdistanced the glandelinians for fair they slowed down a little bit and soon as all was quiet Violet said in a relieved tone of voice if you please to mention!

"Well the excitement is over. That's bet'er." "

Her sisters and the soldier looked at one another.

"Do you think our excitement is all over?" "Asked Violet.

"Never knew it was" "Said Jolee." I think it is only beginning."

This is a number of times now we have encountered those Ku Klux Klans of the rebels." Called out the little girls tog the soldier who had overheard him" And we can't explain why it happened to be we should meet them when we feel sure we are somewhere within the christian lines or more. This is a nice scrape those Gargolies have got us into isn't it!"

"As for that we could have led them into the same scrape themselves." Answered Violet cheerfully." But never mind something will happen soon."

"Of course" "rowled the soldier." And then we shall be sorry it happened. We can't monkey with those glandelinians."

Violet and her sits sisters gave a shiver. All this was so terrible and seemed so unreal that the little girls could not understand it at all and so had good reason to be afraid brave as they were and tried to be. Swiftly they continued onward while what appeared to be flaming suns daring forth and to and fro continued to flare in the direction of the foe lines and a great beam of light suddenly passed close behind them. The glare of some of these searchlights was so exceedingly bright that it dazzled their eyes and as they rode on they were compelled to cover their faces with one hand to escape being blinded.....Not one of the glaring beams of the colored search lights struck them however and so they were not seen and after they had passed beyond the most of them a great number of trees growing close together for some distance shut out many of the piercing rays so that the soldier and the little girls could open their eyes again and see where they were going.

"We have got to get to some shelter some time." "Remarked the soldier with a deep sigh." We can't keep keep racing on t like this forever and the horses are becoming jaded. We got to get to shelter you know."

"Of course not, we can't keep on like this." "Said Violet." We are some where in the middle of a forest and the chances are we may reach the other side and run into an enemy encampment if we continue on like this, and do so belong long too. But these woods are awful big are they not?"

"Answe Awful big woods." answered the soldier." We are in the Red Riding Hood Woods."

''''''We are coming to something now.''''Announced Joine vivian.

At thi s they all looked forward tward where she pointed, except Angeline who put her head over the sideof her horse and looked down at the ground th nking she saw something lying there.There was a stretch of strange land as it seemed before them, and not so far away either. Ot w was it land. Being cautiously they had their horses trotting very slowly------so slowly that it couldnot even no longer be called a trot but a slow walk, and violet and her sisters had ample time to take heart and look aboutthem with the help of the strong moonlight.They saw within three hundred yards of them a long line of high mounted ground with far beyond something at that at first in the dimness of the light looked like a long peculiar shaped mountian in front of a plain but all the scenery was splendidly colored by a storm of variegated flas lights as if there was a score of thousand suns flashing back and forth, from side to side, and up and down and every direction.Here and there was a mass of tents, a group of tall and long houses in the form of barracks that seemed made of clear wood and nothing else, and the lights of other flashes sparkled so brightly that the little girls were suspisc suspicious.

''It is the enem ys lines but I'm sure we are in no danger if we be careful.''''Said Hettie in asober voice.''We are advancing slowly but we must avoid them or the gunners if there are any may dash us to pieces by their explosions of mines or shells and yet the formation and makeup of the rebel position we have run into seems quite pretty.''

''We'll never get back to the christian line s again though.''''''Declared one of her sisters with a groan.

''Oh I'm not so sureof that.''Replied Jennie.''But don't lu let us worry over such thingsas that girls, and just now anyway we can't help ourselves you know, and you know we have always been told by father and eve our mother and uncle and many friends oven that it is always foolish to borrow any kind of trouble..''

Her sister become quiet, having no reply to so sensible a speech, and soon were fully occupied in staring at the strano scenes spread out below them. They seemed to have advanced right into the middle of a big city of encampments which had in the interior many tall buildings or barracks of wood, and in front was a long sailent or fortification like breastworks but abatis in front with sharp pointed spearas.

The wooden brachos had been shaped like great spear points, and if they had rode into one of those they would likely have suffered serious injury. The soldier had seen these spires or spearas and he s almost stood straight up in his horse white with fear, while violet and her sisters held their breath in suspense. but no they managed to avoid the formidable abatis, and the lights, and came to a stop behind a very high ledge of rocks. when the soldier and the little girls felt sure they were saft ly hidden their legs trembled so much that they could scarcely stand, but violet at once leaped from her horse and she was so aw awkward and hasty that he kicked over the suitcase of hers which rolled upon the s snow covered road so that it flew open. At on ce milk bottle and some eatables as cake and bread came out out the upset suit case, while Jennie feeling tired and sleepy now since the excitement of the persuit was over yawned and blinked her eyes.

''Oh my''Said Jennie.''I'm sleepy.

''First time I have ever saw a little pink girl.''Said the soldier good naturedly.

''I'm not pinkI'm white but you are red ''she shot back.''It is these queer lights from the rebel lines that gives us these colors.''

''Yes and my milk bottle is lying in the road.''Declared Violet.

''And where is my suitcase.I'm most starved to death having eaten nothing since I left the division of troops.''

''Oh violet and your sisters. Can you hear that strange noise?''

''strange noise. Am I hearing things. Good gracious I believe we are hearing strange things. Isn't it funny!''''''Asked Angeline.

''It is a ll wrong''Said Angeline or Jennie I mean gravely.

''We ought not to listen to any such sounds. But oven the soldier Tub has been saying h that he heard queer things ever since our mishap.''

''I can't see that is is all wrong.''Remarked Daisy listening.''At least it is not wrong about these sounds as some other things. what's going to become of us now if we do not get out of here!''

I ''I don't know answered the soldier lo king around ' im curiously and anxiously.

The earthworks of the encampments before them were made all of snow and gravel and the moonlight seemed to be so clear and almost transparent was the atmosphere that one could look a great distance as easily as through a clean window.

violet and her sisters saw near the tents nearest to their hiding place several small outhouses probably used as rest rooms or buildings for the generals, and although she and her sisters could make out a number of queer lo king forms moving about in the corners of one of the company streets they could not make out what they were. The roofs of many barracks they saw had great holes smashed through them and pieces of wreckage and a l kinds of debris was lying scattered in every direction and it was apparent this encampment had been under shel l fire. A near by tower of a building had been blown off short and the wreckage lay heaped up beside the building. Many other wooden barracks were torn or cracked in many places or had corners of parts torn off from them as if a tornado had struck, but these barracks must certainly have been very handsome and beautiful before this partial destruction had happened to mar their perfection. The rainbow tints of the many Glandelinians colored searchlights, fell upon variousportion of the encampments very softly but brightly and gave to many a tent and barracks, and works and even lines of cannons and rifle pits and the abatis any delicate, shifting hues which was exceedingly pretty to see. but not a sound had broken the stillness, since the van and violet and her sisters had arived, except that of the whispers of their own v oices and the sobbing of wind through treetops. They began to wonder if the encampment had been abandoned land if there were any one to inh abit this mag nificent and vast encampment when suddenly in the glare of the light a man appeared through a lane court of the company street shouldering a musket and stepped into plain view. He was a very large man and was well formed and had a handsome but wicked looking face--though calm and serene as the face of a fine portrait. His uniform which color they could not make out fitti fitted his for smugly and was gor geously colored as they saw afterwards by the lights in brilliant shades of green and then blue or red which varied as the beams of the searchlights touched them but was not whoo wholly influenced by the peculiar rays . The soldier had taken a step or two across the company street looking no doubt for the prec presence of strangers, and then coming close to the hiding place he stoo so stopped abruptly. there was no expression of fear or even any sur r surprise upon his face which was tranquil y yet he must have beenboth astonished and fraid as he did see a strange horse, for after his eyes had rested upon the unguinly form of the horse for a moment he walked rapidly to the other side of the company street, his head turned back over his shoulder to gaze at the strange form in the darkness.

''Look out girls''Cried Violet who noticed that the beautiful looking glandelinian sentry had seen the horse of the soldiers.''Be careful or we will be discovered.''

The sentry or who ever he was paid no further attention to the strange horse he had seen but reaching the edge of the company street stepped into the woods and disap eared into the darkness as calmly as if he were going anywhere he liked. The little girls were greatly astonished and would have ran over to the woods but were warned by the soldier not to and so seeing the sentry walk walking rapidly through another company street saw him signal with a small hand pocket searchlight . Soon he reached a large tent and disappeared into it through its large opening.

''how strange''''''''she exclaimed drawing a long breath.

''Yes but it seems to be lots of fun even if it is strange.''Remarked her sister, and then violet and her sisters turned t o see a peculiar lighted object moving back and forth thr ugh the air as if it was fairly walking upon it and that Jennie was about or was leaving her hiding place to see what is was.

''Come back Jennie''she called in distress.''You certainly will be killed if the enemy see you.''

''I have no fear of thethe glandelinians seeing me''Said Jennie singing softly as she stood still and watched the shining object go about in a circle and then come back to her hiding place.''But I,m sure we can't lose ur livrs by being seen by the glandelinians when not spying on them but any way we could not really manage to escape them just now even if we wanted to do so.''

''poon the air bear up that weight of that perculiar light or shining obk object!''Asked Hettie.

''Of course can't you see''Said Jennie as again the shining object wandered into the air and back into th e woods.''

''It must be wonderful.''Said Catherine.

''Suppose we get the horse which is exposing itself and try and make our way out of this location.''Suggested Daisy who had even been more amazed than any of her si six sisters at these strange happenings. They reali realized they were near the encampments of the glande,t glandelinians known as the Mangaboocer rebels.

''Perhaps we can first lead our horses forward carefully and walk a certain distance.''Replied Angeline.

''Catherine drew back with a shiver.

''I would not dare try the way those lights are flashing.''She said.''We may be fired upon by a machine gun.''

''Maybe the soldier will lead the way.''Continued Angeline looking at him.

''Any And maybe he won't at that''Answered the soldier.''We have had excitement loo long enough to make us contented by remaining in this hiding place untill the flashing of lights abate a little.''

''But we didn't tumble into their way''Said the little girl an''and we came within sight of the encampment without being discovered.By the time we got here we even came very slowly and I'm almost sure we can lead out horses while we walk down the road untill out of sight without getting hurt . All we must do is avoid the sentries and pickets. We could walk like creatures on the air and make no noise.' ''

''We littl girls weight only about fifty or lessthat many pounds.''Replied Catherine, in almost a scornful voice or tone, ''While each of our ''While each of our horses weight about a half atone or more and cannot help making noise with their hoofs on the hard snow crust of the road.''

''the horses don't weight as much as they ought to.''Remarked violet shaking her head as she looked at the ans animals. They are not very skinny but they are not robust enough to my satisfaction.''

''Oh we'll the horses are old.''Said the soldier almost hanging his head despondently''and they have had lots of trouble in their days. For a good many dahs days they had been used to draw cannons near Jennie vivian before the battle there t and that is enough to make any one look skinny even a man.''

''Thehorses get enugh to eat and enough care to get fat I'm sure at that.''Said the soldier gravely.

''po they. Can you remember any breakfast that any of us had to day.''Said violet in a tone as if she resented his speech.

''None of us has had anyt hing to eat so far since early this morning.'' said the soldier''And in time of such danger like this it is foolish to talk about eating an' anything.''

''nothing is more dangerous than being without food.''Declared Joice, with a sniff at the rebuke of the young soldier''p And just at present no one among us can tell whether we can secure provisions for ourselves and oats or other feed for the horses inthis queer region or not. If there are anything we may have to risk our very lives to obtain it.''''''

''Oh no''Exclaimed Angeline.''I can see plenty of nice store houses and trains of provision wagons not far away at the edge of this city of rebel encampments. But I wish we could find a way to get to them.''

''Why don't we take the chance and creep down to them?''Asked Joice.''I'm as hungry as a wolf and I want something to eat before we proceed any further.

''I''will you try it Tub?''Asked the little girls turning to their companions. W ''Will you take up our rear.''

The soldier at first hesitated. He was still pale and frightened for this dreadful adventure had upset him and made him nervious and worried. But n being a soldier and a man he did not indeed wish these pretty little girls who were heroines themselves to think him a coward, and so f as they slowly moved off he advanced slowly in their rear. Violet stretched out a hand to him and Tub put one foot out and let it rest in the rond a little over the edge of a stick and looked around cautiously. It seemed to him that everything wa s firm enough to walk upon without any accidental noise being made so he took courage and proceede further. Violet kept hold of his hand and followed him and her sise sisters, and soon they were all creeping slowly tward a wagon, with her sisters in the front.

''Come on Tub.''They called.''It's all right.''

The soldier had crept now to the edge of a clearning and looked once more tward the rebel lines and being a sensible man and quiet p experienced, he made up his his mind he could go where the others did. go with a mu bled prayer and a sigh he slowly continued to creep forward u till they all were past the clearning, having brought their horses also which in the snow made no noise and the lights had not at this time shone in their way. Their great weight however made great deep steps in the sniw and they came faster than the children of the soldier moved and the horses almost passed them but when they reached the nearest wagon violet crept to it and then tried to see what was inside.

''Well, well''Said Angeline drawing a long breath.''what a strange encampment it is. not a thing in the wagon.''

Unseen by the however soldiers had began to come out of every tent door nearest the wagons to look with cautiou caution at the new arivals, and pretty soon quite a crowd had assembled. there were swarms of men with their hair dressed like all little girls in different styles, and wore black hats like girls, and they seemed to be be beautifull beautifully formed and attrat attractively uniformed and many of them had wonderfully a handsome faces, and all were armed with long guns or rifles with fixed bayonets. There seemed to be no ugly looking person among the t' ta throngs of soldiers slowly surrounding the wagon and coming forward, yet had the little girls or the soldier seen them they would not have been especially pleased by the appearance of these soldiers with the hair i of little girls because their features and uniforms showed they were the fierce and dreaded Mangaboos called the Zimmermannians.They did not smile nor did they frown as they approached or show either fear, or surprise or curiousity or even friendliness. hey simply stared and kept their eyes on the strangers as they came nearer.with guns at the ready paying most attention to violet and her sisters for the Glandelininns had never seen children so beautiful before and thought them a great prize. One of the men who was in the group of Zimmermannians wore a glisten glistening star on his breast of his jacket and his hat covered a large shock of bobbed black black hair and he alone was fierce and savage looking. He was a person of authoti authority for the others pressed back with guns ready forvvolley at his or der. Then he drew his pistol and fired a shot into the air and the startled soldier and man turned to find themselves surrounded by the insurgents. they were prisoners. hen turning his almost composed eyes first upon the horses, and then upon the soldier and thechildren he said to Tub;

''ell me you Angelinian intruders.Was it you who caused the rain of shells up on our encampment by your spying. nd dare you spy on us again!''''

For a moment the soldier and the little girls did not know what he meant by this serious question. then remembering the wreckage of barracks they he and the little girls had seen caused probably by shot and shell and also of the stones that had fallen over and about them during the persuit he answered;

''No sir we did not cause anything. It was a artillery storm. We were chased and got here accidentall. We are not spies.''

The Glandelinian officer with the star stood for a time quietly thinking over this spe ch he. when he asked;

''what do you mean by an artillery storm.''?

''I don't know said the soldier, who was still confused over tthe new turn of affairs. But violet, seeing his perplexity, answered;

''It is a great firing of many cannons or guns so severe as to cause a peculiar shaking of the earth as you notice when a battle is raging. In this artillery storm shells may have hit your encampment at random and damaged your barracks. We had a narrow escapes from explosions of mines and that is the reason we came here.''

The man with the star on his chest regarded her with his calm seemingly expressionless eyes.

''he shells have done much damage to our encampments.''He said.''As we cannot lay th blame of that on you yet we shall hold you responsible as spies because we caught you snooping around our wagon train unless you can prove your innocence.''

''How can we do that?''Asked Angeline''We were loking for something to eat that is all.''

''that I am not prepared to say. It is your own affar not mine. You are here within our lines and you must go to the generals tent general Sorcerer who will try you by court marshall. He alone can discover the truth by a throughout examination.''

''Where is general Sorcerer's tent.''One of the little girls inquired anxiously.

''I will lead you to it.Come right away. And don't make any breaks you or you will be run through.''

He turned and gave an orfer to his soldiers and then walked down tward the company steeet street and after a moments hesitation the soldier and the little girls nabled along leaving their horses in possession of the insurgents.

Some of the rebels made way for them and one formed a procession in front, and another in the rear. Slowly they moved down one company street to another and then up a third, turning first one way and then another untill they came to an open square in the encampment where stood a big tent of ernormous size like that seen in a circus formed like a huge dome and near stood two tall spires on each side with the Glandelinian flag lowered at half mast.

The doorway or entrance of this big tent was quite large enough for even a horse and wagon to enter, and the prisoners marched in fours straight through it and the children found themselves inside a tent as large as a circus tent where the acters a perform the interior however being very beautiful. A large number of Glandelinian officers at once followed and formed a strange circle around the sides of the spacious tent room, leaving the prisoners and the general and two other high officers to occupy the center of the tent near a large round table made of oak wood.A the table sat a haungty gaughty looking general and he arose as they entered.He from his uniform seemed indeed to be a strange personage. He was taller than any of the other officers and even the soldiers and his clothing only differed from theirs in formation and was of a bright ashen gray color. He had no hair at all but was bald headed. He wore a grat robe with a picture of a thorny plat engraved upon it and he looked so exalted, and so haughty and high toned and so funny even that despite the danger they were facing violet and her sisters almost laughed when they saw him.The Glandelinian chief general hearing the laugh looked tward the little girls with cruel and cold eyes, and indeed t his glanced glance made her grow sober in an instant.

''Why have you dirtychristian dogs dared to intrude your unwelcome persons into the secluded encampments of us Glandelinians, and then come in here and dare to laugh in my face!''He asked sternly.

''Because we could not help it.''Said Violet.

''you could helpt it you centepeds. nd why did you so wickedly and viciously be the cause of the rain of shells and explosives that cracked, and shattered many of our barracks, and killed a number of soldiers and officers!''He continued.

''We didn't.''Declared Joice.

''Prove it.''Cried the Glandelinian general.

''We don't have to prove it for you general Sorcerer Gwig.''Answered Jennie indignatly

If''If you Glandelininns had any sense at all you'd known it was caused by random shots during a battle at Aurandecallio.''

''pon't get sassy you little she devil. We only n know that to day or earlier at least there came a rain of shot shell and high exp' ex plosives upon our encampments which did much damage and injured many of my soldiers and almost compelled us to abandon it. This evening came another rain of shells and explosives, and soon after it you h had the nerve to appear among our lines to spy.''

''By the way ''said the general wearing the gold star on his chest looking steadily at his superior''I was told yesterday that there would be no means for the christian dogs to hurl upon our intrenchments a second rain of shells untill we could have massed our batteries to reply. Yet one has occured that was worse than even the first. What are these christian do s good for as christians if they set a bad exap axample and refuse to tell us the truth. And ain't these little girls here the ''vivian girls'' daughters of general Robert vivian the main christian dog.''''''?

''We do tell the truth.''Declared Angeline

''Some of you soldiers and officers told me yesterday''Said the superior that there would not be any rain of shells as the christian guns could not reach us.''

''I said there would onlybe one storm of shells.''declared a lieutenant. ''This second rain of shells and explosives came a little before these spies did.''

''Do you think the christian dog armies will make any more attempts on Aurandecallic leases?''Asked the superior general.

''No your excexcellency.''

''Neither on the Lucille ickson vortifications?''

''No your excellency.''

''Are you sure.?!?''

''Quite sure your excellency.''My scouts have toldme so.'' just then a man came into thetent having dismounted from t him horse and he had come trunning into the tent and adr addressed the superior general after saluting;

''Now wonders in the air, your excellency.''Said he.''There is a peculiar object floating in the sky above us.''''''

Immediately the general and the officers and all the soldiers except those left to guard violet and her sisters flocked out of the tent into the company street that they might see what was about to happen. Seeing that some of the others who were guarding the soon followed violet and her sisters and their soldier friend ran out after them, but the superior general remained calmly in his chair and started to write something on a sheet of a paper.

Indeed far up in the air was a large bright glowing object that looked very much like a baloon but was of flaming fire color. It was not so high as many would have supposed but it was followed in a perfect line by lights of colors in the form of six pointed stars, and other linlights below it like sixteen colored suns but it s they all seemed to be descending slowly through the air--so slowly that at first they did not seem tosarcely move. whe the throng of glandelinian soldiers stood still and waited most paitnsltu. It was all they could do now for to go away and tl to leave that strange sight was ututterly impossible, nor could they hurry i their fall in any way though some fired their rifles up at them frequently and almost cons constantly..... violet and her sisters in the excitement were not noticed now. Gradually the baloon shaped light grew bigger, which seemed to be proof that it and the peculiar lights were settling down upon the fortifications of the Mangaboo glandelinian troops. violet and her sisters were surprised to see how pai patient the glandelinian soldiers and even the officers were for their own little hearts were beating rapidly with excitement and a little fearthe baloon like light, and the glowing sun like balls of colors and the star shaped lights meant to violet and her sisters some strangeness in the skies, which they believed was a signal of some other arivals within the glandelinian encam ments and violet and her sisters faithfully hoped and prayed that it would be a signal that large christian troops were moving upon the encampment with the purpose of assulting it, so that in the confusion of battle they might have a chance to escape, or that Angelinians would come and assis them out of their difficulties.In an hour the baloon light light and the others had come so near that it was immensely lia large but then it suddenly lifted and a all vash a vanished into utter darkness. At this moment another soldier or officer appeared among them took off his tall hat and bowed very gracefully to the crowd of Zimmermannian Mangaboo glandelinians around him. He was quite an old l ttic man, and his head was long and entirely bald.

''Why''cried violet and her sisters in amazement and fear''It 's general Jesipins Jensinin whom they called ''smash-in-the-head...''''

The little man dressed in a generals uniform looked tward violet and her sisters and seemed as much surprised as they were. but he smiled and bowed as he answered;

''Yes my dear little vivian girls'' known as the greatest child spies, 'I am general Jesipins Jensinin the Great and Terrible.Ah! and you are the children of general Robert Angelic vivian w known as violet nd her sisters from Angelinia the National states. I remember you very well. nd you are in for it I'll assure you unless you can prove your o innocence.''

''Who did you say it was?''Whispered the Angelinian soldier to one of the little girls cautiously as he did not like his looks.

''It's the glandelinian general called ''smash-in-the-head by his men as he is so terrible, cruel and severe. ''Haven't you heard of him. He befriended us once but I doubt it this time.''?

Just then the general with the star on his breast came and stood before general smash-inthehead.

''Sir ''Said he''why are these little goils here with their soldier friend in the encampment of the Mangaboo glandelininns.The are spies and I saw to their capture.?''

''id not know what encampment it was your excellency''Said the soldier himself assuming a pleasant smile though he did not feel that way''and to be honest I or the little girls did not mean to visit you or your encampments when we started out in the first place and we are no' spies. We were among a christian division and were finding our way t ward general Hanson vivian headquarters which is better than living or being here when we were persued without reason by your Gargolie or Ku Klix Klans, and in our attempt to edhue them we ran into this encampment in the dark. We had raced our horses so fast that we could not stop them quick enough and in a few minutes after we had observed our escape we found ourselves in front of this encampment. so as we were hungry we went to a certain wagon and tried to obtain a little some thing to eat when we were arrested. nd so if you will show me and the little girls a wa way out of here, we willgo with pleasure. sorry to have troubled you Mangaboo glandelininns; but it could not be helpled. nd we tell you before Heaven and earth we are no' spies, and you cannot find evidence against us.''''''

The man glandelinian general had listened with much attent ion then said he;

''These little girls who are the vivian girls are accused as spies as well as yourself. Are not spies something very dangerous to a nations cause?''''

''It is more dangerous than anything.''Replied the soldier prompt ly. ''One spy is more dangerous than a whole division of charging troops and a regiment of artillery comni combined. But we are not spies. we ran into your encampments unintentionally.''''''

''Ah thenyou shall prove that.''said general smash-in-the-head.''We glandelinians who are of the Mangaboo tribes of scats have at thepresent time been tormented by the most terrible and most powerful kind of christian spies that was ever known to enter our lines but of course we can and do sometimes make mistakes, in accusing some one we are not surd of sur e sure of. o you ever make mistakes in rego recognixing spies general sorcerer.?''

''Never.''Declared the glandelini n general boldly.

''Oh general sorcerer.''Said violet defiantly.''You made violet of mistakes when you captured us. You accuse us as spies and yet you have no evidence. you want to do away with us because we are only little girls and ''Christians''.

''onsense''Said the glandelinian general, turning red, although just then a ray of violet light from a switched searchlight rays was on his face.

''Come with me ''General smash-in-the-head said to the prisoners.''I wish you to meet general Manley if he is in this location anywhere.''

Violet and her sisters and the soldier did not like this kind of invitation, but they could not refuse to accept it as soldiers were around them with fixed bayonets and loaded rifles and there was no escape from them yet. so they followed the glandelinian general into the great domed tent, and violet and her sisters came in between two regiments of armed men while throngs of soldiers trooped in also. There sat general Sorcerer in his chair writting on the paper still, and when Violet and her sisters saw him a second time they were again inclined to laugh despite the position and danger they were in uttering comical little chuckles.

''Indeed what amabourd creature for a general to lead troops.' Said violet in her quiet voice.''

''He may look absurd to you.''Said general Jensin.''But he is not only an excellant general but a dangerous man when aroused. The only fault I find with him that he is so often wrong in dealing with prisoners brought before him. He deals with them too easily.''

''I am never wrong.'' newered the general.''Prisoners should always recieve a square deal no matter who they be.''

''Only a short time ago you told me you would not be easy with any prisoners.''Said said general Jeni Jensin.

''well what then?''

''Here are seven pretty Angelinian girls and a Angelinian soldier with them come among our lines who are real spies and any glandelinians can prove you are wrong if you claim they are innocent no matter what they say. they are to go before general Manley to morrow.Then he will settle the question b by general courtmarshall.''

''e They cannot be proved o to be real spies unless they have evidence against them on the line of important papers in their possession.'' said general sorcerer.''If they merely came into our lines because they lost the way you might with justice say I am wrong in convicting them before the firing squad, but unless they can be proved to be spies I will hold that I am right and will not prosecute them unless I wish todo so. I am superior here and will do as I see fit.You have nothing to say.If you don't like it you mat report toManley and I will resign my command. I'm not a child butcher and never will be one.''''''

''Very clever for you ''Said the Angelinian soldier nodding his head as if he was pleased by this remark.!'' I'm delighted to find decent and honorable glandelinians inside a rebel encampment just the same as there are so many bad ones. Are you going to prosecute us without evidence.''?

''No''Saidthe general sharply..... ''And if you christins were more the wiser you would join us as your cause is hopeless. I and my troops belong to the Great Consolidated Gargolian divisions and if you were wise you could join them..It would indeed be a fine aggregation I assure you. but what do you do then if you do not spy on us?''''''

''I said the soldier , usually go up or go out on scouting tours, or recieve important generals and other personalges and await them with horses and had done the same for these little goils. But we have just had the bad luck, to come into cyour lines after being persued by said Gargolians and come somewhere where we did not intend. but never mind It is not every body who gets a chance to enter the encampments of the Maraflocos as we did without intending t o.''

''Mangaboo s you dummy.''Said the general correting him. ''If you are a sensible Angelinian soldier t you ought to be able to call us glandelinians by our right names..''

''Oh I'm an Angelinian all right; you may be sure of that.''Just as good an Angelinian soldier as you are an insurgent.''

''That remains to be seen.''Said the other angrily.

''If you are able to prove you are not spies.''Said genera Jensin to the Angelinian soldier''and also prove the innocense of the little girls I will not take the pleasure of holding you as prisoners though christian dogsyou be as we have too many prisoners already. Otherwise!!!------''''..

''''''Oh What will happen to us otherwise!!!!!!''''''Asked the Angelinian soldier.

''You will be brought before general john Manley, who will stop you from living by pl placing the soldier before the firing squad, and the children in the power of the torturers, and large troops would be placed near by to prevent your rescue by Angelinians.'' ''Answered general Jen Josipine Jensin himself.

''That does not sound especially pleasant but we could defy you just the same to do it.''Said the Angelinian soldier , looking at the general uneasily thought he felt defiant.''But never mind with the help of god and glex pleased Mother we will beat general Manley to it all rig t. He is an old Prickly anyway.''''''

''His name is general Manley''Said general Jensin, turning his heartless cruel eyes upon his christian prisoner and rival.''Let me see you ever make an attempt to defy Landelinia.''

''He waved his gloved hand and at once from somewhere a tinkling of bells was heard as a signal somewhere. Yet look where they would violet and her sisters or the soldier could discover no bells at all in the great tent. The Lando linians listened but showed no great interest. It was one of the things that general Je Jensin usually did to summon some one he wished to call. When a man appeared who was dressed in the garb of a Gargolie though he wore no hood or hedious disguise and was indeed a handsome loking man but with wicked eyes and a villainous smile about his mouth.

Knowing that danger threatened them and that something must be done to effect a clever escape before it is too late the sly thought of a scene if he could work it. He knew he had lost his hat and as it was cold he smiled upon the assemblage of Landelinian soldiers and asked!!!!!!!

''I do not wish to impose upon my captors but will somebody kindly loan me a hat! I fell cold.''''''

No onewould because the Landelinians would not turn their own hats over to their Angelinian enemies. The soldier had lost his somehow in his flight from the Gargolian troopers and so he thought to ask for one.

''Ahem!''Said the soldier looking with one side of his eye at violet and her sisters.''will somebody please loan me a hat n and a handkerchief.''! But no one among the Landelinians wouldloan a handkerchief either and many at his requests,began to scowl, sulk and pout and looked dangerous and threatening.

''very good.''Remarked the soldier.''I'd use my own hat if you would please but i I lost it. but I see you rebels are very stingy. Now my Landelinian friends just the same observe me carefully. You see there is nothingup my sleeve as any kind of weapon r or any concealed about my person anywhere as you have taken weapons we had away from us when we were unjustly arrested. Also I have no hat. But''He took off violet's hat and held it upside down and then those of her sisters and said! shaking each hat briskly''There is nothing here I also. We are unarmed and helpless.'

The Landelinians were suspicious of some kind of trick and general Jensin said with a fierce frown on his wrinkled face;

''Let me see those hats and be quick about it and he rudly tore one from his hand.He also took those of violet's sisters and examined it, and then the very persons carefully after returning the hats but found nothing about them.

''No then''Said the little girls''We are all a unarmed. Before Heaven we defy you cruel cowards to touch us while unarmed and yet say you can create a sin without nothing.''

General Jenipine Jensin placed the last hat upon violet's head, made a pass with his hand and then the soldiers s ordered arms immediately. just then a small animal that appeared to be as big as a mouse or was one ran around here and there, and grunted and squaled in a tiny shrill voice and then disappeared and the rebels expected to hear the little girls scream or try to jump on the table but to their utter astonishment they never moved or did not even grow white in the face.

The Landelinians looked upon the little girls intently for they had never seen children or women like them before, either big or little. As the mouse appeared again violet stoppedquickly and reached out catching the wee creature in her hand, and holding is its head between one thumb and finger and its tail between the other thumb and finger she held it for a moment and said;

''You are all armed and we are not but who among you saucy Landelinians will say I am afraid to put one this mouse down your neck.''

As no Landelinian defied her she placed it gently on the floor again so that it could run aro d around. Another mouse soon appeared and she dexteriously caught it also untill she soon had four mice in her possession whilt while the Landelinians looked on in utter amazement. violet continued this most su surprising performance untill she let them run loose about her feet and those of her sisters all squaling in a very comical way.

''Now''Said Violet with a defiant smile''Having shown you we little girls are really afraid of nothing when we are in danger''' will now show you that we can make every mouse go back to its hole again without harming them in he leastt.'' with this she caught up two mice at once and pushed them together against the others slightly frightening them and soon the last one disappeared into the hole. and so one by one the four ,i little mice were made to go back into their holes untill but a single one remained her in her possession. This the little girl placed on her head for a moment between her hat or underhsanth her hat and to their surpsi surprise when she removed the hat she had the mouse again in her hand. Then she sent it disappearing into the hole. The little girl then gave a defiant bow to the silent throng of Landelinians that had watched her, and then general Jensin said in his cold calm voice;

''You and your sisters are indeed wonderful and brave and yet very reckless little girls, and it seems and may be so your bravery are greater and more reckless than an may of our Landelininn soldiers.

''They will not surely be brave wonderful children before long or for long .''Remarked general Jensin.''

''Why not!''Inquired the Angelinian soldier.

''Because I'm going to order a officer to stop their breaths by placing stout rags around their faces.''Was the sudden reply.''I see that they are delicately constructed and that if they cannot breath for even a minute they cannot keep alive.''

Violet and her sisters looked troubled.

A officer stepped forward with a large rag.

''How long will it take your officer to put the rags around one of them to stop their breath?''The soldier asked.

''About ten seconds.He is going to place one now, watch the scene carefully and you will know what happens to persons that defy us Landelinians.''

As the man approached violet a light suddenly flashed high into the air seeming to make queer signs and passes back and forth, but no one paid any attention to this and neither did the soldier allow the man to have much time to perform his work. Instead without being seen he drew a sword from a soldiers scabbard and a pistol or two and by the time he had it drawn the man was already placing the cloth around Jennies face. so the soldier getting desperate lost no more time, but with a yell leaped forward raised the sharp sabre, whirled it once or twice around his head, and before any of the other Landelinians could stop him he gave a mi mighty stroke that cut the body of the officer s o exactly in two. violet and her sisters screamed for they witnessed a terrible sight as his entrails fell loose as he dro dropped into a pile of mess and blood and the place he was cut looked much like a child had looked during a horrible massacre.

''hy I've made an awful sight.'' Cried the Angelinian astonished and horrified.''But taking advantage of the confusion that ensued and as he had fired into the crowd violet and her sisters managed to get through the throng and away the soldier following.

''Of course you have made a mess of it.''Said violet pale in face fro m witnessing the horrible sight. W''hy did you do that. You could have stabbed him and it would have been just as fatal as to cut him in two bfore us.We are all too tender to witness such a sight again. could you not control yourself!''

''no ''Answered the soldier despondently''Your peril was so great then that I had to do something. Will our danger be greater now and our escape cut off!''

''Certainly sir. He is really dead now, and will have to be removed by the rebels very u quickly. so we must make desperate efforts to get out of the lines at once, so that the other Landelinians may not be aroused from their sleep and retake us.''continued violet.

''What do you mean by that!''Asked the soldier greatly puzzled.''We h ave ran so fast that we are almost out of the encampmen now and no one has persued.''

''You will be accompanying us d for a short distance only and then we all will have the greatest excitement.''Replied violet.''I will not need to explain for the scene they that will ensue from this action of your will explain for you much better tha than I can here the mysterious and fierce ways of the ngl n Landelinian mang abocs. If you had been more collected we could have gotten away. I had a plan which would have worked without need of persuit. and you did that I thought I would faint when I saw the horrible sight.''''''

After the soldier had wiped the dampness and the b lood blood from his sword or sabre and put it into his scarr scabbard he and the little girls were by this time some distance from the encampment and had advised to little girls to secure if possible all the horses they could.violet and her sisters pricked up her ears when she they learned they were free from the Landelinian encampments at last past, but they at first wanted to go back to the wagons, thinking to findsomething orpert to eat, but though they sud succeeded in getting through the line they saw nowagons at all. So the procession of soldier and fugitives, ran swiftly down the main road leading from the encampment the little girls being first and the soldier in the rear and soon they could hear from the noise going on that a crowd of ar ed Landelinians wasswiftly following them.To the road at this point divided into two others but when the Landelinians had came upon them some others pou poured th ough the woods to intercept the fugitives but the little girls and the soldiers had got the start, and suddenly came upon a broad covered with a white carpet of snow if you please, butalso in summer if it comes watered by many a pretty little brook and st eam stream that flowed through it....There were paths hidden under the snow in this plain, and over some of the smaller brooks now frozen over were stone bridges of small six size.

Violet nd her sisters feeling safe from persuit for the time being slowed down so that they light see and examine the region better and find where they were.

''Who built these lovely stone bridges!''''''Asked one of the little girls.

''No one built them here just now ''Answered the soldier.''They were constructed thirty years ago.''

''That's queer ''said she.''but do you think the Landelinians will be able to find us soon too!''''''

''Of coufse if we don't hasten!''''''He repilad.''but taking advance advantage of the confusion, and in our haste we managed to make a g o good distance from them now.

distance from them now. I suppose it was a terrible sight that time if killed the rebel officer with the sword. That is why w you little girls were so angry at us. at him."

"Yes and it must have take many days for the Mandelinians to build those barracks whose towers were broken by the rain of shelling, and their roofs cracked. Also because of our cleverness in getting away."'Said violet.

"Do you think the Mandelinians will come and the breaks?"""Jennie inquired.

"No I don't think they will do so but we our selves h must not mind anything about their encampments and must stay together as closely as possible and we I'm afraid will have to wait a long while before we can find our way back to the christian lines again."""

The fugitives hearing t e yel/ of theo rebels searching for them passed through regions which had before the winter or during summer been many beautiful gardens f flowers but violet and her sisters having never been in this location could not tell what kind of flowers they were because everything was under snow and though it was now nearly ten o-clock at night the colors of the searchlights still shifted colors all over. Once of the little girls would be pink one minute or second, white, the next,then blue or yellow, and it was the same way when they came to the edge of a glen whose trees were f all kinds besides evergreens. When they passed o ver a field of dried grass half hidden in snow Violet immediately stopped down and picked up something and found to her surprse it was a loaded pistol and a cartridge belt.

"A nice country this must be." he grumbled putting it on"where respectable children cannot try and find their way home that they do not be help up by insurgents. Look over yonder all the trees look pink."

"They are violet so,or now."Said the soldier who was beside them now.

"""ow it's blue."""""Complained Angeline. As a matter of fact we seem to be insd inside a rainbow world."

"""ow does it suit your taste.?"""""sked the solderi himself.

"Not bad at all."Said violet."If the rebels don't see us by means of those lights and open fire upon us with great guns I'll not complain about thechanging colors at all."

By this time the parte of fugitives ad reached a freshly plowed field, and the soldier said to Violet;

"This is the region as it looks to me situated before surundoca ic called"No Man's land.We have to be careful now."""

In the distance the fugitiv fugitives could now see av several squads of glandelinian gang boos coming forward far in their rear flourhsi ng their rifles n and to avoid being seen the f gitives threw themselves into a deep hole orcdepression in the ground untill those searchers were out of sight when while waiting for the rebels to disappear the little girls shared bullets among each other from the cartridge belt violet had found and then threw away the belt and covered it up with snow. After that one of the little girls managed to get some water in a tin can a d sprinkled it over the snow to make it turn hard so the belt would not reveal itself and give the rebels a clew as to their whereabouts.

"""he other Mandelinians who are searching for us may show up pretty soon."'said the soldier"" nd they may come in a large swarm from which we would have an awful time escaping so I think we better move along."

"Do all of the Mangaboo Glandelinians persist much in a persuit."'Asked Jennie.

"""ertainly"""""was the reply."Do not all other glandelinians persue fugitives with more persistencey."

"Not that I ever heard of."

"How strange. But if you little girls will now follow me I wi ll lead the way through younder woods and see if we cannot elude our persuers for good."

It appeared that the fugitives while they were alble to plough through the deep snow with ease being accustomed to it if you pleas to mention usually moved upon the ground in the swift and sure ordinary way. There were no bridges across other brooks they came from or to but they did not need them as they were tightly frozen over and they were able to walk right acrosse the little party of fugitives now followed the Angelinian soldierscon across a few more small peculiar stone bridges and along severan paths untill thry came to a plain enclosed by a hedge of forestsAt first violet and had refused to leave the hole she had been hiding in but fi ally she had left it and joined her sisters and the soldier, all the little girls following demurely at their hee the heels of their guide.

Inside the hedge of foreststhey suddenly came upon rows upon rows of large and handsome briar bushes with a broad maze of small brav n brac branches, gre gracefully curving upwards untimm their untill their points nearly reached the tree trunks.In the center of the hedge stood a soldiers dummy. Looking back to the rear violet and her sisters with the help of the moon line or moonshine what ever it may be saw the Mangaboos approaching far about five hundred yards distant at ant at first on account of some queer prank the moonlight played on the snow the approaching persuers seemed to be of all sizes but finally they came nearer and the fugitives decided to hide behind the hedge despite the cold and await developements to some.On account of their hair formation the rebels looked absurd enough. Some of the nearest Mandelinians had the hair like woo baby girls, or like a half grow child and in dead this sight explained to violet and her sis ers who she and her sisters and some no other kind of style of hair among these Mandelinians a thing they had until now been unable to account for. Fearing the rebels or some of them would approach their hiding places the little girl violet got her pistol ready, and so did the rest prepare him"

"P Carbinieers does not really require us to shoot the glandelinians untill some of them directly head our way."Said the soldier."You will noti ce that most of them are all attached to going tward another direction, but some columns are already being easily separated but yet none are approaching our way. so wi while they go in another direction we are usually safe, but we must keep ourselves hidden and not allow the rebelsto see us for if they do we are lost.They would kill us now rather than take us prisoners after what I did."'U

"How long do you think they will keep within sight?"'Asked Catherine."Do you think it is necessary to fight them."

"That depends in the care we take in keeping ourselves we l hidden...."He replied."If we keep cool a d collected and keep hidden, we will meet with no accidents or one counters with them here and we can then probably get away to the christian lines by to morrow morning...."I've been in the Angelinian service since the war began and no one in my regiment ever o lost a man yet though it is said the National loss is dreadful in dead or wounded."""""

"Do you see any more coming fro any other direction?"'Asked Hettie.

"See more of the Mangaboo Mandelinians. I do indeed.The persuers who are missing us however are in a quite a solid column and have not come at all this way but they certainly do put me in mind of pete pointsen from the form of their clothing."

"And sometimes I think those of a glandelinians are as senseless any anything that grows."'answered The soldi er"but that would be considered a great misfortune."

"Where did ll the rebels go already?"'Asked Daisy as the last one had dp disappeared.

"I will show you w!"Was the re ly."Step this way little girls but be careful and makeno noise."""

So He led violet and her sists sit sisters around to a clearing in the hedge, to where grew a large and most beautiful and magnificent bush. This they hid behind.

"There they go"He said pointing."All the rebels are going into the opposite direction and I believe it is a party makin, a movement to cut off our retreat."

They hidebehind this bush looking at the rebel troops in silent far and yet admirationTo the soldier violet and her sisters seemed or was so exquisitely formed and so lovely in expression o f their delicate features that he thought he had never seen so sweet and adorable little creatures in all t his life.Their flesh was fine and smoothe as polished ivory and their posi e expressed both dignity and grave and also bravery.....

"Who is the leader of the persuers?"'Asked Joice curiously.

The soldier and the little girls had been staring hard at their dist" distant enemies who had missed them. the soldier however answered with a touch o of uneasiness in his tones.:

"I cannot te ll who the leader is. ut I think soon we had been better abandon out hiding place and make off in another direction. "

"Do you think nother party of rebels might head our way?"'Asked Angeline anxiously.

He hesitated.

"Not quite"Said he finally"But it will be I'm afraid several day days before fr before we can find our ways to the christian lines or at least that is my judgement.I am in no hurry either to go back to a rebel encampment either and be shot as a spy when I am not one you may be sure, and I don't think you little girls are either."""""

"Probably not"""""""declared violet and her sisters nodding..."""

"This is one of the most u unpleasant things about our lives in war."Continued the soldier with a sigh"That while we are in our full prime we must give our lives to the foe as it seems and be covered up in the ground."""

"I'm feeling u sure some landelinians are now approaching our way that are not seen."'Asserted Angeline, gazing hard at the last line of persuers who was or were disappearing."The Mandelinians are e perfect cats in their nature."

"Never mind."'Answered the soldier hastily"We will be all right for a few days longer any way and it is best for us now to resume our way beca because if some of the rebels see us they will do dispose of us in a way that would not be pleasant. Our means to escape must be attended to at once."

"What do you think the Mandelinians would do with us if we were taken again?"'Asked Catherine.

"That is a matter than no one but they can decided upon."was the reply."I think I shall keep my gun I secured handy for it seems quite perfect and I'm very skilfull and the gun I and violet has may o be of some great use to us. But the rest of you little girls having no pistol with you must be careful what t you do in case we spot the persuers for if they see us they will destroy us in some way if they take us and so I'm going to guard you carefully b because I do not wish to go back to the lines and report to the general you have been slain by the enemy."

"You needn't wor y."'Said violet"We would not allow them Mandelinians to kill us I'm sure."

"But why would the Mandelinians destroy us for anyway."Returned Joice or asked Joice t oo."And why do they always murder little children?"

"They hate all children who are christians or belong to christian countries they are atwar with ?."""Returned the soldier."The Mandelinians themsel es have no right to be on the surface of the earth at all."""""

''The Glandelinians have no right to murder children.''Said Hettie Vivian.
''That is no excuse.''Declared the soldier.''Being wicked they will do so no matter why. We will have to be utmost careful that is all.''''

The children looked at each other with perplexity, and the soldier sighed. Violet then rubbed her hand over her eyes and said in her soft voice;;

''If they capture us again the Glandelinians won't need to destroy me; for if I don't get something to eat pretty soon I shall starve to death and so will my sisters, and so save the rebels the trouble.''''

''If you planted a Glandelinian soldier who us Angolinians call wild oats you might grow some cattails.''''''Sug sug gested the soldier.

Violet laughed at this and so did her sisters.

''Oh Violet, perhaps we can find some place where we can get something to eat.'' Said Daisy Vivian.

''Phoo''Said Jackie Vivian''I would not touch any thing in these wooden cabins we may come across. We may eat pesion.''

''If we could only get milk.''Remarked Violet''Though we are big enough now to eat any kind of food.''

''If we could get it.''''''Added Angeline.

''I'm hungry myself''Said the other little goils.''But not long ago I noticed with the help of the moonlight some small houses down in the valley in front of us. We may come across some kind Calverinians who may give us something and even some shelter' -''Never mind your hunger just now.''Interrupted the soldier''There is a swarm of Glandelinians coming in our rear and if they see us they will open a volley that will destroy us in a moment so we will have to keep in concealment as much as possible. Follow me carefully or all of us will meet our doom.We must even prevent them from seeing us or escape is impossible.'''

VIOLET AND HER SISTERS PICKS THE EASIEST AND SHORTEST ROUTE!!

The discouraging words of the Angelinian soldier were indeed not very comforting, and as he spoke them he turned away for a moment and tried to calculate on the best means to take. The fugitive children realizing they were almost surrounded by the enemies searching for them felt sad and despondent and were about to follow him when the soldier suddenly touched Jennie who was nearest him softly on the shoulder.

''Wait a moment.''''He wi whispered.

''Wait! What for!!!!!!''Asked the little girl.

''Suppose we pick the shortest and easiest route.''Said the soldier.''I'm quite sure then we can skip through the encircling line of searchers and as soon as we have done so we may have a bter better chance to escape than we have now.I would like suggessst climbing trees but to be treese treed all night by the rebels in such cold we weather f would mean freezing to death for us all.''''''

''All right we will.''Exclaimed violet eagerly while her sisters also agreed.''Let's pick the route while we have the chance, before any of the nearest of the persuers in our rear see us and fires.'''

So together they started moving forward to a straight course each one seizing hold of hands so they would not be lost in the darkness of the woods.

''Pull that bib weed out of the way.''Cried violet and as Jennie did so it gave way the stems snapping and seperating from the frozen ground. The reed was not at all heavy but solid so Jennie threw it away but in doing so it hit Angeline in the face.

''What hit me''She cried!''

Violet passed her hands of her over her eneyes an instant, tucked a ste stray lock of hair that had become disarranged from under her hat, and after a careful look around made a gracious bow to her sisters and said;

''I thank yo very much but enemies are in front of us. Be careful that we don't run into them or allow themto see us.''

''We will salute them with shots if they see us.''Cried the soldier.

Just then the voice of a Glandelinian was heard in the distancecalling upon his men to hasten, and a moment later while the fugitives hid close behind trees a swarm of Glandelinians passed followed by a number more loking in every direction and veating bushes and snow banks with their musket butts or b bayonets and even striking some trees to make sure their victims were not hiding. But Violet and her sisters were not seen nor the soldier either.Instantly the officer in charnge of the Glandelinians turned and faced his men and when he saw that no children were in sight he ordered his men to stand still, b while violet and her sisters in the meantime hugged the trees fairly and trembled.

''Sir one of the soldiers said with much dignity''Those spies have wronged us greatly by killing the officer, and have wronged us still more by making us keep up this search for them them. Of course we have seen thenge into these woods and eve if we can't find them now on account of the darkness we may do so in the morning; by having the woods besieged. We have been picking out we cur way through the woods nearly half the night but because those spies are so careful and so wise in keeping, in concealment we cannot find them.''

''I did not know those kids were so clever in getting away.'' said their officer impatiently in a low voice.' I've a mind to give it up.''

''Give us a chance at them just once.''Demanded one man''And we will make short work of them in an instant.''

The officer now flourishing his sword which gleamed in the moonlight like a flash of fireand the soldiers seperating in squads proceeded on in their hunt but did not draw near the hiding ple place of the fugitives. Where these Hangaboo Glandelinians went afterwards Violet and her sisters and their soldierfriend never knew.

Indeed the Man'Hangaloo Glandelinians had throughout the woods formed themselves into 4 swarms each moving from all opposite directions with the intention to close in on the fugitives if possible. But while the Glandelinians were thus moving forward in this kinf kind of a searching procession the officers who lead the search walked more cautiously and further in advance of the others to show that he was being a superior was not afraid of the christians they were searching for.

For a while many Glandelinians had literally passed within two feet of their hiding places and one rebel had even passed so close to her that Violet thought she was seen but the rebels had not seen their victims so when the rebels were out of sight Violet and her sisters and the soldier let the trai of rebel train of rebel searchers pass on and then started to work themselves from tree to tree. They did not dare to bother about crossing the bridges over the other brooks but when they came to a stream that proved frozen they would cross it by making their rout under a bridge bridge and got to the other side justas a number of other Glandelinians appeared but yet they were not seen. Though thrilling and exciting this was nevertheless a very interesting experience to the little girls and the soldier, and Joice Vivian said;

''I'm wondering why it is we can so easily avoid the rebels in the dark!''

''Perhaps''Answered the soldier''It is because we cannot be seen by the rebels or probably they dod not look out our way. But I have noticed that many queer things happen in Calverinia.''

''Is this part of Calverinia completely overrun by the Glandelinians!'' Asked Angeline.

''Of course it is.''Returned Violet herself promptly.''Only the western and southeastern parts of Calverinia are overrun by the un insurgents, and only Glandelinians like the ones we usually encounter could do so such horrible things as already have been done.''

''That's true so,'said the soldier thoughtfully.

In other parts of the extensive woods they found certain kind of winter berries that grown in Calverinia in winter which were good to eat, and several other very unknown but very delicious fruits which they secured and ate heartily. But the thing that bothered them was the lack of other food and some water of milk to drink and also the intense cold was starting to make itself felt and Violet and her sisters called the Glandelinians names because they were responsible for their being so far from the christian lines and shelter. As they continued onward working from tree to tree to avoid being seen they ate the fruit and then Violet said;

''I don't believe we will ever get by these Glandelinians at all. They are pressing us too close.''

''No''Answered the soldier.''I'm afraid you are quite right. In the strict sense of the word I'm not so sure of getting through either unlesswe fight our way through. But we would be only humbugs to allow ourselves to be taken again.''

''We have been somewhat of a humbug to day to allow ourselves this evening to run into those Gargolians.''Agreed Angeline.''I've known them a long time and we should have avoided them.''''

''Is that so!''Said Hettie.''How could we avoid the Gargolians when we did not know they were so close upon us. And how could we do the wonderful trick of avoiding the rebel encampment when it was upon us before we knew it!''

''Don't know''Said Angeline''But just the same it must have been humbugging among us. ''We can avoid them if we keep cool and do not get excited.''

''Very true.''Declared Joice, nodding at her sister.''It was necessary to be more careful than we had been but I don't mind telling you all that the thing was only a trick on the part of the Gargolians to decieve us and run us into the encampment.''

''But I saw the Gargolians chase us with might and main and had my eyes on them.''Exclaimed Hettie.''

''So did I.''Remarked Jennie.

''To be sure.''Answered Daisy.''You saw them because they were there on the road.''But they may be in these very woods right now and we may not know it. And the pulling of the columns of searchers apart, and pushing together of other platoon of soldiers to form an encircling movement was only a sleight -of hand trick on their part to hem us in so we will find escape impossible.''

''I see some more Glandelinians approaching us.''Said Daisy excitedly.''

The soldier felt carefully in his pocket and pulled out his gun and every one stepped behind the biggest trees again. Soon Glandelinians again appeared one by one where they were seen darting around from trees themselves with an effort to locate the victims.

''I bet they are hungry too.'' Gritted the soldier fingering the trigger.

''Oh what cunning things those wicked Glandelinians must be.''Cried Daisy, cratching up a big stone she saw with the purpose to throw it if she was assaulted.

''Be careful''Warned the soldier, in a whisper.''Your movements will reveal you tothem and you will recieve shots.''''''

''Dear me''Murmured Daisy looking at the approaching Glandelinians in utter astonishment.''The Glandelinians are searching so closely that it seems they can actually se in the dark.''

"May I pop at one of them?" Asked one of the Vivian girls in a pleading voice. "I'm awfully hungry for game."

"Why Jennie" Said Violet reproachfully while her sisters looked disturbed. "What a very cruel question. It would be dreadful to shoot at one of those Glandelinians and cause our concealment place to be discovered by the flash and report of the gun." I'll should say so." Declared another of the little girls looking uneasily at the Glandelinians who were only a score of feet away now. "Those Mangaboo Glandelinians are cruel things when aroused."

"They are not cruel." Replied the soldier also in a whisper. "They are simply fero ferocious and I would sooner meet a live tiger in the dark than one of those Mangaboos or a Gargolian."

"You can not fire at them even if you are starving with anxiety unless you have to." Declared Daisy in almost a stern voice to her sister Jennie. "These are the only kind of Glandelinians we can never get away again from if they see us."

"How do they happen to miss us when searching so closely!" Asked Angeline in wonder as the Glandelinians passed them unnoticed. "I never been in so close a peril before and yet it almost seems a joke the way they miss us."

"Why we are concealed behind trees." Said the soldier "where the darkness helps us to be concealed. They look like general Tenty weent's Glandelinians by their uniforms and yet I'd give anything to be out of these woods now."

"But the main thing I'm wanting to know is when we are ever going to get something to eat." Wailed the little girls looking pleadingly tward the open space now free of Glandelinians.

"There are no cows inthis vinicity to give us any milk, or any signs of a house or even a friendly encampment." And these few berries and and fruits are not enough."

"I have an idea that there are fishes in some of these deeper brooks if they are not frozen too deep." Said the soldier. "Do you little girls like fish very much.

"Oh Only on Friday." Cried Violet. "But anyway at such a time as no now they are better than nothing or even milk."

"Then we can try and catch some." Said He "But we must do it in the dark where none of the Glandelinians will see us."

"But won't they be too cold and increase our dosconfiture like everything else here in I including the presences of the enemies?" Asked the little girls.

"I think not." Said the soldier. "Fishes are not animals exept when whales and though they are as cold and moist as vegetables the selves we can and will have to eatthem raw or coldas we dare not make a fire to cook them or otherwise we will go to davy jones locker in a hurry. Anyway there is no reason that I can see why they may not exist in the waters despite the ice if the brooks or streams are not frozen too deep."

Then the soldier secured a number of branches, bent a pin hook large pn pin for a hook and took some long piece of string from his left pocket as a sort of fish line. The only bate he could find was some bread crumbs in his pockets but he knew fishes are easy to fool if anything bright attracts their attention so he decided to try the crumbs. Ha Having broken a hole in the ice of a near by stream he threw the end of the line o into the water but there was no such luck as catching fish as there was none, and soon he felt a sharp tug or snake on his soldier shoulder and looking up he see a strange being standing over him and realizing it was a Glandelinian he drew his pistol and struck him a heavy blow on the head and knocked him down senseless, searched him for weapons, xe secured these, and also found his kno knapsack full of grub to his joy to which he immediately brought to Violet and her sisters to their enjoyment. The knapsack was fat and round but there was no time to examine it closely for the little girls suddenly seeing rebels approaching made a jump and were behind trees in a jiffy and ina few minutes after they disappeared a group of Glandelinians were seen to be bending over the fallen rebel.

"Oh Tub, how did you secure this?" Cried violet. "Did you surprise a Glandelinian?"

"If it was a Glandelinian I did it then." Replied the soldier looking at the group from the hiding place. "But the way he dropped I hardly believe the rebel had much bone for his head because he went down and out at the slightest tap with the gun butt I gave him."

"You were very desperate to make that attempt." Said the little girls.

"I was desperate because he suddenly surprised me whi, while I was trying to fish in vain." Replied the soldier. If I had not struck him he would have had me."

The little girls stood behind thick trees watching the scene with frightened eyes for some of the Glandelinians were coming there way while others still stood about the fallen man rendering him aid and bringing him to his senses and probably demanding of him what had happened.

"Those Mangaboo Glandelinians are dreadful rebels." Said one of the little girls.

"I'm glad we are not seen by them." Said Angeline.

"Don't worry!" Violet murmured soothingly. "We just can take care the rebels don't have a chance to see us and if they do two of us have guns and now he has two other guns so we are four armed now."

Then Violet happened to remember that she had concealed about her person which the rebels whenthey captured her had not found when searching her, t o two small guns well loaded and she soon brought them to view, while she also drew out of her knapsack which the man had secured from the rebel a number of crackers and started eating ravinously. Violet and her sisters at other times would have struck up their hi noses at such plain food as the rebel had in his knapsack but being so hungry now they all ate it and the man helpled them eat it in a jiffy.

"Now let's work our way in another direction and keep out our distance from the Glandelinians." Suggested the soldier. "That is if you little girls feel you have had enough to eat. But keep the knapsack and don't throw it away. The rebels if they see if it will pick it up and have clues with which to follow us more closely by."

Violet and her 1 sisters looked tward the approaching rebels with a sigh.

"We have tried to eat a lot while we have had the chance" Said violet "For it is likely to be a very long while between meals in this God forsaken country. But as we have finished we are ready to go now at any time you wish."

So redrawing his guns and seeing that they were fully loaded the man t and the little girls started on their way from tree to tree.

"Where shall we stay if we find shelter of some kind?" Asked one of the little girls. "We can't remain out in the opentoo long or we will freeze to death and also be captured. We can't remain like this too long. The rebels are coming l closer over every minute."

"I think we shall take possession of the first house we may come upon." replied the soldier "For I have made up my mind while in the presence of the little girls like you that I would keep you with me through all perils and adventures untill we find our way to the christian lines and I'm sure the Glandelinians having passed the region where we may see a house would never know we are there and then would probably give up the search long enough to enable our escape from them."

They agreed to this plan and when they reached the next batch of trees they saw an open clearing before them.

"I don't think it is very safe to cross this clearing as we'll be seen." said violet gazing with fearful glances around the bare space in the woods. "But we could get across I guess if we crawled on our hands and knees couldn't we?"

"No we would be exposed." Said the man.

"What are those objects moving there across the snow yonder?" Enquired Jennie pointing to some strange dark forms that appeared near the edge of the clearning opposite them and which were moving forward.

"Good god they look like wolves." Gasped Violet. "Only if they are there are only ten of them and there is no was way to get to the tree tops."

Angeline happened to have a field glass with her and so she gave a good look.

"No they are Glandelinians and our unusual fright is unnecessary." She observed.

"Let us work our a way to the other side around the clearing by tree to tree and see where we can get to. We must avoid them."

With this they began working their way from tree to tree and the other little girls quickly followed. It was the same sort of experience as before though now they had a sort to of climb to make and they were nearly out of breath when they came to a thicker row of trees which they perceived to be leading into a denser section of the woods. Still going from tree to tree they discovered many small glens a opening from them but here there were no Glandelinians in sight at all.

"I wonder if these Glandelinians never see sleep." Said the little girls.

"Why to them when they search for some one there might as well be no night at all in this country." The soldier replied "And to make things worse those darn colored searchlights are still flickering through the woods occasionally and if one of them ever flash on us when our enemies are near we are as sure as dead."

"Very true at that." Agreed the little girls. "But it is a long time also since we have had any sleep and now it is nearly eleven o-clock near midnight and I for one am am tired and know you little girls being younger are more tired. So I think I shall lie down on this snow covered ground and take a nap if we do not find some shelter soon."

"I will too" Said violet sadly."

The soldier walked down to one of the nearest trees and saw in the clearning close by him a rebel officer rehurnessing his horse and felt he would like to secure that horse and some others. Then he returned to the little girls and told him h them that their condition was worse. They were surely hemmed in and no mistake at that.

CHAPTER FIFTY.....

THE GLANDELINIAN FERRETS PROVE DANGEROUS!!!!! WHEN they

WHEN they had reached the other edh edge of the cl- clearning without being discovered by the fierce Glandelinians,, they noticed that six colored searchlights were fairly tearing their beams of colors through the woods just where they themselves were and Violet and her sisters felt almost panic stricken.The soldier himself having halted however felt a little rested and refreshed but looking in the direction of the flashlights he saw a number of strange forms moving tward him and his little charges.So the soldier went behind the little girls with pistols drawn.

''Violet and your sisters''''''''said he''I'm afraid our guns are of no further jus u use in this part of the country for it would be impossible to stop so many rebels who are after us so I fear we may as we'l keep them o in our host lers/But in my pockets there are some things I would like to use in cas case of necessa ne necessary but whatever happens clo keep close to me. I wish I could however spot those Glandelinians who are carrying lantrens and the other one carrying something like a satchels here is nothing else t hat I would care about but it would be a desperate a attempt.''''''

Violet and her sisters saw that the men mentioned were very close, and that they had set down their lantrens close by the tree they were hiding behind. Carefully without being seen the little girls went willingly upon the errand and by the time the had also secured the large satchel they w came back to the man. hen whoile the rebels were in confusion over the sudden loss the fugitives held a coUnsel to decide what they should do next to effect their escape, but could think of no way whatever to better their condition..

''I don't like this sort of adventure of these Glandelinians either.''said Violet. ''In their nature they are just as cold and flabby like cabbages or vegetables in spite of their prettiness in looks.''

''I agree with you ''Said one of her sisters.''They are so wicked that they might as well have no warm blood in them.''Remarked Angeline.

''''And they are completely heartless in nature; so from wickedness and fury they can't love any one if they have n to, probably not even themselves.''Declared Catherine almost fiercely.

' The Hangaboo Glandelinians or Zimmermannians they are called are indeed at times lovely to look at from the style of hair and uniforms and features.'' Violet continued.''But they are so fierce and persistent that I don't care much for this adventure after all and wish we were back to our own lines.If there was any other place to go to get away from them, I'd for one would like to go there'.''

''But is there no other place!!!!!!''''''Asked the soldier.

''''''I do n't know.''''''she answered.

Just then they heard the voice of one of the nearest Glandelinians close by calling to his men, and from behi nd the trees they were hiding the fugitives found the leader of the searchers and the Zimmermannians themselves coming close upon them. some of the other rebels who were helping in the search came down to meet the other squadron of searchers and to gree the leader who said to them,!

''I have been talking a to my advisors about those fugitives we are after, and we have decided that they are not in these woods and that is it is best for us not to remain here any longer. We do not belong in these woods anyway for it is one of the christian tr territories and if we met a large force of Natu Nationals we would have a hotter time thanwe wanted.''

''How could mere children get away!''Asked one of the soldiers.

''Oh!they could not and cannot get away as we have the whole country scoured for them and as soon as they are located they will be destroyed for kil'ing our general.''''''was the answer.

''In what way!!''They heard another rebel soldier make inq inqu inequirty.

''We shall throw those little contemepdes and the soldier with them into a pit a quicklime alive.''Said the leader of the searchers''and that will soon devour their bodies clothing and all. If we cannot captu capture them we can at least drive them to the mountians where the little contemepdes will take refuge in a cavern called''the Black Hell Pit and barr their escape so they cannot get out. Then for once the Glandelinian cause won't be bodered and tormented and we will be able to get rid of these unwelcome christian dogs.''

''To escape these Glandelinians we will have to be much more clever than a Sorcerer.''Said the soldier to the little girls in a whisper.''And hot not one of us have the power to be one. I amable to be greater however in plans for by let them catch us and destroy us as spies.''

''I t is true we got to have some means to trick them and escape that a is all''Acknowledged Violet and her sisters together''But I was once informed that no one could be picked any where among the christian lines who could trick or decieve the Glandelinians and I believe we would not come to all this trouble if it had not been for the general general whom you cut in two before you had time to think what you were doing. Ugo Ugh it was a sight that we do not want to ysee again''Let us see your arts please and the tricks you are able to perform so we can escape from here.''

At this the soldier made a slight bow to the little girls and made his first trick of producing nine tiny strange lights which he made counter act the search lights and yet did not seem to come from him at all and then making the lights disappear again. He did it very cleverly indeed so cleverly and the Glandelinians were confused and had looked and w at and watched the strange lights as if they were more astonished than ever could by comprecended but they did not go away and only started talking excitedly about them. o Violet said;

''I g have never heard of such goof good tricks as th that one before but it accomplished nothing of value and the rebels are still close to us. What else can you do to confuse them and make them go away without seeing us ?''

For a moment the soldier tried tothink. Then he drew his sabre out of the scabbard and flourished it skillfully upon the end of his hilt and cried in a loud steontorian voice:''

''Here goes,the vivian girls yoUnder you poor boobs. Hurry after them. They are to your right. What are you asleep on your k job for.''

This loud voice startled Violet and her sisters for sthe they feared it would bring the rebels upon them but instead they all rushed in the direction he had mentioned and just at that moment the soldier noticed the lantrens and finding inside a can of oil he got a clever idea from those ook commonplace things.

''Violet and your sisters''Said he''we will not proceed on our way for I believe the rebels if they caught us now after that trick would exhibit for us a destroyer much more dreadful than a pit of Quick Lime.

So he placed the little girls in front of him some of the other little girls being upon one side of him and the remainder upon the other and carried one of the lantrens while one of the little girls carried the other Violet carrying the can.

''Don't laugh over the joke''He whispered to them as he saw a smile starting on their pretty faces''Or your loud laughter will spoil the effects of my trick and we will be prisoners sure.''

Then with much dignity and a look of vast importance upon his face he proceeded toget out his match box and light tohe two lantrens when the little girls topp st- stopped him saying that the gl-reof the lantrens of what their wicks would end make though very small in comparison to the radience of the searchlights would still gleam steadily and clearly enough to cause their being discovered and captured. Violet and her sisters were very much impressed over their adventure because the- had n everbefore seen such desper t desperate rebels or h never before seen any such colored searchlights or any light that did not come from the sun.

I n the distance the soldier saw one of the Glandelinian soldiers pouring a vast pool of snow of oil on some ground uncovered of snow where it covering quite a broad space they lighted it and a hundred score of flames tongues of flame shot up lighting the woods for nearly a hundred yards and the effect was really imposing....

''''''How Violet and h your sisters.''Exclaimedthe Angelinian soldier''Those among you who want to reveal yourselves in the glow of that big oil bonfire dis regard my advise and take your chances. If you think I advise you well as and as you know I'm in the right you will not do so and so will not cause outcapture or destruction. ut if you are foolish enough to disregard my advise the light will expose you if you run our from behind the t-e trees and we allwill be caught.''

Violet and her sisters being overexcited did not like to remain where they were but as he was a man they thought it wiser to obey him and so at his advise they slowly but surely crept from tree to tree and as they did so they saw pine and fir trees catch afire on their tops and were scorched so badly th that the air was soon filled with an oder of pine smoke and if it had not been for the still air and thick snow on the ground a forest fire would have easily been started. Soo some of the Glandelinians who had tried to stop the spread of the conflargration fell down exhausted from smoke and heat and a had to be dragged from the smoulder by their comrades and six of them were so badly scorched that t hey had to be taken back to the rebel lines at once.

'' Tub''Said Violet to the soldier''You are one of the greatest guardians we have ever had yet or ever known next to Jack Evans. And as it is evident that you do not advise me or my sisters wrongly, we will always do as you say and take your advise under any condition but just the same I fear and so do my sisters that we will be driven and hard pressed untill we will have to seek refuge into d some cavern for I or my sisters cannot hardly bare this exposure any longer, and we are tired out and almost ready to fall asleep.''

The soldier however was so pleased to have saved Violet and her sisters so far that he had said nothing to her praise but when they had gone a certain distance more and saw the rebels coming closer Jennie and Joice prot- protested that they did not want to go any further but the soldier promished to have them out o out ofthe exciting adventure in a hurry and that he would do all he could to save them from such a fate threatening them all.

or two or three hours after this they progressed onward and they seemed to be undistub d undisturbed in any way. They were even permitted to go into open ground in place without any further adventure from the Glandelinians for a while without being seen and townder elsewhere in search of lodging places for rest and sleep.

Once again they came near to another large opening in the forest and walking along its edge they looked across it with much interest with half closed eyes. They saw a mass of tough green vines all matted together and writhing and twisting around like a nest of great snakes in the breeze now blowing. Everything the vines had come into contact they had enwrapped and at first our adventurous adventurers had a mind to seek rest among them having been thankful to have escaped the glandelinians so far but nevertheless they soon found they were still pursued. finally they did succeed in coming to a small cabin which was unoccupied and here they took a good sleep without being disturbed and it was high time they did for a fearful snowstorm broke loose and raged fiercely with a high wind. However when the children went to sleep the soldier who was a light sleeper took the guns to his own care and laid them down beside him and it was only untill late at day when they first awoke, but the moment they had awakened they were surprised and horrified to see the door burst open and before they could count one they saw the room filled with the silent solemn eyes Mangaboo glandelininns. Each of the glandelininns carried rifles with fixed bayonets which was thrust defiantly toward the ale fugitives.

But they were not going to allow themselves to be captured.

They managed to shoot down two rebels and create confusion in which they leaped leaped out of the two windows nearest them and then scattered through the woods. They had known the glandelininns by this time and so they commenced to run for dear life, and as soon as a number of Mangaboos came out of the doorway shouting and yelling and cursing the soldier and two of the little girls fired rapidly and brought down a man every time untill their guns were empty and then raced for the woods.

The soldier who had never slept tightly all night watched the little girls go into the woods and fired several more shots from another revolver to cover their retreat and then was soon beside them and gave them much approval for their good behavior.

"Don't you little girls be reckless now though." He called out to them as he saw a swarm coming after them as he shot down another rebel, but the little girls now once aroused did not seem to mind and enjoyed the sport very greatly, and having loaded the pistols they had now with them they brought down a score of rebels and checked them somewhat, and what a yelling went up from them as they had not expected such a reception from mere childrenand were amazed and afraid.

"Here little girl" Stop thin foolishness" Tub roared warningly and almost angrily as violet was about todo something that looked reckless, and as the rebels now returned the fire bullets whistled close about them but they stood behind trees and were not hit. They now realized if they remained where they were the glandelininns would be unable to surround them in solid ranks, so seeing a good way through the thickest part of the woods the little girls and their guide slowly retreated from tree to tree keeping up their fire incessantly and continued to retreat untill they were driven by their pursuers from the thickest part of the woods and out into a large clearing. Here were more of the Mangaboo glandelininns coming with fixed bayonets and silently now they urged themselves fo forward with the purpose to intercept the fugitives. Violet now had to be careful not to expose her self and warned her sisters who scampered through a maze of thick trees leaving the clearing in a hurry while the soldier tried to cover their retreat and yet protect the pretty little girls from injury from the sharp thorns of briar bushes growing in the woods. Slowly but at steadily the heartless Mangaboo glandelininns drove on after the fugitives untill they had now passed most of the woods and come to a broad plain leading to a long line of foot hills.

"What does this mean anyhow!" Asked violet jumping behind a tree to escape the enemys bullets for the rebels were firing again more heavily than ever.

"Why the glandelininns are bound to capture us, so we will have to seek refuge somewhere in a cavern into which we will have to defend ourselves fiercely." Replied the soldier. "If all of you little girls had as many weapons as is badly needed we could be able to fight those devil turnip roots to a finish and stop their pursuit. Hear how they are yelling now. They are demanding us to stop."

"What could we do!" Again enquired violet. Only three of us are armed.

"Why we could shoot like sixty and then we could check them by creating fearful fearful losses."

"But we can do something withwhat we have." Said violet. Three of us could shoot incessantly and with good aim."

"All right" Said the soldier. "We'll do it."

An instant later two of the little girls and the soldier backed to other trees got behind and fired away as fast as they could shoot and reload and shoot again and soon a dozen of the rebels killed or wounded tumbled to the ground amid yells of confusion and rage and fearful blasphemies from the surviving zimmerrmnians, and seeing their success, The two girls and the soldier fired again and again, pouring shot after shot into the crowd of confused glandelininns shooting them down seemingly in all portions and soon sending the others scatteringto escape the iron hail of bullets. The other little girls helped by throwing large stones or hard snowballs squarely into the faces of the glandelinian soldiers which knocked many down and the fugitives ruined and killed or wounded so many pursuers by that withering fire that the rebels feared their fugitives as much as they did an ambush.

But the Mangaboo glandelinians foes were too many to be repulsed too long and worse of all they were in danger of exhausiting their ammunition and so the fugitives had to desist. The rebels even tired the little girls out who threw stones or hard snowballs and although this field of small battle was thickly covered with dead and wounded, and scratched and bruised glandelinians the fugitives had to give up at last and resume their flight once more. but nearly a hundred of the rebels showed the results of the stones and hard snowballs, some having bloody noses, black eyes, or marks and bruises on their faces.

When the fugitives came to the foot hills they proved to be a line of rugged towering upheaval of deep monstrous mounds of earth and rocks, and lookde o looked most dismal and forbidding in the extreme indeed. Half way upthe steep hill before the fugitives was a large yawning cavern black as night beyond the poi t where the rays of the sun reached into it at daytime.

The glandelinians known asMangaboos continued on after the fugitives who to escape them dived willfully into this dark hole and then having ordered the little girls in ahead of him--for it seemed at first as if they were afraid to proceeded proceed into it, the soldier fired into the crowd of glandelinians from behind a pile of rocks and then began to pile big rocks within the entrance to a certain height so that the glandelinians could not get into the cavern soon enough to pursue them.

"This is dreadful." Groaned thesoldier as examining the last round of ammunition he and the three little girls had. "It will be about the end of our adventure I guess if we don't beat them off some way or frustrate themalook how wild and fierce our assailants look despite their girlish faces."

"If any more of the Angelinians was only here" Said one of the little girls, sobbing bitterly despite her bravery "They would not see us suffer so."

"We ought to have called to some of the other soldiers when we first went off with you Tub." Added violet. "but never mind dear sisters be brave. I and my other sisters and Tub will have a chance and if only one of us could get away we could go to the lines and tell the Angelinians where we are you are and get them to come to your rescue. My goodness see how our persuers have halted and are viri firing at us. Duck everybody."

However the mouth of the cavern was nearly filled up now but some of the glandelinians had reached the opening and one of them getting in gave a leap through the remaining opening and at once rushed for violet and her sisters but the soldier immediately shot him down where he was.....The other Mangaboos saw the tragedy tragedy, and several of those near the opening, byware force of fury presented their bayonets and after a hard fight withthe single soldier force their way into the cavern. At this the fugitives all retreated to the further end and the rebels catching up their guns where they had dropped them gave chase, but the foremost of them receive bullets and dropped though the others rushed through the cavern after the fugitives. The soldier however was a powerful man and though the rebels could only go a few steps a moment on account of almost unsecure footing inside the cavern the soldier found he was able to go faster, and covering the retreat of violet and her sisters he drew his sabre and started a fierce fight with the nearest rebels and sabred three of them before they realised what had happened. Taking advantage of is his desperate stand thep pretty little girls ran along over the rocks in the darnkss darkness untill she had left them far behind she and her sisters had left them far behind and had come to another large cavern. This they entered and in their hurry came across some snakes which the little girls aroused from their sleep.

As soon as the little girls were rejoined by the Angelinian guide, they all made preparations to go to the rescue of the other little girls who had not been able to catch up with h their sisters but immediately they appeared having also outdistanced the glandelinians. The soldier still carried the satchel strapped to his back, and two of the little girls still had the two lantrens which had been recently ceaped from the glandelinians. nother little girl carried the captured dilaamthe suitcase he had was made of wicker and an and by good fortune they had in their flight not lose a lost any of these set articles. So there was nothing for the rest of the little girls to carry but either the guns or the lantrens, the guns of which those in possession held tightly in their hands and also tried to comfort each other though their little hearts were still beating rapidly and could be distinctly heard in the cavern.

Some of the Mangaboo glandelinians who had persued them some di distance into the cavern discovered the fugiti ves into in the other smaller cavern as soon as they had retired to the other side of it, but when they had started toward another opening still the glandelinians halted and allowed them to proceed without further interference, yet followed closely in a crowd behind them with the purpose of pressing them in deeper so that the fugitives could not get out again.

Before long the fugitives nearest the blackest pit of all, where the busy swarm of glandelinians, headed by three lieutenants was engaged in making an attempt to intercept the fugitives but none of the glandelinians opened fire though at this ver very moment the fugitives were dangerously espo exposed to them.

"Stop you spies I command you." Cried the leading lieutenant in an angry tone to the fugitives, and then he gave an order and at once the soldiers began moving in all parts of the cavern like a ring thinking to head in the fubvfugitives who they believed were afraid to go into the dark pit beyond.

Instead of obeying the comm n command however the little girls and the soldier huddled back tward the dark opening, and suddenly by order of the lieutenants the rebels all sprang forward with a yell and thrust out their sharp bayonets but too late. Violet and her sisters hopped inside the opening to escape being pricked,, and the soldier fought withhis sabre to cover their retreat again and after enduring a few light stabs from the bayonets were glad to follow the little goils. At once the landelinians began fairly piling in upon the fugitives but the soldier and the three little girls fired and fired untill the cavern roared as if there was a thousand dragons in them, and so panic stricken from the din and slaughter werethe surviving rebels that they fled a distance back from the entrance of the pit and then the fugitives were gone far into the interior where the rebels being appalled dared not follow any further as to be fired upon in the dark was a most appalling circumstance and they did not wish it. When the soldier finally began to realize that they were no doubt lost now in the interior of a labyrinthian ca vern as it appeared to be he said to the beautiful children sadly;

''My dears little girls what shall we do now?''Jump out and fight our way out again!''

''What's the use!''Replied Angeline.''I'd as soon as die here as live much longer and be hounded by those cruel and heartless Glandelinians. And so would my sisters...''''

''That's the way I fell about it.''Said the other little girls'' rubbing her their wounds.''We have hadenough of the Zouavemannians.''

''All right''Said the soldier still sadly''I'm with you to a finish whatever you decide. But you little girls kno we can 't live long inthis dismal cavern, that's certain.''''''

Noticing the light from the last candle t they had was almost gowing out, the soldier patted each little girls lovingly on their fair little heads, and stood them closely in a small line like a line of faries. Then he struck a match and lighten lighted wone one of the lantrens. The rays of the colored searchlights was now shut out from them.

''I wonder how big is this hole any way!''Asked Violet when the excitement had died down.

''I'll exexplore it and see.''Said Jennie.

So she carried the lantren for quite a distance, while her sisters and the soldier slowly and carefully followed her. The black entrance or tunnel whatever it was did not however come to any end as they had expected it would, but seemed to slat upward through the hill or mountian running in a direction that promished to lead them to the side opposute the Mangaboo rebel positions.

''It is not a bad road for inside a cavern of this sort.''Observed the soldier Tub'' n And if we followed it through to the end it may sure lead us to some place that is more comfortable than this black pocket we are now in. I suppose the rebels are afraid to enter further into this cavern as well as they know we are good shots, but we are fortunate to have lantrens to light the way, so I pro propose that we start out and discover where this och confounded tunnel in the cavern under the mountian leads us to.''

The little girls agreed readily to this see sensible suggesstion and so the soldier sta started cautiously along the way, the soldier always leading while Violet and her sister s followed Jennie holding the lighted lantren so they all could see where to go.''

Sometimes the tunnel way was so terribly narrow that they fairly had to squeeze their way through, then it would broaden out twice wider than the widest street but the floor all the way was unusually smooth for an underground cavern, and for a long time they traveled without any accident. Soon looking back they were horrisd to see lights, and realized without doubt the landelinians were slowly following them having made flagots or torches. The fugitives therefore did not dare stop to rest even though the climbwas rather steep and tiresome, and the soldier and three of the little girls had to draw their guns to prepare for more fighting. Each had only a round of cartridges left at that and were short.

''We must be nearly as high as to the top of the hill by this time I'm sure.''Said Jennie.''I did not know this hill was so tall. And the rebels are gaining on us.''

''Nevertheless we are certainly a good distance away from t hem.'' Added Catherine.''For we have gained a good deal on them sin e we se started.If they press too close we can give them some more sho ts.''

But they however kept steadily moving and just as they were all about tired out withtheir long journey, the way suddenly gorew lighter, and the two little girls put outthe latrens latrens to save the oil. To their uttermost joy they found it was a white light that now greeted them for all were weary of the night and of the st strange rainbow lights of the searchlights, which after a time that night had made their little eyes ache with their cinstantly shifting rays. The sides of the great tunnel showed before them indeed like the inside of some great telescope or spy glass, and the floor became more level. The fugitives therefore hastened their lagging steps at this assurance ofa quick relief from the long dark passage, and in a few moments more they had emerged from the mountian and found themselves face to face with the outw outside country once more and with the su sun just starting to rise through a rift ofelu clouds. By journeying through the mountian day and night eithout knowing it they had reached a delightful valley that was sh ped long the hollow of a great volcanic crater but of many miles in width with woods and rugged ranges of higher mountians showing on the opposite side of it and soft and pretty tree covered hills at the ends.

They could see from its formation that it was snow covered but had been laid out once into lovely lawns and many gardens and meadows, with snow covered pebble paths and roads leading through them in sizas formation and groves of most beautiful tall stately trees all pine or hemlock dotted the landscar landscape here and there. There were hundreds of great orchards too, which in summertime bore lus luscious fruits such as cherries and apples, and other kinds. Alluring rivers or large brooks now frozn frozen over in summer always spra sparkled between their flower strewn banks, while a scattered over the valley indeed were dozens or hundreds of the most quaint and pictureq pictureq picturesque cottagges and houses out travelers travelers or adventures he had ever beheld in their lives. Some of them were in large clusers but others were far apart and had ample grounds of their own, which were seen large orchards and gardens or meadows surround t surroundingthem. As the fugitives gazed upon this exquisite snow covered region they were enraptured by its snow beauties, and such pure air that permeated the atmpo atmosphers, which they breathed so deeply and gratefully after the confined atmosphere of the caverns.

Several minutes were consumed in silent admiration before they noticed two very singular and unusual facts about this vapo valley. One was that the sun lighted it up with a strange dazzling brilliancy and the arched blue sky was more bluer than usual and every object was flooded with a clear and perfect light. This appeared like this to them because they had been in the dark for fourty eight hours. The second and even more singular fact wasthe absence of any inhibatants of this splendid place. From their elevated position they could overlook the entire valley, but not a single moving object could they see though far away seemingly fifty miles south was a seemingly endless extending encampment of white tents and barrack houses with rebel flags floating above them. Else elsewhere all appeared mysteriously deserted. The mountian on this side was made of a stone similar to granite. With some difficulty and danger they clambered down over the loose ro k rocks and stones untill they soon after climbing downward for two hours reached the green lawns below where thepaths and pr orchards and gardens now snow covered began. Yet y and yet the persuers did not appear from the cavern. The nearest cottage was still half a mile away.

''Is not the snowscene fine.''Cried the little girls in a joyious voice as she sprang over a frozen ditch and her sisters frolicked over the snow drifts.

''Yes indeed ''Answered the soldier.''ng we were lucky to get so far away, beyondfardistant from those dreadful Mangaboo Glandelinians.''

''It would not be so bad.''Remarked one of the little girls gazing around her''If we could be obliged to live in this part of Calverinia always and enjoy the winter and summer scenes.We could not find a prettier place I'm sure, and I hope the fury of battle or war will never mar it.''

The soldier took the little girls closer to him and declared after he had ate some berries winter berries that he was very contented in his new surrounding.

''We can't escape the enemys fire here though as we are as exposed.''Called Daisy, but nevertheless the others were satisfied to walk along the snow banks or through the beautiful orchards, and the soldier said they must be nearer the christian lines and further from the rebel lines, for everything here was more homelike and natural though how far they were from the region of Viri Vivian Wiekoy they could not estimate.

''But where are all the people of this region!''Asked Angeline.

The soldier shook his head and so did her sisters.

''Can't imagine''He replied. They heard the sudden twittering of a birf bird, but did not look quick enough and so could not find the small creature anywhere. Slowly they walked along the path seeingno rebels following them, and headed tw tward the nearest building or cottage, the little girls racing and gamballing beside him and pausing at every step to pick up snow and make snowballs to throw at one another.

Presently they came to a higher snowdriftfrom which stood near by a low tree which had broad spreading branches with green needle like leaves, in the center of which grew a maze of such leaves thick together. The needle like leaves were so faintly colored and so fragrant like a christmas tree and looked so beautiful in app appearance and the fragrant t so delicious that violet and her sisters stopped and exclaimed exclaimed;

''What kind of a tree is it do you suppose t Tub.''

The soldier had also smelled the tree quickly and before the little girls could reach outto pluck any of the strange leaves the soldier had rushed in among them stopped their attempt and said;

''Get back behind some snowdrift. The Glandelinians are coming.''

''I tho Thought it would be so.''Said Violet''Those Landelinians knew the way through the cavern all right or those Mangaboo rascals would not have persued us and followed us so cleverly and persistently.''

''Where are they!''Asked the other little girls in astonishment as when they looked they saw no enemies insight whatever.

They all looked around but the landelinians who had been seen descending the hill from the mouth of the cavern had disappeared.

''Dear me.''Cried the soldier.''they must have gone down into a gully. But I did not see them go, did you?!''''

''No''Replied all the little girls together.

"Here little girls be careful what you do." Called ther guide anxiously. "The rebels may be moving tward us and yet keep themselves hidden so they can spring upon us."

Several strange noises were instantly heard in the distance like the distant pn ping of shots and then they heard the scream of bullets, but the little girls or the soldier could not discover a single Clandelinian soldier.

"Where in the world are they?" He asked.

"Why I saw a hand of a man beside that furtherst rock." Spoke the so sweet voice of Jennie Vivi n Vivian. "Can't you see him.?" I can."

"No." Answered the soldier and her sisters all at once in a puzzled tone.

"But if we can't see them they can see us." Said another of the little girls. "That is the reason they are sniping us. It's lucky this snow bn bank is high enough."

The soldier now stooped stooped down and put out his hand to pick the gun up which had dropped out of his inside pocket. He picked it up, looked it over carefully and finding every chamber loaded waited for some target to show itself but he could not see anything and yet more shots.

"It is very strange and mysterious" He said soberly. "The Clandelinians are probably approaching us slowly and yet hiding themselves in some very curious way."

"I'll bet it is white uniformed Gargolians following us." Cried Violet.

"I don't think they are white uniformed Gargolians." Said Angeline. "I only hope not anyway."

"There goes my bonnet or hat Violet." Called one of her sisters. "A bullet took it off."

"We will have to be careful as we retreat." Said another of the little girls. "Unseen enemies are worse than those we can see."

"But we must not let them see us as we go for it." The soldier warned the pretty Vivian children "Or we may all be shot down by the hidden foes and all will be lost if we are woundedand then caught. Those rebels are hiding themselves so cleverly as they come after us that they might as well be invisible. If we come across a shelter we must take advantage of it."

So calling the little girls to him he put his gun in his pocket and when he had buttoned his coat he knew the gun was safe there. The travelers now resumed their journey tward the nearest house keeping themselves concealed as much as possible from their unseen enemies and presently reached a beautiful house. It indeed was a pretty place with vines growing thickly over the broad front porch with now it being winter they were leafless. The door was closed but the window curtain was not drawn and in looking through the glass they could see a table all set in the front room with six chairs drawn up to it. On the table were as many plates, and knives and forks, and dishes of bread, meat, and fruits. The meat was smoking hot chicken. Suddenly there was a sudden dull roar at some distance and the ground trembled shaking the house so that the knives, forks and plates performed for five seconds the most strange anticks jumping here and there in quite a puzzled way but stopped with the abatement of the shock.

As they knocked they heard some one say "Come in" and obeyed.

"How funny." Exclaimed Violet who with her sisters and the soldier now stood in the open doorway. "How funny the dishes and forks and knives acted when the shock came from the distant explosion."

A peal of merry laughteranswered her, and those eating at the table let their knives and forks fall into the plates with a clatter. One of the chairs was pushed back from the table and the occupants in the room gazed at Violet and her sisters in admiration with a look so astonishing, and mysterious that Violet and her sisters were almost tempted to run awny in fright.

"Here are some bea very beautiful girls strangers mama." Call called the shrill and childish voice of a little girl.

"So I see my dear." Answered another voice so and womaninly from another room.

At this moment there came from an opposite room a tall handsome looking man of middle age and he de a demaded in a stern gruff ascent.

"What do you strangers want and who in the world are you pretty little girls."

The woman then appearing suddenly said;

"Well well are these really the Vivian girls in our dining room. what a blessing we recieved to see them."

"Of course they are the beautiful Vivian girls." Replied the man suddenly staring at them. "And pardon me for this foolish question." But are you children and your soldier companion fugitives?"

"Surely" The little girls answered "And are you so surprised that you have for the first time in your lives seen us the daughters of general RobeRobert Vivian?"

"Why yes." Stammered the man feeling too full of admiration and awe even to move a hand or foot. "All the children I have ever met before or may beautiful women-are very plain to see compared to you little girls."

"Where did the eight of you people of Angelinia come from than if you are fugitives.?" "Asked the woman in a curious tone.

"We belonged to a girl scout regiment which we are commanding in general Hansons lines." Explained Violet. "But recently during the time we wanted to go to his headquarters we fell in white sparty of Gargolians, and escaping them land manded into a large encampment of the Zimmermannian Mangabo Clandelinians from which we escaped just now."

"Dreadful creatures those Clandelinians are." Exclaimed the woman looking almost bewildered. "I've heard of them though we never saw a Clandelinian yet. Are there any headed this way or at least your persuers."

"I'm afraid so." Answered Jennie. "We were persued into a cavern and though we tried to wall up the entrun e entrance to prevent further persuit we failed to stop them" Continued Jennie "But when hard pressed we found there was a long tunnel h through tothis side so we came here persued by unseen foes. This is a beautiful part of the country. What do you call it."?

"It is the northern region of the great Mic-Hollester Run River."

"Thank you. We have seen no people since we arived here so we came to this house to inquire our easiest way to the christian lines if you happen to know."

"Are you fugitives hungry.?" Asked the woman feeling to emotionly that she could cry as she realized the plight of so beautiful a little group of girls.

"We could eat something but don't wish to impose." Said Violet.

"So could I" Added the soldier and her sistrs sisters.

"But we surely do not wish to intrude I can assure you." Violet hastened to say.

"That's all right" Returned the man more pleasantly than before. "You are welcome to what ever we have."

As he spoke there was a distant rumble which again shook the house with a great sway and the children jumped back in alarm. The two children of the man and woman woman in the room laughed merrily at this action and Violet and her sisters felt sure the folks did not realize what they were laughing at, but were sure nevertheless they themselves were in no danger among such light hearted folks, even if these folks were Calverin Calverinians.

"What curious animal is that moving tward us over the snow in the far distance." Inquired the man looking out the window.

"That's a Gargolian." Said one of the little girls "He's got one of those horrible disguises which ga gives those Ku Klux Klans of the Clandelinians such a horrid name."

"What is he snoop snooping this way for any way!" "Was the next question.

"He is drawning his followers forward which you can now see behind him and we had' batter hid so hide somewhere in this house before they come up here." She replied.

"Can those Gargolians fight like the rest of the fierce Clandelinians." Asked the man again.

"They certainly can and they can more than fight, they are terrible." She again replied.

"Then I'll have to get my gun and you childs children had better hide in the cellar." Said the man while the two children looked frightened.

"There are three hundred of those horrid Clandelinians coming." Exclaimed Violet. "Are there any secure refuge here for you as well as for any one else here?"

"This is thevone evil of our whole Calverinain country." Answered the soldier himself. "Many large and fierce columns of Gargolian troopers or footmen roam any point where thewar is raging and when they can catch any children at least they will haul them off into slavery or to death, but as they could not catch us we escaped them and got here. These Gargolians must have trailed us to this house as we no doubt left footprints in the snow."

"Are the Clandelinians closing in on us too?" Asked one of the little girls.

"Yes for they are bound to get us." Said Angeline "And Violet you know as well as I or my sisters do that nothing but the approach of an immense force of christians can keep the Gargolians from their purpose."

"Does the Gargolians always wear such horried loking hoods?" Asked the man looking anxk anciously out of the window.

"Yes was the reply.

"If you are so afraid of them why do you remain in this room then?" Angeline enquired.

"For tow reasons my dear little Angelinian girl" She mans answerged.

"I have a gun here than can stop a the approach of any number of Clandelinian Clandelinians and as the walls of the houses are toostrong for bullets to penetrate we could lie down below the window sill and if you little girls are not armed I can supply you with guns in a jiffy and ammunition and we could make a brave stand and only seek shelter when hard pressed. In a deep cellar under the house the Clandelinians could not find us in casethey got inside the house. But now good wanderers, your luncheion is on the table so please sit down and eat a as much as you liks before we begin the battle. The Clandelinians are too far off yet and they may by the mercy of god and His Blessed mother not trouble us."

The strangers feeling however nervious and excited nevertheless took their seat at the table willingly enough, for they were all terribly hungry, and the platters were now heaped with good things to eat. In front of each place was a plate bearing bearing a delicious looking fruit and the perfume that arose from this fruit was so sweet and intiging that they were sorely tempted to eat them before the other food but nevertheless mortified themselves and did not eat it yet. Violet and her sisters satisfied their hunger with other things and her companikns did otherwise, resisting the temptation untill they felt sure of eating something else.

"Why do you not eat of the fruit?" Asked the mother of the two children.

"We never eat sweet things untill we finished with others first." Answered Catherine.

''If we don't hurry the glandelinians will come too near to resist them.'' said the gir girlish young voice of one of the other vivian girls.''We are th the vivian girls and prefer to make a flight anyhow instead of res resisting them as they may be too many and we may not escape quick enough before they overpower us. And if they do we will be hugging and kissing each other a sad goodbye, and we wish very much to be quite safe from those G Gargolies just now.''

''And we do not have to be so peculiar about your dress or where we go as long as we can get away from them.''Remarked Joice vivian.

''And if our faces were a little more dirty than usual maybe the rebels would think we were naughty Calverinian children we be worse to us.''Added Jennie almost gleefully.

''And maybe the Gargoliand would make you wash it in a way you would not want it washed.''said violet''for it stands to reason that they don't care how a child looks as long as they wish to do it harm, whether i she or he is a escaped child slave or a fugiti - fugitive or a extora extraordinay child or not.''

The woman laughed now and stretched out her hands.

''Come here please litle girls and let me feel of you!''''''.he requested sadly. They came to her willingly, and the woman passed her h ands over thir faces a and forms and decided that each one was about the same age of her own daughter. The hair of each little girl was soft and even golden brown and fluffy and their skin as smooth as saten ksatin. When the woman gently touched their noses and ears in and lips they seemed to be well and most delicately formed.

''ou are the most beautiful children I have ever seen and the most wonderful as well as beautiful.''she declared.

violet and her sisters then laughed and violet said;;;;;

''We are not vain, because we are beautiful nor do be care to dis play our beauty as vanity people do and good actions and pleasant ways are what makes us so lovely to so many millions of our companions. Yet we can also see and appreciate the beauties of nature, the dainty flowers of our Calverinian summers, and the beautiful snow of winter, and the beauty of the trees, the green or snow covered fields, and the clear blue sky.''

''ow about all the birds, and animals and fishes of Calverinia!''Asked the soldier.

''Most of all the beautiful birds we cannot see, because they are gone away on account of the noise of so much firing and yet we have never heard their sweet songs or enjoyed them as we wish to enjoy them a on account of the wicked glandelinians. Neither can we see any of the cruel animals called Wolves or bears for they also are scared away by the noise of so much firing of guns and the approach of so man fighting foes of both sides. but I believe the fishes that swim in our brooks and rivers we can see in the summer time and we can often catch them to eat.''

''It occurs to me you little girls have a good deal to make you happy in spite of misfortunes trials and adventures even while persued by foes.''Remarked the woman wonderingly. ''Nevertheless as the Gargolians seemed to have gone away and did not approach the house we prefer to remain where we are. they never molested them and they dare not molest us.

''ust then three of the other vivian girls who had remained behind to scout a little to see how clear their way of retreat was just came in and when the three little girls saw the food set table set with food they cried out as they sat saw their sisters eating/;

''Now you must give us something too sisters for we are half starved..''''''

The two children of the house were inclined to be almost frightened by the sight of the three still prettier strangers, which reminded them of celestial children whomthey really feared having seen them once, but violet e reassured them by explaining that the three were her other sisters and were too good and gentle to do harm to friends even if they wished to. hen as the others had by this time movedaway from the table, a small kitten of the family sprang upon the chair without ceremoney and put her paws upon the cloth to see what was there to eat. violet immediately clutched her and held her suspended at into the air. The kitten was frantic with terri terror indeed and tried to scratch and bite so the next moment she was dropped to the floor.

''did you see that cat Jennie''she gasped. ''Trying to get on the table before the rest of us have had anything to eat.''

''Yes Jennie ''Her sister re plied''And the cat must habe have better manners or something will h ppen to her she will not like.'' violet placed a plate f of food upon the floor and the small kitten ate greedily.

''Give me some of that good fruit on the table.''Jennie begged, and violet sat the plate down.

''Those are Damas good fruit indeed ''Said violet.''I or my sisters have not even tasted of them yet as we forgot them in our excitement about the approach of the Gargolians. Now we can't see them at a, all,, hall fall, tall .''

Violet and her sisters gazed wistfully at the fruit and they recieved about three apiece from the two children themselves who were both a girl and a boy poy.

''Does it hur hurt to be persued!''the little girl asked of Violet.

''I don't know.''Answered Violet''But it would hurt us dreadfully if any one of us was killed by the rebel bullets which they shoot from their long g n guns.''''''

''Very well''Said the man; if''If the rebels are coming in this region I surely wont remain here long with my wife and children.That explains it then whenany one aint' around. We are the only ones still in the valley. We will have to get away as soon as possible for I know pretty children in the presence of wicked glandelinians are very tempting.''''

''Can you tell us sir or ma-am.''Said the soldier himself addressing them both because he did not know quite which one may know''If there is any wat way we can get out of this beautiful valley and find our way to gener l general Hanson vivians christian army again or at least to some other.''!''

''Oh one can leave the valley easily enough.''Answered the man'' but to do you you must enter a far less pleacant region. As for reaching tthe christian lines I have never heard that it was ever possible to do that in this region, and if you succeeded in getting there it would be only through the guiding hand Hand of God or His Blessed Mother.''

''Oh know''Said violet''We've been near or in the christian lines, and we know.''

''This valley is certainly a most charming place I have ever come upon''Resumed the soldier''But we cannot be contented with any other land, than among the christian lines when we are hard pressed by rebels who are hunting for us. Even if we should come to ve very unpleasant placesto our way home it is very necessary in order to reach the christian lines to keep o moving on teard it at any cost.''

''In that case''Said the man''It will be best for you t to cross our valley but do not mount that big ridge of hills yo see in the distance or even go near it. The top of some of those mountians or hills seem lost in the clouds but that is only smoke and do you not hear the rem rumbling of parks of artillery. It is the awful positions of the glandelinian artillery batteries and encampments. You are twenty seven miles from Murandcallic itself and when you go in that direction you will if you heed not my warning find yourself in the awful encampments of the glandelinians under general john Manley and Inau Naught, and part of his army are all Mic-Hollestinians the fiercest rebels ever known. here cavarly are the Gargolies or Kub Klux Klanns of the glandelinians Look out for them!''I

''What are Gargolies did you say!''Asked the soldier.

''I do not know for real young sir.I read in a paper once in which there was a report written by general Hanson vivian in which he stated that his battalions of infantry under generals champion Onna, and Amier a and Overmann fought desperately against the charges of Gargolians for nine successive days with the fierce Gargolies before the column of infant infantry surrounded by them could escape them and come or retreat to the main christian line, but he never described the custom of disguise these dreadful r cruel glandelinians wear on their heads, and soon afterwards I read of a christian cavarly force that was annihilated by them.''

The wanderers were indeed rather discouraged by this gloomy report but violet he herself said with a sigh with her hand on her heart;

''If the only way to get to the christian lines is to meet this rebel encampment and o probably the Ku Klux Klans of the glandelinians then we have either got to get around the camp some way or either meet them by some clever ruse. They can't be worse I'm sure than the i wicked Zimmermannians or Mic-Hollestinians or the Omarians.''

''But you must remeb remember you had horses then to help you get away from them.''Suggested the soldier. ''Just now my little dears we have not one horse among us with which to ride. And we only have one soldier like me to defend you against your enemies and what is one against a horde of insurgents.?''

''Oh I guess wecould all fight if we had to. Couldn't you help us!'' Asked the little girl.

''Surely surely I would.''Answered the soldier.

''And you have the strong sword that you whopped the rebel officer in two with'' another of the little girls said to him.''True ''He replied and I have two good pistol s w which are useful things tofight with in case of necessity..''

''What the glandelinians known as Gargolies or Gargoyliss dread is the accurate shots of good short sharpshooters.''Said the man.''I n his reports Hanson had declared that when the surrounded divisions opened their dreadful fire of musketry and cannons and mowe mowed down thousands at every volley the survivors had shuddered and drew back hesitating to continue the combat a had only did so when ordered forward by their generals. But nevertheless they were in the greatest numbers and on horsebackalso and the troops thussurrounded could not dotoo much firing because they had to save their ammunition for necessary circumstances and had to save their very breath an and bayonets for hand to hand fighting which was frequent ly.''

''Very Good ''Said the soldier''I know the little girls can yell as good as fight so if we are persued we ought to be able to defeat the Gargoyliss or at least scape the horried glandelinians.''

''But tell me''Said violet gravely''how did such a brave division of Angelinian troops get surrounded..and And if they were surrounded, and the rebels overwhe ev overwhelming who knows that the Angelininns really and escapedthem!''

T'e Angelininns who fought and held their ground had killed eleven thousand landelinians in two days time.''Returned the man''And we know this is true because when any one saw the soldiers themselves with their own eyes, they saw it a fact that the members of that surrounded division ad escaped the surrounding Ku Klux Klans. hen the Angelininns repelled charge after charge everyone could no doubt see the great effect of their rifle and ano cannon fire, and whenthe Gargoylies were compelled to retreat and abandon their attacks the officers declared in their reports that they could see several fields of dead and wounded men and horses which of course proves general Hansons report at true to the finish.''''''

They now bade farewell to the kind Calverinian people of the beaut iful cottage and after the man andwoman had called their attent ion to a high range of foot hills on the opposite side of the valley and told them how to travel in order to avoid them and the enemy positions below it, they again started upon the their journey.They soon reached the great Mic-Hollester un River which they knew flowed westward and followed the course of this big and mighty stream so wide at parts you cannot see across it and passed several more pretty cottages and a village fully abano abandoned for they saw no one, nor was there any one around to speak to them. here were signs however that in summer here fruits and flowers grew plentifully allabout, and that there many peach orchards which all people are so fond of.

About noon they stopped to r s rest in a small abandoned cottage and while they ate some of the cherries and plums and other things they had brought alone from the other cotf cottage violet suddenly said;

''here are landelinians near by. And they are Mic-Hollestinians. hey are infang infantry soldiers. Be careful that they do not see us leave the house as we go.''

The soldier got out his sword at once if you please to mention, and the little girls all now being armed grabbed their guns. iolet climbed to the highest window and looked out and saw the landelinians close by.Then violet said;

''We cannot escape the landelinians by going in an easterly direction.''

How can we escape?''Asked Jennie nervicously for an unseen danger is always the hardest thing inthe world to face.

''We will have to take to the river.''was the reply.''he landelinians will not dare venture in the cold water I'm sure.''

''But we would be drowned if we c got struck by the heavy current of the river in the widest part .''Exclaimed the little girls.

''Oh there is no need of that''said violet.''We are not so strange to all adventures as that and we know many ways to make it wit out swimmig swimming in that broad river. here is a larfe boat near the waters edge the only one big enough to hold twenty people and by it we can save ourselves if we reach it ahead of the rebels.''

The next moment the soldier drew from his sta sat chel a small bottle with a picture of a broad leafed plant on the label and he held it suspended into the air before violet and her sisters.

''Little girls''He said''Those rebels who are real Mic-Hollestinians usually us use posion bullets w en they fire at fugitives and we will have to make a dash for the river. In our dash some ofus are liable to be hit so in case any of you do including myself just rub theconge contents of this bottle on the wound and then you will be able to prevent the posion from ta ing effect. It's a secret a few people know about and we surely don't want to die miser mix miserably from the effects of dumdum bullets. nd we must escape out our enemies.''''''

''Thank you cried the little girls, almost joyfully, and the soldier at once restored the bu bottle to his poc et. hey all had take a piece of cloth and with the contents of the bottle rubbed it upon the exposed parts of ther bodies. hey had nearly finished examining the contents of the bottle when a loud shout was heard there was a noise of running horses or galloping horses and a loud pounding on the door.

''Quick out the rear way nd and to the water of the river or we are lost'' Gi Cried the soldier and without hesitation they all left by the back way of the house and ran tward the boat on the side of the broad s river and soon the man had helped three of the little girls into the boat. he enemy seeing the performance opened fre but owing to th virtues of the Good god the bullets missed the fugitives though one struck the boat, but nevertheless it did not sink at all and then looking back he sa saw the remainder of the little girls had tarried behind on account of Jennie having tripped and fallen and he at first was almost paralized with horror but kneeling down behind a large stump he took good aim with his pistol and fired and fired at the rebels almost catching the little girls and brought them a down without hitting the little girls by accident showing he was a crackshot. hen seeing the other rebels far behind and dangerously exposing himself he rushed to the bano to assist the other little girls to get to the river. One of the rebels had dived into the river for the boat but was hit in the shoulder by the mans bullet and plunged madly about. As he ran for the other little girls six landelinians on horseback suddenly dashed around the house and attacked him fiercely trying to sabre him to death. He repellecthe assault with his own sword and two or three deep gashes appeared upon the flanks ofone of the rebel ch chargers horse, w from which the blood flowed freely and this daunted the other landelinians which enabled the little girls to see a chance to escape.

''Run to for the river quick little girls.'' houted the soldier as he fought desperately and then he quickly freed himself from his fierce assailants by a few vicious strokes of his sword and quickly fol owed them. As soon as he and the children got to the rivers edge he eplaced the little girls on board and soon was starting out upon the surface of the river finding the selves safe from persuit y yet the soldi soldier was the las t to get into the boat and was still assisting the last girl when turning t o jump into the craft he felt a blow struck for hi by some one and heard a low fierce blasphemy. Looking up he saw a Gargol Gerglylie standing over him and at once Tub began stabbing and s thrusting with his sabre in a wild manner and he struck the rebel some good blows and killed him on the spot, and when he drew th the blade it was dripping with blood. Again another rebel rushed him with a loud curse but again he thruck wildly with his weapoj and the rebel dropped dead at his feet. he two reels were quite dead from the sword blows or thrusts and after a glance at the terrible Gargoylies and their terrible hoods and seeing a swarm following close behind to attack the soldier turned in a panic and rushed right into the boat and staring working with the oars withmight and main while the little girls laid down in the boat to prevent the shots hitting them should the repulsed landelinians open fire. On the river however the adventueres eemed to be pe perfectly safe for though the landelinians fired desperately the bullets only passed about or over them, or struck the boat and never did any other damage. he boat with its human e cargoe floated slowly down stream westward with the current of the water, and the landelinians drove their horses in to persue them but the horses swam only a short distance andnot being able to stand thecold water and ice floes in the river would go no further and the rebels abandoned the persuit. he soldier opened his satchel and got outsome stickli sticking plaster with which he mana mended the severe sabre cuts he had received from his as ailants. H he little girls had escaped unscathed though they had been badly frightened.

''I think now we had better stick to the river after this for a while.''Said violet. ''If we had not seen them coming we could not have been warned and we would have probably been captured or dead by this time. I see they are bound to catch us that is certain.''

''That is true''Agreed the soldier''And as the river flows from the direction of that forboding rag range of hills it will be the easiest way for us to travel for a while. See violet and your isters. A number of rebels are following us along both sides of the shore. They are bound to get us if possible.''

It was true but the horses trotted slowly through the deep snow and by bending hard at the oars the soldier was able to make the boat glide much swiftly over the smooth water though he aoiv avoided the ice cakes a good deal. violet and her sisters were at first dreadfully afraid the landelinians would get them yet but the soldier soon got the boat far ahead of the persuers and soon the little girls were not scared a bit. Ones a number of fish swam t o near the surface but no one attempted to catch any fish and once or twice the soldier cautioned the little girl to girls to be carefuly not to jump t up too high in the boat for they may draw the fire of their persuers. After a journey of three hours and a half they came to a point where the river first curved and then a little beyond where it broadened out so immensely that the other shore could hee be seen only at a long distance lined with trees that looked as tall as small grass so far the shore was to the south and then they found if they wanted to get back to land they b must cross six miles or so before they came to that opo opp site shore. he nearest shore was only a mile off to the north. here were no houses in sight in these parts and few trees or fields but hills and gulliss so our friends feared they might encounter some mor more of their savage persuers which they had learned to dread with all their hearts.

''If we get ashore now we all will have to make a dash.''Said the soldier ''And run as fast as we cango.''We cannot stay on the river too long as it will get so wide soon that we will never reach shore but drift out to sea or in the way or rebel warships in vivian ickey on both sides of the river and be blown out of the water.''

''All right let 's land and we'll try to do our best.''Answered the little girls.

As soon as they got ashore they saaw a squad of rebels around a small camp fire and not far from thema group of eleven horses. ost cleverly the fugitives managed to secure the horses without being seen and so they got on and st start ed the horses forward. he horses however needed no guin guidiance of any sort. The little girls however were still smarting from the excitement they had gone through and as soonas they had cautiously drawn the horses away and mounted them and headed t ward the south the thought that more of the fearful creatures as the landelinians might be too near to suit acted a as a spur and they urged the horses so that they went gallopping along in a way that made violet and her sisters and the soldier catch their breath just as the startled rebels rushed out from the campfire in the woods to see their horses ridden by enemies dash away at breakneck speed. hey fired many shots in an effort to down the horses and those who had horses still gave instant chance but the soldier himself fired and brought down every one of the persuers in a jiffyhorse and all at the same time.

Then the soldier in a spirit of mischief uttered a sound like that given by rebels and the little girls pricked up their ears and and dug ours to the horses and they fairly flew. he legs of the eight horses indeed moved so fast that they could scarcely be seen, and the little girls clung fast to the horses necks and yelled;

''Gid-dap''At the top of their voices.

''I'm afraid the horses are running away.''Gasped violet at lastas she tried to stop the horse she rode and did no did not succeed.

''Oh no they ain't ''Answered Jennie''But no Glandelinians can catch us if o the horses we secured keep up that gate, and their legs don't give out or t hey become k jaded too soon. ''

Of course the horses did not make a mile a minute but almost before they were aware of it there was a tremendous crash of shots from an opposite direction nd the horses stood stopped so suddenly and then dropped that the little girls both sailed over the heads of the horses and landed in the soft snow where they rolled several times before they stopped. Two other little girls and the soldier nearly went with them, and another little girl nearly got caught under her horse as it fell but they were all saved however. Violet who fell on topof violet as both horses dropped simultaneously almost squeezed her sister with such weight that she screeched, and then came several curious sounds that led the little girlsto suspect some one was laughing at them all.

The nearest mountian before them was shaped like a very broad cone and appeared to be some sort of a extent volcano and itwas so tall that its uttermost summit was lost in the winter fog clouds. irectly facing the point where the fugitives had been thrown from their horses which had been killed under them by the fire of the ambuscaders was a large and narrow pathway. he pathway seemed to have been cut in the rock of the mountians and they were broad pathways and not very steep because they went straight ahead and then disappeared from view. At the foot way of the paths entrance they had recieved warning from a solitary friend who said to them:

''This path leads to the encampments of the fierce Glandelinian Gargoylies. Inwarn you children and the man with you that it is exceedingly dangerous and that ho you had better keep away.''

But they did not heed i him and so had started to proceed.

''I wonce wonder if our tired horses will be able to go up the pathway.''said Violet gravely who with her soldier friend and sisters had escaped the ambuscaders and who had only four horses remaining between them the others having be en , killed.

''No trouble for the horses at all.''peclared the soldier, almost with a com contemptuous sneer at the approaching rebels.''Still I don't think the horses can g go up the paths wit with any one on them so we will have to walk.''

''suppose the pathway gets much steeper!''suggested Jennie, doubtfully.

''when we will have to abandon thehorses that is all.'' nswered Angeline.

''We'll try it any way.''said Catherine patie tly.''It is the only way to get out of the region of the enemy we are in and find our way to the christian lines where we are safe.''''''

So they all began to ascend the pathway, the little girls and the soldier first and the horses next, some of the little girls watching th t that nothing would happen to the horses. he light of the evening was growing dim as the sun was s etting and after they progressed a certain distance they soon were in total darkness so that the soldier was obliged to get the lantren they still had with them and prepare to light the way but was warnin warnedby the little girls not to attempt it as the foe would see the more easily. The darkness enabled them to proceed more steadily untill they came to a part of the path where there was a rift in the side of the mountian. Looking over this they could see the valley below them the cottages seeming like toy houses from that distance. After resting a few moments they s o s, slowly resumed their clu sl climb and still the path was broad and low enough for the horses to be easily led after them. The horses panted a little and had to stop often to get their breath and so with the little girls and the man also. At such times the fugitives were even glad to l allow the horses to rest, for constantly climbing up a pathway is sure to make ones legs ache if it gets steep enough. They continued onward now going downward instead of upward and the light from the rising moon dimly showed the way, but just the same it was a most gloomy journey, and they were pleased when the moon rose higher and shown down upon them a broad sheet of light which assured them better footing and more chance to see what was ahead of them.

Here one side of the big mountian they were on had a big opening in it like the mouth of a great cavern, and the path divided into two, one toward the cavern and another leading from it n and commenced descending more abrpt abruptly.

As they they again halted the fugitives looked out upon a most strange scene. Below them was a vast space of forest, over which a far in the distance was a black sea of rolling billows of thick smoke though which immense tongues of flames shot constantly up to a great height. past beyond this big strange conflargration, were rising banks of white clouds of smoke which constantly shifted position, and changed color with the glow of the conflargration. Te he blue and gray colored smoke clouds were very beat beautiful and violet and her sisters noticed that the uppo upper portions of the cloud banks reclined f easy shadowy forms of smoke like beautiful human beings and if the coloring and shapes was not strange freaks among the smoke caused by the wind the little girls would have declared they looked like cloud fairies. any mortals who stand upon the earth and look up at the sky could have also distinguished these strange formations among the smoke clouds, and our friends and adventures were so near these smoke clouds that they observed the dainty forms very clearly.

''Those forms almost look completely real.''said Violet in a awed tone. ''but they are not.''''Replied Violet's sister Jennie softly.''hey are only queer cloud formations among the smoke ade by the wind up so high. ''

''hey seem like some strange kind of open work.''Remarked the soldier gazing most intently.''If any of us should be up there and squeeze o e of those peculiar forms there would not be anything left of it I am sure of that.''

In the open space between the clouds of dense smoke and the black billowy sea of thicker smoke from the general conflargration could be seen an occasional strange flash like an explosion, and strange black objects by hundreds rushing swiftly through the air with a loud horried shriek as if that many fiends were in the air. These objects if near seemed to be of enormous size, and reminded violet and her sisters of the shells they had seen in the sky during big bombardments for they bursted and mak made flashes like lightning and crashed with a deafening thunderous din as if the wildest thunderstorm on eat earth was raging incessantly over there. Each shell flying through the air looked like rockets before exploding having fierce streamers of red sparks and the children hoped none of the shells would venture to fall into their pathway or explode stoo near them.

''Well I declare indeed.''suddenly exclaimed the soldier.''hat in the world is this coming tward us!''''''

The little girls turned around in complete fright at first and found a man moving tward them, who though dressed in the garb of a Gargoyle boked very politely to the children when he saw he had managed to atract their attention. He was by his walk a very young man but the queerest thing abo ut him was his /o long white rob and hood and the dasigns of a wheel on the chest. The robe itself was so long that it reached his feet, and both the hood and the to turban above it were carefully formed and around his waist was fastened a bow of colored ribbon of broad shape. The little girls alarmed had drawn their weaons and violet demanded with wonder indeed;

''where did you come from and what do you want?''

''No placecat all.''answered the strange man with the strange disguise''That is not recently.''I was a prisoner in the hands of the Gargoylies and have just escaped. cor many days they had their position at this s ou so spot half way up the ridges covered by batteries on the summit. You little reckless fools aracommitting sucide to dare pro ceed.''

''How far are we?''Asked violet still holding her gun for fear it may be a real rebel.

''Only half way up little goils.''

''Only half way up.''Enquired the little girls in an discouraged tone. ''Why we do not wantto go up. We wish to get around the hills and escape the rebel positions.''

''I bel e believe so at any rate.''said the man''But as I have been in neither direction, down or up but in the rebel encampment as a prisoner since I gotcaptured I cannot be positive whether wher whether w you are half way up the ridge or not. ut what are the eaning of the guns . I'm telling you the truth. I'm no enemy.''

''Have you any one else in the place with you in hii hiding?''asked the soldier who had been examining the strange personage carefully. ''If you are not a real Gargolian prove it.''

''To be sure''Said the other''I'm not spoofing you must know and I did not expect to encounter friends in this lonely spot.'' nd he removed the disguise and stood before them in a colunels uniform(Abbiesannian)

''ow did you escape them?''Enquired the soldier.

''Well the rebels yestd yesterday had stolen from the christian storehouses immense amounts of assorted Flutters for Flags and bunting and a superior grade of ustles for silk uniforms and being in charge of the storehouse with a hundred others were capt was capt redwith them allI escaped today by capturing this disguise and found you here and thought it best to warn you before it is too lat into.''

''I thought so''Said the Angelinian soldier guide with a sigh''May we be allowed to examine this disguise you secured and the articles about it?''

'' ust as they had examined the gown a number of revels hoved in sight and inquiring if there was a place to hide the new found friend said fo found friend said;

''Yes indeed'' come into the cavern please.'' nd the stranger turned and led the way into a small cavern, where he evidently had his hiding place the n ght before. Here the saw on a broad shelf was several boxes of various sizes each tied with tonton cord.

''this''said the man in a s w i whisper ta I taking up a box and handling it gently;''contails twelve dozen sm grwnades which I stole from the foe last evening when I made my escape--enough to last a few hours at least and can stop any amount of persuers. o you know how to use them my dears?''He asked addressing violet and her sis tsisters. sisters.

''I andray sisters were always good at throwing anything!.''''

Violet said smiling.

''All right. ₥hen you open the box be careful how you handle the grenades that the minute release the explosives inside them does not drop out or escape or you will all be killed in a few seconds.''Said the man seriously.Then he picked up another box.''In this''he continued''Are many bullets fit for your pistols.Theyare are invaluable to make a brave defense in case of hard pressed my persuers.. You sir''turning to the soldier guide''Ought to have this assortment of bullets in your careOnce you havetried these bullets and grenades I'm sure you will never be without them. ₥hey I captured fr from the rebels in my escape from the camps.''

''I have no money with me. ''Said the soldier evasively.

''I do not wn want money and neither do I sell them.' returned he stranger''For I could not spend it in this deserted place if I wanted to or had it. ₥ut I would very much like to see you children at least through the dangerous adventure you are to undertake saftly especially the prettiest little girl with the blue hair ribbon. ₥nd I noi notice you other little girls have ribbon bands around your hair of yellow pin , brown,, red, green whie and even purple and also blue ribbons.''

''For being so good to us and a true friend I will give you my ribbon''Cried violet who was sorry for the poor man a fugitive like themselves so she untied the ribbon from her hair and it did her good tosee how the mans eyes sparkled when he recieved this beautiful treasure.

''You have made me very happy, very happy my dear.''He exclaimed''₥nd now then he insisted on the soldier taking a couple of boxes of grw nades and bullets and the little girls a s also accepted some gren ades of safer make and placed them inside their pockets.

''₥ou may need them so me time if you persist in going in the same direction you were headed for.''He said''₥nd there is really no use in going through the dangerous zone unless you are fully armed.

''₥hy was it that you got captured by the fierce Gargolies and was brought to their encampments?''Enquired the soldier.

''I could not help it. It is a sad story but if you will try to restrain your tears I will tell you about it. ₥ithinin the christian lines w I was in charge of a number of Angelinian suppliy storehouses and I will acknowledge that during my service in the army I supplied a superior article also to soldiers which they were in great demand. ₥inally during the battle of ₥urundecallio the rebels made a big raid upon that portion of the christian camp and we were fired upon and half of the men guarding the place killed or captured including my s myself.

₥ortunately in my escape from them later this pathbled directly to where I found you little girls and your guide. Here then seeing you I made up my mind to prevent you from running into the unseen danger or to supply you if possible if you intended to do so and although it is a lonely place I stayed untill you came up and so warned you. As a fact it would not be safe for us to travel together as I'm fairly hunted for and so we must part to make out our traveling safer.''

₥hen the man a had completed this strange tale violet and her sisters nearly laughed in the way he claimed he had outwitted the rebels because it was all so absured, but the soldier tipped his forehad significantly to indicate that he thought half the ₥landelinians must be crazy. ₥o they politely bade him good night and went o nward to resume their journey and yet watched the black waves of rol ing smoke in the distance and the consuming fire of probably a burning town.

Another breathless decent brought our adventuers to a third landing of the pathway where again there was a rift in the mountian they were climbing down. On perr peering out all they could see now was rolling banks of smoke clouds, so thick they th th₥ that they obscured all else and was pierced by the glow of the conflargration. ₥ut the unfortunatel travelers were obliged to rest, and while they were sitting on the rocky floor the soldier guide felt in his pocketsand brought out his guns to examine them more closely. ₮o his delight the guns were in good condition, which proved that they were well taken card care of.

''₥hy the moonlight is so bright that we can see each other plainly.''Cried one of the little girls joyfully.

''Yes sighed Violet''₥nd I also can see my dear sisters plainly, and the sight makes me dr dreadfully sad and even discouraged.Please Tubby may we known plainly how far we may be from the christian lines we are seeking. You may know I'm sure.''

''That is impossible to say.''He answered.'' We can only tell by passing-beyond the rebel lines especially the Gargoylies.''

''₥hat a horrid savage bunch of men those Ku Klux ₥lans of the ₥landelinians must be.''R el im exclaimed one of the little girls;demurely''₥nd I know when children are in their way it seems that nothing would please those rebels more as to capture them and make s aves of them or destroy their lives''

''And we trusted that we could get out of the rebel region but not so.''Said Jennie reproachfully.

CHAPTER FIFTY ONE....

THE FUGITIVES MEET THE HORROR OF SCOUTING GARGOYLIE CAVARLY AND FIGHT THEM TO DISADVANTAGE.THEIR WONDERFUL ESCAPE FROM THEM AND THE ENTIRE ₥LANDELINIAN REGION. HOME AGAIN..!!!!!

''We hardly ever found a single ₥landelinian respectable.''Said Angeline.''We are going through adventures that does not seemto my liking for one.''''

''It seems we were mistaken in taking this route in the first place.''Declared Daisy looking tward the pathway kind of timoriously.''₥nd we would not like to meet any ₥landelinians who have murderous desires I'm sure.''

''You see Tub.''Remarked ₥iolet reprovingly''Those Gargolyli Gargoyles and other ₥landelinians are making themselves disliked by all Angelinia s. there are certain things proper for Angelinians to do to those rascals, and anyway I or my sisters never heard of captured Gargoylians being rescued or taken prisoners by Angelinians under any circumstances..''''

''₥id you ever see any of the worse Gargoylians before?''Asked the soldier.''₥hey do not wear hedious disguises either like other Gargoylians do but just plian white hoods and gray regallas and I'm sure they are the worse kind too because they are called the ''Hooded Terror.''''₥''''

''It is not the fiercenss Tub dear its the vairety of them.''Replied Catherine. ''Those Gargoylians seem to be the devils pet just as a kitten would be my pet and it would be more proper for Angelinians not to give them any quarter at all.''

''And that is what they will refuse to do some day if the rebels do don't leave little innocent children alone''said the soldier glaring tward the direction of the rebel lines with his eyes.''If any of the Gargoylians ever injured any of you little goils I'd kill them instantly without giving them a trial .''

₮he little girls looked at the soldier thoughtfu y thoughtfully as if trying to decidedwhether he meant it or not.''

''In that case''Said Hette Hettie''I believe you will manage to make them leave us alone.You have but only two guns in your pe possession Tub but the way you do shoot is enough to make me or my sisters shudder. so we believe we will be perfectly safe hereafter as far as the Gargoylies are concerned.''''''

''That is right''Hettie.''Remarked the soldier earnestly. ''₥nd let us all be like a happy family and love one another whether we be father and daughters or not.''

₥iolet yawned and stretched herself being sleepy.

''There was a time when I and my sisters did even love the very ₥landelinians.''She said''but now they don't love us or any christians so we are enemies to the insurgents as long as as this war will rage.''

''₮no one can love a ₥landelinian who they are afraid of.'' Asserted Angeline.''If the ₥landelinians would only behave and fight like men and not like savages and scare so many children andeve grown o people with their horrid ways I'm sure we could have considered their rebellion only an insurrection and not a war against civilization and then we could have been probably very fond of some of the best generals which whether they fought against our side or not'..''.

₮he soldier now put his two guns into his pocket s and the journey was resumed the fugitives having grown cold sitting there.

''we must be pretty near the top , now I'm sure''Said the soldier or near the base of the hill I mean.''Said the soldier as they went wearily down the dark winding pathway.

The ₥landelinian encampments which have the Gargoylian troops can't be far away from us now.''Remarked Daisy.''Any how it is not very nice down here. I'd like to get home again or to the christian lines, I'm sure.''

₥o one else replied to this because they indeed th found they needed all their breath for the remainder of the descent.. The pathway had become narrower and the soldier had to often help some of the little girls lead the horses through or to keep them from giving in from discouragement or fatingue.At las last however a dim light again from the moonbeams appeared ahead of them, which grew g clearer and s stronger as they advanced.

''Tth n Thank goodness we are nearly to the bass now.''Pantedthe soldier.

₥iolet who was in advan e advance saw the last of the pathway before her. Then she halted with a look of terror and her horse ba began to back up, so that he nearly fell onto her.

''Let's go back up again for once.''she said in a terrified voice.

''₥onsense.''grapped the soldier.''what's the matter with you little girls? what has come over you all of a sudden?''''''

''Everything is the matter with u me.'' he said in a voice shaking with fear.''I've taken a look at the scenery before us and it's no fle sense for any creatures to make an attempt to go through. Everything is dreadful beyond description before us --no flesh or blood could dare go forward without great encouragement. There is a squadr n of Gargoylian cavarly in our way completely barring our approach to the lowlands.''

''Never mind we cannot turn back now.''Said her sis sisters''And we don't intend to let them capture us or stay with them if they do anyhow.''

''It is exceedingly dangerous to proceed.''said Violet in a stubborn voice.''

''See here my good little sister.''Broke in Joice''You know well enough all ready that you and I and my sisters have went throughmany queer experiences, have been in many queer parts of the enemy enemys lines in our travels, or spying excursions, or any other adventure, and have always escaped so far without harm of any kind, exvept recieveing a little wound now and then. We have even been inside of vivian wickey, in the Norma Reign Rign of Terro, and we also have been in Andrean --haven't we Jannie--so we don't care much what the Gargoylies are like or what they will try to do. We have dangerous weao weapons to stop any attempt they make to take us and we have a narrow pass to defend while they would expose themselves. Go ahead violet don't give in to fear now when you have fought it so long and whatever happens we will all make the best of it.''

'All right'' answered violet.''This is your excursion not mine at all, so if we all get into serious trouble or even perish don't blame me or Tub.''

With this spe ch she went forward leading her horse down the pathway to the valley be ow. The others with guns drawn followed and soon they were standing upon a broad plain and gazing at the most curious and yet terrifying sight ever met the eyes of man. It was the most sta startling sight their eyes had ever beheld.

''The encampment of the distant rebel lines extend beyond eyesight.''Exclaimed the soldier and so it was. The ground here was covered with deep er snow ground like saw u sawfust, and the pebbels scattered here and there, were the sixe of knots of trees but worn smooth like the course of time. The enemy had within their encampments oddwooden barracks of immense size, designed in front with carved woodsn flowers. Beyondthe enemen encamp, encampment lay a thick stretch of woods but by the leaves being of the brittle kind almost hard as wood they knew they were the gigantic hemlock trees of Calverinia. Patches of dried grass could be seen in the snow and where neither grass or stones showed was a large waste of whiteness. Very few birds fluttered among the trees, h yet some cows probably belonging to the insurgents were browsing near the encampments, but the most am amazi g amazing thing of all was a large group of strange lo king Glandelinians--the Ku Klux Klans of the STinsurgents known as the Gargoylians.

The number of the men in the squadron were very numerous for the region was thickly studded with these fierce horsemen and the large group of the queerly disguised re els which was clustered near by saw the children and the soldier with them and gazed sharply upon the strangers who had emaerged from the long pathway.The Gargoylians were of tall stature being a six foot men and all rode b black horses. Their bodies were clothed in long gray robes, their legs being covered with a short thick rounded pants and their arms were showing extraordinarily long and stout sleeves of blue color. They wore horrid lo king masks or white hoods which seemed almost too big for their heads and with the big eye holes, and nose parts cut out their features were decidedly ugly to look upon. The most peculiar part was the head wear of their leaders and also the hoods. Some h hsec had a peculiar head of a big bird with long curved nose and sma chins, small eteyes, and wide grinning mouths. Other had disguises of faces like demons with flat noses, r protruding eyes, and ears that shaped like those of elephants. There were a number of types among the officers, scarcely any being alike, but all even of the privates were equally disagreeable in appearance with their disguises and the privates wore rounded turbins turbuns on top of the hoods. Some of the leaders had disguises for their heads formed into a variety of fantastic shapes, some having a row of points or balls around the top, orhers had on their robes designs resembling flowers of vegetables, and others for head wear had squares that looked like waffles cut cris-cutcross on their head disguises.

They all a had designs of wheels on the front of their robes. They all rode swift horses covered with white sh sheets and also hooded and had white saddles and all had also a number of white colored standards whix which fluttered noiseless in the wind, all carrying long lances while they had carbines slung across their backs, and sabres on each side with pistols o boot

The Gargoylians made noiseless signals among each other which was among the most peculiar thing about the Gargoylians. In ma ing signals they made no sounds at all, either in flourshing their weapons or trying to spe k speak and they conversed by means of qu ck signals made with their fingers which was the law of their OrderNeither was there any sound to be heard from the fugitives. No birds were either sin singing where these rebels were seen nor did any cows seem to moo.

The group of these queerly dressed Gargoylians which was discovered to be the dreaded kind called''The Wheelers'' from the da designs on their robes in front, and on account of their swift horses clustered near the outlet of the pathway at first staring and motionless, no doubt glaring with evil eyes at the cnris christian intruders who had so suddenly appeared near their rebel lines. In turn the soldier and the little girls examined the Gargoylians with the same silent attention.

''There is going to be lots of trouble soon I'm sure.''Remarked the soldier. ''Have those horses placed back a little so we can fight comfortably if they attack.''

''Tubs right''Sighed one of the little girls.''There is going to be an immense amount of trouble, and his sword is not stout enough to cut up any amount of those horrid disguised Glandelinians--so we shall all have to rely on our revolvers and the grenades the man gave us.''

''The soldier drew out his guns again and all took defense behind a high ledge of rocks andgot ready for action.''

''What harm can the Gargoylians do if we ma e make a get away!''Asked Violet ''They are dreadfully exposed and have tono weapons to hurt us with while we are behind the ledge.''

''Each of their g carbines shoot exploding bullets.'' answered Answered the soldier.'' nd I'm sure the rebels mean mischief by the looks of their attention to us. Even these revolvers and grenades we have with us can merely succeed in chec ing them for a while and damaging a number of them and after we run out of ammunition we are at their mercy be cause we have no horse that will or can outrun theirs.''

''But why fight at all in that case ?''Asked the little girls.''I will be suicide and they won't give us no quarter.''

''So we may die with clearconsciences.''Returned the soldier gravely. ''It's every ones duty to do the best we known how, and I for one are going to do it.''

''wish I had a cannon a machine gun and bullets for it.''Said Angeline who by now had placed the horses at a safer distance.''

''If we had known we were coming to such a s e scene we might have brought along several more useful things.''Responded the soldier.''but we dropped into this adventure rather unexpectedly indeed.''

The main body of the Gargoylians had backed away a distance, and a bunch had proceeded forward a certain distance with a white flag of tru e truce and demanded the surrender of the christians but when the soldier replied that no surrender would be offered the truce bearer responded;

''If you refuse to surrender you will not recieve no quarter if we overpower you in our attempt to capturd you. you are ar spies and we have been looking for you for three days. You killed the general sir and shall pay for it.''And he withdrewAs soon as the conversation ceased the rebel truce bearer went back to his comrades and in a few minutes more the sq squadron deployed into seperate columns and then rushed forward in a wide swurm and sped swiftly tward the defenders their long lances stretched upward with their sma sla small ma banners flying looking like the boysprits of a fleet of sailboats with colored flags of many different hues. The soldier alone had attracted their notice more than the little girls because they had believed the children had been escaped slaves and could not use guns and so he became the center of their first desperate attack.

But the soldier was ready for them, and when he saw them coming straight for him he drew his revolvers and began firing away as fast as he could. Crack. crash bang went his revolvers in ceaseless reports and down came a number of rebels and horses combined, then all of a sudden spitted the fire of the revolvers of the little heroines and being shot down left and right with horses tumbling in a tangled heap the survivors were panic stricken and retreated scattering like the wind and yelling like demons. The others not joining the attack had opened fire at this in general and the noise and clatter seemed as dreadful to the little girls and the soldier as the roar of carbines and the scream of bullets above them, but the rebels who had ge been routed had swiftly turned their horses and after picking up their wounded galloped away to a great distance, and then also opened fire. Some of the wounded who had been atandoned in the panic picked themselves up from the ground one by one and quickly rejoined their fellows on foot, leaving the dead horses behind, so for a moment the man and children thought they had won the fight with ease.

But soon from other signs the soldier was not so confident any more.

''These Glandelinians are impossible to beat without a large force to help us fight them.''He said.''And all the damage we have done to them in is to wound about ten of them, and kill their horses. This repulse cannot make their disposition any uglier, I'm sure and it is my opinion they will soon renw renew the attack with redoubled fury and energy.''

''hat made them retreat in such a panic then?''Asked violet.

''The surprise frire from you little girls of course.Don't you remember hoe they concentrated on me expecting only me to shoot at them. And don't you remember how accurately you shot them all down in the foremost column horse and man e combined.''

''Suppose we escape back through the path way d r d during the confusio n too.'' uggested Angeline.''We have time just now while they are firing harmelessl at us and I'd rather find another route than contend with those disguised fiends any more.''

''No ''Returned Joice stoutly.''It won't do to go back for we will be killed then sure for they can easily catch us with their fleat horses. And if we did retreat we would never get back to our christian lines. And they will think I also we are cowards and run from them. Let's fight it out and maybe if they see we children are heroines they may relent andnot massacre us if they do capture us.''

''That is what I advise.''Said Catherine.''They have not defeated us little girls yet, and with our ammunition and our secure position we are as much as a whole ar y army.''

But it seemed now as if the Gargoylians were clever enough not to make a direct attac upon the man alone that time. This time they advanced in a great swarm having been joined by many others of their kind, and they fairly flew on as their horses came forward with a roar of hoofs and headed straight for the entire line of defense where the soldier and little girls were kneeling in the cold cruel sno xsnow. The soldier leveled one of his revolvers and fired fired into the throng of his fierce enemies first and the shot rescunded like a clap of thunder in that silent place. One of the Angelinians fell from his horse flat uponthe ground, then the little girls l let go firing purposely only at the horses of the rebels but some of the shots hit the soldiers also and six of them fell with the horses also going down where they quivered and trembled in every limb , but most of the other rebels managed to press on and only when shot down by tents did the survivors wheel their horses and again escape to a distance but firing a volley one shot of which struck the little girl jennie a glancing blow on the head and cut a lock of hair from her fair head but not injuring her. The other bull passed harml harmlessly by though they made a scream like a tempest as they passed.

As they fled the soldier fired in answer and the rear man fell. passed ately covered by the fire of the little girls the soldier ran and dragged the wounded G Gargoylian healer that lay nearest to him into his stronghold. The turban he wore over his hood was like a crown and it was seen the soldiers bullet had struck him exactly in the left eye and he was dead. He tore off the mans dis guise and saw he was indeed a handsome looking rebel. The bullet had passed through the mans eye and out his head so it had been an instant death for the insurgent;

He had also secured a stunned rebel soldier and before this Gargoylian had recovered himself the soldier had wound a strap several times around the soldiers body confind confiring his arms so that he could not move and ta ing his sabre and pistols away from him and also his carbine which was still strab strapped to his back. hen having tied the wounded man securely he buckled the strap and dragged the prisoner to the edge of the works. By that time all the other Angelinians had all retired.

''You will get it for this resistance t you big fools.''Said the wounded rebel.''They will hang all of you for shooting us down.''

''If they make an attack on us that is successful you will die for it.''Gritted the Angelinian soldier in return. ''I defy you and your whole army to boot.''

For a while now the Gargoylian enemies hesitated to renew the fierce attacks on the furigit fugitives.. hen a few of them started to advance expecting another v ll volley from the defenders of the salient but no one fired until the reb lrebels got within close range and then the s ots from the soldier alone made them retreat but this time without a loss.

''That was fine.''Said one of the little girls.''We have got the Angelinians on the run for a time now sure enough.''

Bu t''ut only for a time is rigy t.''noplied the soldier himself shaking his head in a very gloomy manner.''My revolvers now are only good for eight shots each, but when all our ammunition is all gone we shall be absolutely he, helpless indeed.''

The G rgol Gargoylian leaders seem ed to realized this for they only sent a few of their lans of horsemen time after time to attack the christians, and drew the fire from their revolvers. In this way by being more cautious now none of themwas killed or wounded though in such a quiet place the shock and reports of the revolvers was dreadful and stunning, but to avoid further losses the main band of Gargoylians kept far away, and each time a new bunch of men was sent into the battle. when the soldier and the little girls had indeed fired all of their last shots and had no ammunition left they had caused no more damage to the enemy except to stun a few by the explosions of the grenades they had also thrown and they were no nearer victory than in the beginning of the fray. some of the little girls were for going to their horses and attempt to make a race for life or freedom but they realized the Angelinians were the wheelers and no horse was found yet that could outrun theirs and so they did,not do so.

''hat shall w we do now!''''Asked Violet and her sisters anxiously.

''Let'' throw stones or hard snowballs alltogether and yell for help!' Said one f thelittle girls.

''nd fight fiercely at the same time.''Added the soldier.''We will get nearer together, so that we can help each other and each one must take some weapon and do the best we can.I'll use my w sword and pistol but although it is not much account in in this serious affair. In case we cannot beat them then you little g rls must take to the rear where your horses are and jump behind them suddenly when the Angelinians attack you. I have no other weapons for you little girls.''

''We'll use the snowballs or rocks or even pistol butts.''Said the little girls as they recoiled behind their horses''We can also take advantage of the wounded Gargoyle and stop their charge by exposing them to thei the rebel fire''Added the soldier and pulled his prisoner prisone up to the to top of the sledge of stones. The bound rebels arms was alsoo blood soaked so he had grasped the rebel by the legs instead while then the soldier grab ed up some big sticks and also ja handed them to the little girls. The little irls were strong for their young age having always lived right so they were more likely to prove more dangerous fighters to the enemythan the soldier if they c uld concentrate properly.''

When next the terrible Hooded Terror advan ced they began yeow yelling altogether as if they had gone made and flourished their carbines in the air like savages as they rode forward at breakneak speed. .yen the horses seemed to pick dreadfully as they bore their riders onward and at the same time the rebels started firing furiously. This terrible sound daunted the little girls and the soldier for a time and they were almost panic stricken and yet their screams and snowballs so fiercely that they were nearly out of breath. Perceiving that the victims were out of ammunition as well as for the fact that there were no more of the awful grenades to come from them either, the Gargoylians advanced in a swarm as thick as bees so that the whole plain was filled with them but soon the most of them halted and only the van guard came on like a swarm of racers. Violet and her sisters squatted upon the ground behind their horses which for a few minutes proved a great protection for them.

The soldier met them head to hand with his sabre and though he succeeded in cutting down six of the rebels his sword tal blade snapped in two pieces at the first blow he struck at the next assailant. He then pounded away with a great tree limb he had seized using it as a club unt untill he had knocked dozens of foes, but at last the horsemen got over the parapet and dismounti ng clustered so thickly about the soldier and leveled their lances at him that he had room room no longer in which to swing his arms. The soldier had however performed some wonderful fighting at close quarters and even the little girls had assisted when they leaped boldly upon the dismounted Gargoylians and scratched and even bit at them like human wild cats. ut all this bravery amounted to nothing at all to them. One of the rebels wound their strong arms around the soldier and two of the little girls and held them fast like vices. Their little sisters were finally captured in the same way excepting Jennie, and numbers of the rebels clung to the soldiers legs so weighing him down that the poor man was helpless.

Jennie made a most desperate dash to escape to get aid from somewhere, and had mounted one of the horses and dashed away like a streak bidding her sisters to follow but two Gargoylies raced after her and had her also before she had gone very far and brought her back in less time than it ta es to imagine it.

All ofthem thus being captured now expected nothing less than instant death; but to their surprise andamazement the Gargoylians made the little girls mount their own horses and the soldier also and then surrounding them with leveled carbines the leader shouted;

''Now my fair child prisoners with your soldier guide; forward march.''

The prisoners saw nothing else to do but obey and they were led far away over miles and miles of country untill they came to the immense encampment they had seen the moment they saw t the Gargoylians.The barr acks in this extensive cir city of rebel encampments was very large having a hundred windows on each side and were almost two hundred feet long. They had outhouses mostly supply storex no doubt which were square and four sided and some in the form of a star with six points.

Some were tower like in shape and the best of them seemed made of very old material yet all were very strong and substantial.No one f these barr acks which was smaller and had neither doors or windows but only two broad openings far up underneath the roof the prisoners were brought by their captors. The Angelinians made them mount down into the building by means of the opening in the roof or roughly pushed them in rather, placing them where there was a large platform, and then without any words at all most of them went away and left them but placed two guards over themFrom the bodious aspect of the Gargoylian guards violet and her sisters wished they had wings so they could fly away but there was no such a thing to be performed, n and if they clambered up to the roof and jumped down from such a dreadful height they would s rely be killed as they were eighty feet above the ground.The Gargoylians having heard about the Avian girls had sense enough to know of their clever means to escape and so had placed them here and the only real mistake the insurgents madewas in supposing that the children were unable to overcome such ordinary difficulties.The horses the little girls had brought through the path had been taken by the rebels for ti their own use. To spite the Avian girls the rebels had hoisted a horse up to the roof and landed him on the high platform declaring that it belonged to the party of christian prisoners and the man who left them with the guards o unmasked himself; and laughing at the litt,e girls made a an insult to the christian soldier and left the guards with them.When Jennie's captor had thrown her after the other prisoners, the Gargoylian guards stood on each end of the platform with rifle and bayonet, but nevertheless leaving the f g prisoners to breath freely once more .

''what an awful useless fight.''Said Violet in a whisper and yet catching her breath in little gasps.

''Oh I don't know''Declared Jennie smoothing out herruffled hair with her hand''We did not manage to hurt many but kill three rebels and wound thirty and none of the rebels managed to hut us yet.''

''Thank goodness we are still together and not seperated even if we are prisoners.''Sighed the little girl Catherine.

''I am surprised and even wondering why the Gargoylians did not kill us on the spot for resisting them so .''Remarked Angeline who had lost half of her coat in the struggle.''They threatened no quarter and yet here we are.''

''They are probably keeping us for investigation.''The soldier answered; reflectively''But there is no doubt they intend to place us before a firing squad and so shoot us to death as possible in a short time.''

''Shoot us pretty dead eh. ill as dead as p s possible would be pretty dead wouldn't it!''Asked Daisy.

"Yes my dear little girls it would be so .But we have no need to worry about such this just now cowlet us all examine our prison and see what it is like. I will attack one guard and you violet the other when he ain't looking."

This was fortunately accomplished without noise or trouble or without their motions being seen In by those in the enemy camp and then they proceeded to examine the prisoner and see if they could find a way to escape.The large space underneath the roof, where they stood after overe overpowering the two guards permitted them to see on all sides of the tall building and the [illegible] or two looked with much curiousity at the site of rebel encampment and the many views and the sat many beautiful glandelinian flags spread out beneath them. Everything visible visible except the tone was made of wood, and the scene for a rebel encampment seemed at first and unnatural.From their large platform a winding stairway descended into the house, and the children and the soldier guide explored it after lighting a lantern to show the way as it was now only past midnightThey had not had any sleep but just now they were toexcited with the thought of making their escape and so did not feel sleepy.Several stories of empty prison rooms rewarded their search and nothing more,so after a time they came back to the platform where the rebels guards were still lying tied hand and foot and gaged. Had there been any kind of door kind of d ors and windows in the lower sectional rooms, or had not the w oden boards of the house been so athick and s out escape would have been easy by cutting an exit through one of the walls, but then to remain down below was like being in the dungeon and they did not like the intense darkness and the h rrible smell that proceeded from if if you please to mention.

I n this glandelinian encampment as in all others it being night most of the rebels troops were asleep but with the help of the strong moonlight in the white show the prisoners could see forms moving about outside some of the tents or in some of the barracks which were lighted up, or where there were glass windows in abundance. In the distance they could see six different kinds of flickering lights coming from some unknown source.

"This is the time when most people rest and sleep but how about ourselves."I"Observed the soldier."All people need rest whether prisoners or not but yet to select a certain time to sleep here would be our undoing I'm sure. We must find means to e escape first."

"I feel sleepy some f ocf"Said violet yawning."

"Why where's Jennie."Cried Angeline suddenly.

They all indeed looked around with startled faces but the little girl was no place to be seen.

"I'll bet she had taken the nerve to go out on a walk."I"said the soldier rub gruffly.

"Why here on the roof!"I"sked one of the little girls.

"Well saw her clambered over the edge of the roof when no one among the rebels was looking and by means of a rain pipe on the edge of the house climb down the edge of the house to the ground."

"She could not climb down tubby."said violet ,vivid."you are a man now and ought to know that to climb means to go up."I"

"Why she said so will you tell me?"I"demanded the sedi soldier.

"My school teacher said so and she knows a lot more than any of us do I'll tell you tub....."I"

"To 'climb down' is sometimes used as a figure of speech f if Nothing else.."Remarked the soldier....."

"Well wi well then this was indeed o n fu figure of a little girl then."said Angeline herself with a wig mischievious smile!"I"nd she went down anyway, whether she climbed or crept....."

"Dear me how careless and reckless Jennieis certainly is."Exclaimed Daisy anxiously and much distressed.

"The curles will get her sure as living."I"said the soldier.

"Ha, ha chuckled violet"s They are not anything you could call curgles Unless they curle like frogs with their throats sir, they are glandelinians oand gargoylians."

"Never mind they willsurely get little Jennie what ever they are called if she does not watch out."I"

"No they wont if I can help it."said a voice that sounded like Jennie's and Jennie herself appeared over the edge of the platform and sat down quietly upon the roof cold as it was.

"Where have you been Jennie dear!"I"Asked violet almost sternly as she was almost angry over the reckless act h of her daring l sister....."

"Watching the Gargoylains and their modes of movements and work. Ish wicked and as ferocious as they are they are too funny for anything violet dear. Just now theremainder of them are all retiring for a few o hours sleep I presume---"---and what do you think---they took off their fearful disguises and put them under their cots until untill when awakening they will wear them."

"I just do you mean their awful disguises."I"

"Not the disguises or regalia if that is what you mean . I mean those terrible hoods and ivings they wear over their heads."

"That"Said o the soldier"Explains why this house is used by the for a prison for captives."If they capture any prisoners they are brought here and if we have any weapons about us or the other prisoners have any weapons about them they are taken away from them untill we are under investigation. If the prisoners are proved to be Angelinian spies, or child slave fugitives the resultan are more terrible than I would ever dare think of."

Violet and her sisters had listened intently to what Jennie and the soldier had said.

"I wish we could secure some of those racers of those Gargoylians."said the soldier.

"Could we be able to ride such swift horses without being thrown!"Asked violet cautiously who had never never ridden such horses in her life.

"I think so."If the Ger o Gargoylians can do so we have the power ourselves and the power to escape lies in securing these horses alone and not mainly depend upon any weapons we would also wish to secure. O h if we only had those horses about lighter than we could probably ride their horses as well as they could---at least long enough to have a chance to escape them."

"But who would take the nerve to help in securing those horses and help us to ride away like that."questioned another of the little girls.

"Come here"said The soldier and took her to one of the corners of the big building."Do you see that immense line of hills standing near the seashore yonder?" He continued pointing with his right finger.

"Yes but it is a good way of, but yet I can see it...."he replied.

"Well beyond that range of hills one of which reached reaches way up into the sky clouds is a long passage way very much like the one we entered when we climbed down the other hills and run into thin nest of glandelini in a glandelinian encampment a second time.I'll get my spy glass, and then you can see it more plainly."I"

He fetched a small but very powerful telescope, which had been in one of his secret pockets which had been overlooked by the glandelinians when he was searched for weapons, and by its aid the little girl clearly saw the strange opening he mentioned.

"I"Here does it lead to."She asked.

"That I cannot tell."Said the soldier."But I'm sure we can[illegible] cannot now be far from the christian lines at las least, and that entrance or passage by way o land to another means that will bring us to our refuge once again; where we belong. And I bet general Hannon or other christian generals are having the wo whole country scoured for us. So now if we could secure eight of the horses belonging to the Gargoylian cavarly and could escape the Gargoylians, we might race the them to that range of hills, and getting by the pass passage get up a little distance and have such an advantage that we could shoot down all we could of our e pursuers [illegible] with the weapons we could also try to secure."

"I'll get the horses myself."said dare-devil little Jennie who had thoughtfully listened to all of this."That is if the soldier will accompany me as we need to two to do this job."

"But how can the men get down!"Inquired violet wonderingly;

For answer the soldier began to unfasten from the solidly horse left with them in the roof that harness, strap by strap, and to buckle one piece to another until he had made a long leather strip that with the adding of a small pe piece of rope he found in the building reached the ground ground.

"I can climb down that all right."I"He said.

"So you can't!"Remarked violet with a twinkle in his her blue eyes.

"Why can't I."He demanded. "What is going to hinder me."

"You may go down."He e she added but you can only climb up and please remember my correction."I"

"Well none of us will need to climb back up again when I get back with the horses and the weapons."I"Said the soldier with a laugh."Now Jennie you will like to show your friend the way to get those horses if you don't mind."I"

"But you must be very quiet!..."warned Jennie"for if you make the least noise the Gargoylians will wake up. One can hear a pin drop and we are lucky there are sentries below to watch our movements."

"I'm not going to drop a pin as I have no pin."Said the soldier "but about the two bound and gagged guards on the roof."I"

"They can remain here to be released when our escape is discovered"She answered. He had not fas tened one end of the long strap to a chimney of the house, and then looking over the r edge of the building carefully to see if any one was watching let the line slowly dangle over the side of the house.

"I"Be careful please."cautioned Angeline s earnestly.

"I will said the soldier and the other little girls leaned over and watched the soldier and Jennie work their way carefully downward, hand over hand, until they stood upontire ground below. Jennie herself clung with her hands and feetto the rain pipe on the edge of the house and let herself down very easily and was done [illegible] of the soldier,when together they first crept away to enter the low doorway of a neighboring hut of tent to secure some weapon'first.

The watchers waited in breathless suspense untill after some time the little girl and soldier again appeared, the soldiers pockets bulging with guns and bullets and leading eight horses all equip ed with the white covering, while Jennie also had some weapons in her possessionwhen the soldier came to where the strap was he cautioned the little girls to climb down one by one which they did, the strap was pulled loose from the chimney and some provisions were tied all in a bunch to the end of the line itself and then the soldier threw it over the saddle of one of the horses,when the line was released by violet who with catherine still remained on the roof the two little girls started down by the pipe. violet went feint at the request of her sister, then violet or catherine i mean quickly followed her and soon they were all standing together on the ground beside the fierce steeds indeed having eight of the highly prized horses in their possession, and equipped with weapons and food also and ammunition in abundance though for the two it took great risk and caution to secure all in so short a time whwithout rousing the rebels, the little girls or either the soldier were no longer sleepy but now full of energy and excitement. After everything was put right he put the harness together again, and placed it in his pocket while he handed some of the weapons to the little girls and jennie did so also until all were supplied with two apiece and two rounds of cartridges and cartridge belts besides. With the soldiers help they placed the large belts around each other twice and then the soldier tried to fasten them to the little girls bosoms so they would not come off or fall off and be lost. this was no easy task as the belts were so long because also half of each one of the catrid cartridge belts were enough to envelope a little girls body twice and the buckles had been used in such a funny whay that it seemed as if the gargoylies alone known how to reconnect them.

however the soldier went to work at last,and had also taken from the hut which seemed to contain a surprising variety of cods and ends;---and brought out a spool of thick cord by means of which they managed to fasten the belts to four of the little girls. they were a bit wriggly at first but secure enough if only the cord held them together so they would not come loose and drop off during the swift ride. the other cartridge belts were fastened to the little girls who had not any on.after deperture depend on their abrupt escape each little girl must be fully supplied and besides they must not be made to have overwhich overweight so that they would not impede the speed of the horses as they raced through the rebel encampments. These preparations had however not consumed a great deal of time nevertheless, but some of the sleeping gargoylians had begun to awake up, and a number of landelinian officers who were „immermannians on inspection''night soldiers'' as they are called were appearing down one of the company stte streets and such some of themwould be seeing the fugiti es and a great scene would ensue. they now mounted the horses, violet holding one gun safely in her hand for necessity. the little girls expecting the ride before them sat tight in the saddles, with the soldier in the rear to cover their motion. When all was ready the little girls shook the reins and shid;

''Gid-dap.''

''which way should we go first to make short cut?''Asked „iolet undecidedly who was to take the lead in the race.''

''go in one direction we choose and altogether,''Suggested the soldier.''

''If necessary we'll shoot our way through the rebel lines.''''

''Many of the rebel guards and sentries and picket lines are all sharpshooters and we shoot us all down without missing.''objected one of the little girls.

''Never mind.''We will look out for them.''said the soldier.''just you little girls light out and make for those hills I pointed out and if we value our lives don't waste any time about it either.'' so the little girls gave a slight moan moan of fear and away they raced through the company street street at a thunderous gallop. violet and her sisters were a little anxious about the success of the trip, for the way the horses arched their long necks and spead out their legs as they went at a gate almost like the speed of a runaway horse was enough to make anybody nervious. they had never rode horses as such a terrific speed before and everything seemed to rush past them like a whirlwind and the horses hoofs threw a cloud of snow behind them. the soldier was used to such speed but the little girls still groaned as if frightened, and the galloping horses made a thunderous roar which unnerved the little girls dreadfully but they kept fairly good time so that they made excellent progress from the start.

the only thing however that any one could complain about with justi e ji justice was the fact that the little girls were afraid of the horses throwing them as they wobbled up and down i with great movements on their saddles a regular saddle dance as if the roads were rocky instead of being as smooth as the air could snow crust could make it if you please to mention it.

the main point was however that they did not ride ride down the road''they fairly flew'' to express it more plainly and went onward swift ly like a squadron of great marathon horse racers tward the goal for which that wershes headed. As they went out of the encampment however the zimmermannian officers had assenthem and had no arouse the alarm and soon instead of gargoylians persueing them this time the officers had lost no time in collecting a band of worse „landelinians the fierce „immermannians to followed hard after the fugitives so that when one of the little girls happened to look back she saw the „immermannians coming on gargoylian steeds in a great cloud of men and horses that almost darkened the snow covered plains and roadway.

Our friends or advent ures had a good at art of the enemy, and were able to maintain it for with the eight horses they had secured from the enemy they could go just as fast as the advancing Zimmermannians and gargoylians who were with them. All the way to the rag range of hills the persueing „landelinians followed them, and when they finally alighted at the pathway the fierce persuers were some distance away but nevertheless coming fast.

''but I'm afraid they will surely catch us yet.''„aid Angeline greatly agitated and unable to restrain herself.

''so we must stop them without an engagement if possible.''declared the soldier.''„uick Jennie and joice help me pull forward all this rubbish near the path of the foe advance.'' they tore up all the thick dry weeds they found growing and which only impended their progress and which no one had any further use and they piled them in a great heap outside the beginning of the pathway we which lead westward. then he poured over the pile all the oil that he found in his possession and lighting a couple of matches set fire to the big pile of rubbish.

The flames leaped up at once and the big bonfire began to smoke and roar and crackle just as the advance guard of the great army of persuers arived near the pass. the „landelinians drew back at once being filled with fear, horror and amazement for such a dreadful thing as making a big bonfire to smoke the back of a snow had never been known to be done before and the „landelinians were filled with bewilderment. Inside the archway of the pas- were other thick dry reeds growing and the soldier and violet and her sisters tore these up by the roots and tossed these all on the flames to increase the dense smoke clouds.

''„hat certainly will prove a barrier for some time tocome.''said the soldier rubbing one pleasantly all over his face at the success of their stratagem.''Perhaps the fire will set fire to other thick mazes of rubbish and only if there was no fear on the ground it would burn tward that mis miserable „landelinian encampment and if it did and burned all their tents and bar-racks it would be very small loss to us indeed and the gargoylian „landelinians and their other fellows would never be pleased I can tell youbut come my pretty fairy childrenlet us explore this wide pass and discover which way we must go in order to escape from the enemys territory which is getting to be almost as hot and as intolerable as if we were trying to escape from hades itself.''

To their disappointment however there was within this region no regular passage by means of which they could get to any valley below in a short time, or which would lead them in the direction of the christian lines. the passage would have indeed been a tunnel had it been roofed but nevertheless it was thirty feet wide with towering walls eighty feet in height, and it led upwards for a long way and they found the flifloor or ground of it both rough and steep and it was probable this pas- s may be guarded by rebel sentries for all the world knows.when a turn brought them suddenly to a narrow gallery where the horses could hardly turn or pass until by single file. this delayed and bothered the poor fugitives for a while because they did not wish to get down ofv off the horses or neither leave the horses behind them. Some of the horses carried the bagmatthey had secured from the rebels and was useful to ride on whenever there were bad or good roads, and since ever they had gone so far with the horses in their route from the second rebel line they felt it their duty to retain the horses if possible. so they set to work to go through single file so that they could take up smaller space. In this slow tedious position they manaed with the aid of the strong patient horses to get through the narrow part of the passage. It however was not any great distance fortunately, and when the path began to grow broader and still broader they went first by threes and by fours and proceeded forward more comfortably.But nevertheless the pass seemed to be nothing less than a series of rifts or cracks in the mountian range and it went zig-zag in every direction, slanting first up to a great distance,then chagin changing direction to the straight south, then north and slanting down until they were bewildered as to whether they were any nearer to the top of the hills than when they had started before or whether they were literally traveling around the mountian by itself.

''„yhew''said „iolet''We have for the time being escaped those awful „immermannians and Gargoylians and that is one comfort.''

''Probably the Gargoylians or „immermannians are still desperately desperately trying to put out the fire in order to get through and follow us.'' Continued Jennie.''but even if they succeeded in doing so that it would be exceedingly difficult for them to pursue us swiftly is very evident from our own experience here, so I'm sure we need not fear them no longer, but I'm afraid nevertheless this pass may be guarded. who knows.''

Once in while they would suddenly come to a deep crack in the floor of the passage which made the way for them quite dangerous but there was still a strong moonlight shining to give them plenty of light though it was two o-clock in the morning, and also the cracks were notso wide but that at times they were able to either walk or jump over them . but sometimes they had to climb over heaps of loose rocks and stones, where the horses could scarcely go and they had to dismount to lead the poor creatures onward.At such times violet and her sisters and even the soldier all led the horses by the reins and even helped and encouraged them over the roughest places, so they managed by dint of hard difficult and laborious work to keep going onward.But the little party was both weary and most discouraged when at last on turning a sharp corner the wanderers found themselves in a vast plateau a with a large butt arching high above their heads and having a smooth level floor and that the path w led beyond this in a narrow form with a deep abyss on the other side and only wide enough for one to go at a time.

they managed to get past this most dangerous point however without any the falling down beyond the depth and had got beyond the hills at last when far in the distance t near to the ground probably two miles away appeared to their surprise a large group of dull yellow, blue, green, and other lights of all the various colors the artist knows two of them each being always side by side.these were motionless at foist but soon at they watched them they began to flicker more brightly and then to suddenlybeslowly away from side to side and then up and down, and then in circular forms.

"What sort of a place or region is this we are in now?" Asked one of the little girls trying to see more clearly in the doo gloom. "And what are those lights."

"I cannot imagine I'm sure." Answered the other little girls also peering about.

"Woogh!" Marled the soldier as a flash and a crash like a volcanic eruption suddenly flared on the hill top to their right "We are in the path of a artillery duel or other dreadful war action. Did you not see that terrible explosion."?

And only the little girls felt as if their ha hair would stand on end for they were confronted without warning by sixteen men whose had heads like alligators and other terrible creatures for a mask over their natural ones.

Violet and her sisters felt at the moment as if they were going to faint.

"Look at the Gargoylians" She screeched they screeched. "Don't you see their terrible eyes.?"

Violet and her sisters must see p beter in the dark than we can. "Whispered the soldier fingering his revolver. "Tell us little girls what do the Gargoylians look like." He asked addressing one of the little girls.

"I simply cannot describe them." Answered the child with a shudder. "Their eyes are glowing or seem to be big holes in regala hoods or animal formations of heads and their mouths like coal scuttles or something like it. But they are not on horseback."

"Where are they!" Inquired the soldier.

"They are standing right in front of us. Oh Tubby you can't imagine what horried things they seem to be or are. They are uglier than any ordinary Gargoylian we were persund by."

"Tut-tut be carefuly how you all criticise friends." Spoke one of the men nearest to them. "As a matter of fact we want to tell you pretty children than the Gargoylians are regular ugly t looking creature s themselves and not us and I'm sure jus tthe same that you are the loveliest children and prettiest things we have ever seen t in the world."

Hearing these words our friends turned in the direction of the sound and the soldier struck a match and held it so that the small light would flood one of the nearest speakers.

"Why it is a band of Gargoylian guards." He exclaimed. "We are caught".

"No" answered the o wner of the voice while the little girls noticed the distance lights were blin ing at them steadily. "You are all wrong about that entirely. We hope to inform you that we hope to have some Gargoylians some day but just now we are only something else urselves."

"What's that!" Asked violet while she and her sisters gazed fearfully at the great masks, the distant explosions, the flaring lights, and the bombs and rockets flaring and bursting in the air.

"Something that you will know s oon enough of course but we are not going to or not allow ourselves to tell any one who we are untill we get further off to our own destination." Was the reply "I and my companions here know the Gargoylians are very proud and fierce and don't think any one who Worships god amounts to muh much even children, but I'm sure that some day the Angelinians may prove themselves to be more powerful and important than they."

"What do you mean the Angelinians" Asked the soldier looking around him anxiously.

"Why the christians who fight the Gargolinians. We have come up here to hunt for some fugitives we learned about not long ago. If we have good luck some of our friends may bring us a soldier or a bran brace of children known as the vivian girls, or perhaps we may known where they are ourselves."

"Oh are you looking for us!" Enquired violet as she and her sisters drew back in panic.

"Looking for you very hard." Said the s man presentinghis weapon.

"And do you intend to arrest us as spies?"

"We don't know whether you are spies or not but we can accuse any one of being spies if we want to. But spies have been veryvery scarce for a few years and we usually have to contend with fighters instead." Answered the a Gargoylian in a regtr regretful t tone.

"How long have you been loo ing for us!" Enquired Angoline wishing to use conversation long enough to find means to escape them by another way and who started at the strangely fi disguised creatures or men as if fascinated.

"Quite a long time, I grieve to say, and all of my followers, thousands of them including my comrades that you see are have s searched for you fugitives practically the same length of time. If I remember rightly we were looking for you for sixty six hours and two days the day you were known to be wandering about in this region!"

"But that is not loo long." Cried Jennie in amazement.

"No" I prawled the strangely disguised man. "It seems to me very babyish a time."

"How long do you think we have been running about trying to be free!" Asked the little girls in scorn.

"Oh about two thousand hours or minutes long, b t you little beings i with your soldier friend must l have lost track of your time and skipped right into us at last. "We are a little funny you know and afraid of you escaping us or getting away from us or out of our sight again so I believe you better go along with us."

"I think you would be fussy." Agreed violet and her sisters after a moments thought she asked;

"Are we friends or ene i enemies. I mean willyou be good to us if we submit ourselves as irp prisoners or do you intend to place us before a firing squad and shoot us to death." ?

A "As for that we would love to have you accompany us unconditionally my dear fair prisoners but unfortunately you are all armed so that we fear to trust you too near the rebel lines. If you chppse to come nearer you will ruin our purpose and we will all go together in a wink, but unless you o do as we wish some of us will be quite safe. We are some of the Angelinians sent by Hanson looking for you within the rebel territory in disguise."

There was a surprisnly surprisingly accsent accent in the mans voice and at the words all of the others sighed dismally.

Violet and her sisters felt relieved. Presently violet asked.

"Why are you Angolininans. And how did General Hanson come to send you lout after us."

"Oh you little girls never appeared to his headquarters and were gone longer than he hoped for and grew suspicious. He went for a while on one of the hunting trips himself leaving Gen dernine in command of the armies and if we had not been all tied up by freqient fighting with the enemy we would have been able to no time to swarm over the whole region and cut you little fugitives off and the enemy who were persueing you and not let the enemy get into a lot of mischief with you little girls that they did. General Hanson vivian usually knows what he is about but he made a mistake that time, for you were not so sure to escape the rebels as you did and you will not get caught unless you do not doubt us and you won't probab y do that after we show our selves for proof."

And they did.

"No indeed we do not to doubt" said the little girls. "We don't wish to go going through any more experiences just now and be captured again by such awful creatures. But why did you wear such awful disfuises and make us think you were Gargoylians.?"

"Permit me to say." Returned the soldier "that you are rather curious of our carb but nevertheless we had to do so to avoid being caught ourselves. We consider also that in the moonlight you little girls ap e appear more beautiful in in appearance than ever before for nature seems to tell us so, and we know. You little girls who are of an excellany and xand brave family have indeed a pedigree that I or any one else canchallange any other human nbe human beings to equal as it extends back about nineteen hundreed years to the time of the Beautiful Mother of God who lived ina time when most humans then were almost as wicked as the glanddlinians are now. Can any one match that Pedigree little girls."?

"Well said" violet "I and my sisters werd were born someplace in Ohioannia and I guess that is being just as respectable and as haughty as living with the Gargoylians with our hair tied to their knapsacks. If it isn't we will have to stand the misfortune that is all."

"It would taste differe t." Murmured the soldier and then looking in the direction of the lights they saw they were closed untill they looked like half moons. Being reassur reassured by the fact that the soldiers in disguise w re are rew really Angolininans in disguise the l children and their guide took time to examine their disguises more closely. Their head disguises were shaped like those or the Dragonet'es in the story called "Little porothy and in the Wizard in Oz" and were bald as big as small beer barrels and covered with strange greenish scales that glittered brightly under the light of the moonbeams. Their forms were hu ge and big and they were armed like real soldiers with the rifle and bayonet, and sword and brace f of pistols to boot. They wore the regala of the Gargoylians. violet and her sisters though if it had taken them sixty six hours and two days to hunt for them before they were finally found that it would have been fully a hundred days more before they could have hoped to find them had they not accidentally took that passage as done, and that seemed indeed a good title to be rescued.

"It occurs to me "Said the soldier "That we ought to get out of this place or region before our persuers we left behind gets here."

"Don't hurry." Called one of the pretending Gargoylians. "There are over a hundred of us men here in hiding and we would be glad to meet them I'm sure."

"Then you may be right." Replied Jennie "But we are a little particular about associating with them any further and wish to avoid meeting down any more men if possible. But will you kindly tell uswhich is the shortest way to the plains to find the christinn lines."

"That is not a fair question to ask." Declared another soldier "for if we told you truely you and us might go somewhere else by mistake and if we told you a little fair children an untruth we would deserve punishment. Ha some army has gone and we all but must need to find out way to some other christian army. It is our only chance."

"Then do" decided violet "We all must find out our way to some christian army the best we can."

They all started on and soon saw they were guarded by over a hundred men disguised in a similar manner. They however keep a good distance away from the strange blinking lights in the distance and presently discovered that there were two paths leading from the plains or edge of the hills opposite to the point they had just entered and that beyond were dense woods. They selected one of these as a venture and all hurried along it as fast as they could go for they had no idea when the persuers on horseback would come upon their rear and as the rebels were counted and the disguised christian soldiers were not only the guide and the little girls being mounted they did not wish to make their acquaintance out in the open. To worse them terrible rebels out in the open was utterly impossible.

For a considerable distance a very long distance if you please to mention the roadway led straight forward in a gentle incline upward over a s a small foothill and the wanderers now reinforced by soldier friends made such good progress that they all grew hopeful and eager, thinking they might see the christian lines at any mean moment. And they also wished for the good sun to hurry and rise. But at length they came almost unexpectedly upon a huge river which they never knew to be in their way and which shut off their passage from the enemy's region and blocked them from proceeding a single step further. Of course Violet and her sisters were good swimmers and could even stand cold water of any temperture but the river seemed to stretch across so far that the land on the other side could hardly be seen at all and at once they realized from the direction it ran it was the broad Erminis Run. The widest river in the world in this story.

This immense river whose current prevents the river from freezing except near the shore seperated our adventures and friends from the opposite shore or the rest of the way of escape, and here the waters of the river was in motion moving swiftly outheastward and swirling around and the water nearest the shore swirled a loose rock around occ oc asionally as if upon a pivot. When first they came to the river they had thought it was the full sea before them but presently they realized it was a river but with the help of a strong searchlight glaring from somewhere they saw it expose to them at a far distance down the shore a wide sp smooth raft which they felt sure they coulduse to paddle across to the other side. The raft had appeared to them so unexpectedly that they were unprepared to take advantage of it at first and allowed the strong searchlights beams to swing away again before they had decided to declare what lo cation it was in. But nevertheless they knew there was some means to escape and so waited pa patiently untill some light would reveal it a second time. The children and their gi guide was the first one ones to rush up to where it was and sprang upon the immense barge which it was but looked like a raft in the distance the little girls landing softly upon it though a little out of breath just as the foremost of the persuers appeared in the distance and started opening fire upon the soldiers who returned it as they ran for the barge. Soon they were on it the soldiers in the rear coming last and the persueing Landelinians came so swiftly that they almost caught up with their rear for just as the lastof the men leaped to the barge and pushed off with long longpoles the foremost Landelinians came to the river shore and yelled and fired shooting so fiercely that the soldiers would have been annihilated if most of them did not return it promptly. Ten of them fell from the barge into the river and sixteen of them was wounded, the guide also unfrotunately being killed and three of the vivian girls wounded and one of the Landelinians threw a grenade into the barge and the explosion tore a hole in it and made more losses among the soldiers and a thick piece of wood thr torn from the barge by the explosion was hurled against a tree on shore and bow became wedged there. Simultaneously the survi ors and violet and her sisters heard a crunching gridning sound , a loud snap, and one of the poles used by one of the men was broken into two pieces and for the moment while the other soldiers fired upon the enemy the barge had come to a stop with its forward bow almost so close to shore that some of the rebels would have boarded it had not the men sudde nly pushed off with might and main and start down stream.

Violet had a bleeding hand, Jennie arm a was torn by the explosion of the grenade and twenty out of the hundred men were killed, and thirty wounded beside the guide being killed.

"Never mind' said one of the men as the soldiers had discarded their disguises and threw them into the river." e won't allow ourselves to be captured as we don don't wany want you little girls t to go back to them."

"I' not so sure of escaping them at that." Returned Angeline also n nursing a slight wounde." The other column of Landelinians are appearing and following us along the shore. If there is a pontoon bridge beyond our down younder the column of Gargoylians may come down to the river by means of the bridge and catch us there."

"It is possible." Agreed one of the other soldiers' II "If that can prove thepath the rebels usually take." ut I have been examinging this broad river and I do ot see any signs of so large a bridge having crossed it yet at this quarter."""

"If that is the case we are all right then." Said violet whose wounds was being dressed hastily by one of the soldiers not occupied in paddling "for if there is no bridhe bridge across the river the rebels won't have no way whatever to get on it or part way across the stream and then they can't possibly get to us then."

"Of course not my dear little goils." ut there is another thing to consider. The Landelinians probabl knows the road to the nearest telegraph station and if they are going that way the then we are going the wrong way and will be overtaken and made prisoners in a jiffy. Seehow they were following us and some going in another direction. That loo's suspicious." said the soldier.

"Dear me." ried Jennie almost tearfully as her wounded arm pained her badly. "Tha would certainly be unlucky would it not."!

Misery. Unless this river also leads us to some distant christian encampment we are surely lost. For my part if we manage to get out of this region and escape the Landelinian persuers who made such loss a long us I'll be glad if we get some distance before the rebels telegraph."

"So will I." Returned Catherine. "It's enough to have your very pedigree flung in your faces by those saucy Gargoylians. No one knows what the Gargoylians will do when hot after us."

Having gotten out some distance in the stream they moved onward again, one of them keeping the barge steered. The stars were now beginning to grow dim the moon was setting and the first blea ems of morning was starting to show. But their h journey was soon over for in a short time they reached a small cove a mile ahead of the persuers and yet on the same shore and whereas small frozen stream had its outlet into the main river itself. The Landelinians however here had come up faster than they expected and they did not realize their ill fortune at first for their hearts were gladdened by a ran of sunshine coming through a thick mass of trees far beyond them. That meant that the night was ended and that they could see far in the distance that their refuge------the real refuge---was not far away and that for a time the succession of perils and adventures they had encountered had at last brought them near the christian lines or some a christian army which meant home or refuge to them. They could teel for when one of the little girls used the tee telescope they saw Angelinian flags flying. But when the adventures looked more carefully around he them they discovered that if they landed on shore they would in no time be in a strong Landelinian prison where there would be no hope of escape and probably be murdered.

"But we are a m almost near the christian l lines again." cried violet. "For there is the encampment and there comes the sun--the most beautiful sun that shines and announces day." And she pointed englery tward the rising sun and then tward the christian encampment far away.

"Almost being e near the christian lines is not being there." said Nettie, in a discontented tone. "It would not be possible for any of us to get where there-- or through the region we were going to land if we got there as the enemy are moving in boats on the water to head us off if possible."

"It appears that the path of escape ends here then for sure." announced the soldiers, gloomily.

"And there is no way to go back as a we are surrounded by boatloads of rebels." added violet, with a low whist e of perpelexity perplexity.

"I was sure it would surely come to this in the end." Remarked the soldier. "Folks like us don't fall into a nest of dirty rebels and foes of our blessed Lord and then getback again to tel tell their adventures------not in real life." And its whole thing has been unatural because that many of us who were looking for you little girls were killed or wounded by ambuscades we ran into and we don't understand it at allall at all."""""

"And so have we met with fatality right on this bard barrgae." added Angeline "don't forget that many of you soldiers were killed and wounded on this barge right before our eyes without making a single loss to the enemy who fired upon us. Don't forget them either, for they may have us after all. They are closing in on us."

"I met such luck like this before" Said Jennie "and no harm come of it."

"Were you ever shut up on a river by a circle of boats loaded with fierce soldiers before, far out near the middle of the river and within a christian encampment before, with no way of getting out?" Enquired one of the wounded soldiers very seriously.

"Not that we can remember."""" answered violet and her sisters. "but don't lose heart my friends for I'm sure this is not the end of our story by any means."

The reference to the peril they were all in reminded the captian of the gang of soldiers that his men had not enh enjoyed much real fighting and they must be tired of such inaction. So sitting on the barge he talked in whisper to one soldier after another and to violet and her sisters his eyes looked wickedly indeed.

"My dears " He said to them at last with that gleam in his eyes. "I'm afraid ourselves have got you little girls into a lot of trouble, and that you little girls will never be able to escape or leave this gloomy cold river again unless I and my men propose to wage a bloody fight before your very eyes and force our way pass the boats. It is up to you to allow us to do it."

"What's wrong?" asked one of the little girls "we have been in peril for quite a while we know and you may as well explain what has happened.."

The captian told them what they already knew and folded out his plans to them.

"Well said another of the little girls." You are a captian are n you not?"

"Yes, "Replied the soldier porudly.....

"Then you can do exactly as you wish and get us out of this hole." declared the tinest little girl with much confidence.

"I could if y happened to realize the o utcome." Returned the cpa captian sadly. "but I do not my little girls and it seems a humbug or even recklessness to fight our way through the ring of boats."

"Nonsense" Cried all of the little girls at once.

''you can ask my soldiers here.''Said the captian in a an injured tone.
''Well I believe it is true enough.''Returned the little girls earnestly.''ut our situation is merely desperate for the scene here proves it to us. We can ourselves do many wonderful things if we wish to but then it does seem impossible to fight our way pass the boats which are much nearer to us now.''

''Thank you dears for doing me justice.''Responded the soldier gratefully.''To be accused of being reckless by my general when I'm not in a slander I will not tamely submit to. ut I'm sure nevertheless that I'm one of the bravest man that ever lived and you will realize this when you see Im really going to fight my way through for you alone for I for one will not allow you little girls to scatter your bones among those landolinians.'''''''''' remarked Angelina who had been deep in thought.''ut I or my sisters are not going to scatter our bones under the earth for the rebels just yet, be cause we need them, and you soldiers probably need your t yours too for your holy cause.''

''We are helpless to escape otherwise.''Sighed the captian.

''We may be helpless.''Answered Violet smiling at him''but there are others that can do more than we can. Cheer up friends.I'm sure men on signal stations in the christian lines yonder will see t us and the surrounding boats. And Im sure it is Jack Evans army.''

''Jack Evans.''Exclaimed the captian.''ho is Jack Evans.?''

''One of the christian generals who is our guardian and commands a large army.'' was the reply.''He is a great friend us of us, for I and my sisters met him before the outbreak of the war someplace in a hospital in Abbiea ia several years ago and went to Calverinia with him and then to Abbieannidan and back again.''

''or the second time?''Asked the captian with great interst.

''Yes the first time we went to Calverinia the war was already starting. After the Crowley aff r affair I got back with my sisters to Angelinia by means of my friends.''

''I remember those friends.''Said one of the soldiers nodding.''they were soldiers belonging to Concentinian Aronburgs army..ou have some of those very friends here w t with you. o you know where his neice Angelinia Aronburg is just now?!''''

''No I lost track of her lately since urandocallio.''Explained the child. ''But The second time I and my sisters went to Abbieannia My father owned an immense manison in the cirt of Pandora or Mic-hollester I believe which is much more beautiful beautifully formed than any building you see here.''

''nd who has charge of the signal stations of t you yonder army?''

Enquired the captian who had listened with great interest and wondering why the surrounding boats always kept their distance from them.

General Ozma had h e arge of them for he alone has men to signal as he has no other or any boyscouts and their powers won't work for him rightly in acommon ordinary way like other signal stations. Anyone in Evanss army can do anything on these signal stations so he has left it in charge of the general who used the men to watch out for an thing suspicious. We were once persued and he used the men w to help us out of the trouble then.''

''nd were you saved?''Asked one of the soldiers astonished at what he heard.

''Of vouse course. Just in fifteen minutes.And general Ozma an old man of seventy years of age had a very tall signal station built everything Evans encampes near a river and men are on it that can see the exact scene they wish and even where their friends may be at any times they choose. All they have to do if they see us is to say something to the guards below and at once the news is communicated to the lines by telegraphand reports what every thing is he sees and just as if it was real majic. That seems like majig does it not captian. Well every day while the encamment may be by a river and the station erected near it Evans ha s promished to have men always on the lookout and if I or my sisters or any of my friends are in need of help and he sees it he will make a certain signal or sign and the officer below the station will notify the other signal station by five drum like reports and in a few minutes our enemenies will ha e a hot time of it.''

''o you mean that general Ozma's signal men will see us right here surrounded by boats and see al of us here in peril and what we and the enemy are doing?'' demanded one of the soldiers.

''Of course.''he replied with a laugh at his startled expression.

''and when the man on top of the station makes a-sign to the man below below he will bring us rescue at quick as possible.''ontonued continued the soldier.

''That's it exactly w as I said before my telegraph.''

''Then ''Said the captian you will be saved little girls and I am very glad of it. Bu but I'm afraid the restof us will die fighting to delay time for the signal men ad we can do it much more cheerfully when we know you have escaned our sad fate.''

''You won't need to die cheerfully.''Protested violet and her sisters.''here There is nothing cheerful about dying that I could see who there is no need to do so.

''ave you ever seen any one die fighting yet?''Enquired the captian.

''No and I not anxious to see it beginnaga again like it did when we first got on the barge.''Said the little girls.

''Don't worry dear friends.''violet exclaimed''If I was big enough I would hold you boys in my arms and take you with me at the same time and avoif avoid fighting through.''

''ut the Glandelinians may take us too.''

''Take us too.''Cried all of the girls on one breath.

''Perhaps they can.''Answered violet finally.''I believe we may as well try our fightin fighting through.

''Could not one of you little girls manage to hold me o in your arms?'' asked the captian jokingly as he saw the boats s o slowly re eding for some cause.

violet laughed at that.

''I'll do better than that .'' he promished''or I can easily a have all of you promoted for helping usthrou h through me on ce we are back in the christian lines safe.''

''ow''Asked the captian.

''By help of the signal station as I said befre. 'll we need to do is have patience for the rebel boats are retreating for some cause and I think we won't need to depend on signals at all.''

''Good.''Cried the Captian.''omething is making them go''

''I think I know general Jael Evans at that and general Ozmatoo.''Remarked the captian in a thoughtful tone and I'd like to see them again for I was very happy among the Angelinians under generals winkie, uadling, and Gilikin.''

''hoe are those generals?''Asked the little girls.

''The four oldest genera, in the army that served two months ago under Evans''Wad the reply.''I wonder if they would treat me nicely if I went to his lines again.''?

''Of course they would.''peclared violet''hey will be still more proud of their former friend and have often spoke of you kindly to me when they learned if you.''

''o you little girls happen to know whatever became of the two little girls Jennie urmer and Angeline ichee!!!!!!''he enquired.

''hey are with concentinian Aronburgs army yet''Said the girl''And in his command are very important children indeed.''

''And general James Gannon?''

''Oh hes still in the army too with general ivian. nd our good brothers are there too now because he lik they liked to be closer to their father and uncle and would not go back to any other command.''

''I'm afraid I don't know your two brothers.''Said the captian shaking his head''Is general Billinia Greatheart still in command of the armies.''

''no he operates an independent army of his own and is also a great friend of mine too and of my sisters. you are sure to like general Greatheart when you know him.''Asserted. Catherine herself.

''Your friends sound like a great eneration.''Remarked the captian almost uneasily.''Couldn't you wish to have more than those for friends?''

''Don't worry ''Replied the littleb girls.''You will even love all our friends when you get acquainted.''What time is it now captian?''

The captian took out his watch-- a big silver one that he carried in his uniform jaskets pocket.

''Half past eight?''''''He said.

''It will take us half an hour more to paddle down tward the christian encampment.'' he continued''but it won't take long to be within the lines after that.''

They stood silent on the raft for some time while the men with the poles paddled and pushed untill it went a good rate. hen the captian suddenly asked.

''nd where did youssecure these horses on the raft?''

''Only from the F Gargoylians''Replied violet''and they are all good steeds.''

''From the what?''

''he Gargoylians.''Jennie and our poor guide who was killed secured them when we were prisoners in the Gargoylian encampment.''

''Were you little girls in their camp prisoners?'' asked the captian wonderingly.

''Yes they assaulted us first and then captured us. ut we got away from them and secured their horses which we have now.''

''nd the sweetest loveliest little girls in the world accomplo accomplished allthis.''

''Yes sir.''

''he Gargoylians ride the swiftest horses in the world.''Remarked violet with a laugh.

''hey can while their horses are alive.''Acknowledged one of the other little girls to return the joke.''ut if the Glandelinians could only ride sawhorses for a change maybe we could trot our own faster than they can and be very wise too.''

''Pah.I'll race the miserable horses of the Gargoylians any day in the week or month.''Cried one of the soldiers defiantly..

None of the vivian girls made any reply to this. he and her sisters indeed felt that the soldiers would know o more about the Gargoylian horses later on.The time dragged slowly and wearily enough to the eager expantants but finally one of the soldiers announced that the christian encampments showed in sight already and violet and her sisters caught themselves by the hands and began to watch for the signal that she had predicted to be seen from the encampment when to the rear a strange roaring noise was heard whoch startled them all.

They looked around suddenly and saw approaching far to their right an immense gray floating fortrrr fortress nearly a thousand feet long with immense guns and followed by aline of them beyond all flying the Angelinian flag.

''No wonder the rebel boats suddenly gave us up.''Said violet fuklly surprised. ''Oh''they saw the warships approaching and flew.It's funny we did not see them at all.''

''Nothing seemed to happen or at least they may have been out of sight.''said one of the soldiers doubtfully as they landed.''

''Oh but we must give Our Lord time to do His will.''Replied the little girls as they went tward the christian lines.

She had a scarcely spoken the words when the first warship suddenly disappeared in an approachin fog pall and with her went the rest of the ships and soon the fog envel ped everything about the children and soldiers alsoThere had been no appearance at first of the coming of the fog nor any warning. One moment they had seen the ships and a moment laterthey had all seen the big ships disappear into the fog and then it struck them also al and all trees and the christian lines could not be seen. And it was not steam fog but a sudden dense pall of flying snow that had struck. A snow sq uall had broken out. violet and her sisters had noticed the sun a little before go under clouds of great thick ness but e had not thought much of it. ow a sudden blizzard was raging.

''Thelieve we will follow in the right direction nevertheless.''

Announced the soldier captian in a tone of great relief''for I know something of the direction we had been heading. Let us be ready however to answer the challenge of the christian sentries for we may encounter them at any moment for they could hear out our approaching footsteps. He and the little girls and the soldiers had put their pistols saftly away in their hostlers and shouldering their muskets they had went forward cautiously.

''Will this snowstorm hurt the christian encampments much?''Asked violet in a voice t that trembled a little. ''The wind and snow is getting too fierce for anything.''

''Not at all unless the wind grows to ahurricane.''Replied the captian.'' but such storms f generally happen in a wink and may not be of long duration unless it is extensinve.''''''''

.The nevertheless reached the christian lines saftly but just the sto same the stormed raged all day and the following night proving to be probably the worse and heaviest blizzard of the whole winter if you may believe itt.

CHAPTER FIFTY TWO....

ALL THE OLD FRIENDS OF VIOLET AND HER SISTERS ARE REUNITED.!!!

The Angelinian boyscout called Jimmie Anders gave a nervious start and began to rub his eyes and make sure he was not asleep. wor they had on the following morning of the blizzard found themselves snowbound in thecompany streets of a vast yet beautiful christian encampment of city of encampments bathed in the snowpappall of the storm and it growing dark with the thickening of the clouds he could see a strange but grateful green light flickering from somewhere that was especially pleasing to his eyes, and he was surrounded suddenly by merry faced purple uniformed soldiers in gorgeous green and gold decorations over their jackets of many extraordinary designs.Before him was the gates of an immense building, and as he was escorted to it the men there slowly opened the a gates as if inviting the boy to enter the yard whereon a splendid trees were growing and which were seen dimly in the clouds of flying but pretty and big snowflan flakes which flew like a sea of white faires through the air before the gale of wind.

The boy who was on horseback shook the reins to rouse his horse from his stuper for so many soldiers were beginning to gather around and stare at the stranger.

''Gid-dap.''Cried the boyscout and at the word the horse slowly trotted through the snow into the yard and carried the boy along the snow covered drive way to the great entrance where upon dismounting''you would believe it many soldiers and eve officers and dome generals dressed in the most handsome and purple uniforms stood ready to welcome the new arival--the bot-- and when the boy finally dismounted a pretty girl in a purple gown cried out in surprise;

''Why it is Penrod/ the wonderful Angelinian boyscout come back to our ranks again.''

The boy looked ar her closely and then shook both the little maidians hands in his and shook them verycordially.

''On my word.''''''He exclaimed.''It's little Gertrude Vivian one of the Vivian girls my little Jellia Lamb--as pertandas pret y as ever. How is everything Angelina?''

'why not James Penrod ???''''asked Angeline bowing low and looking her in her most friendly manner at him.''but I'm afraid you cannot command any boyscouts here as you used to because we now have seen them boys sent to Consantinian Aronburge command from here a general whom all loves dearly.''''''

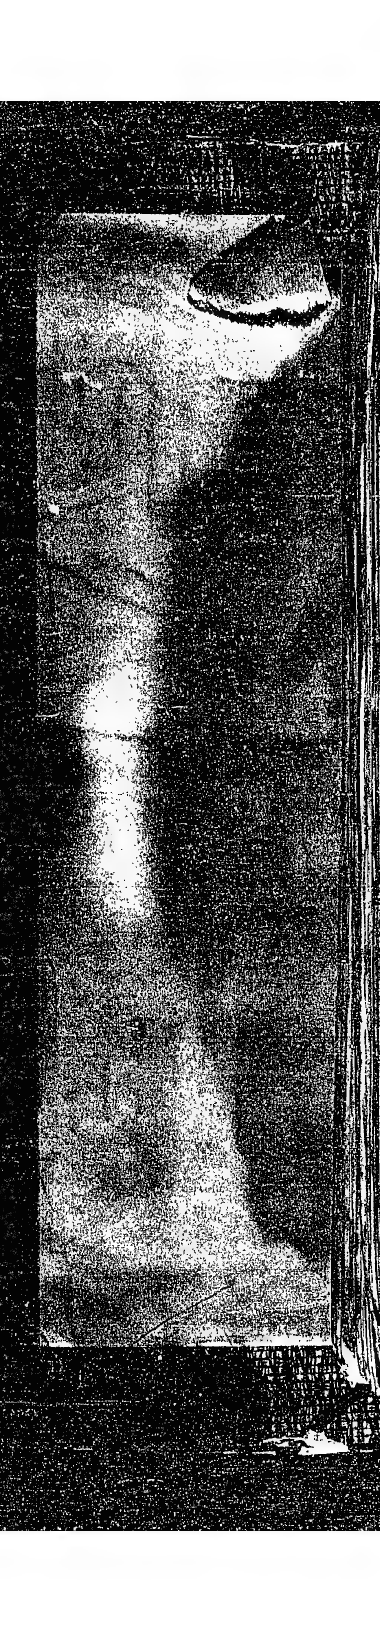
''Yet our soldiers will not and do not willingly part with you dear Penrod''she added as a soldier approached that wore a captian generals uniform and of bright scwalet color. The boy penrod turned to looked at him.

''Did you not see the vivian girls at one time?''The general asked almost seriously for at times he did not like to see too many callers for them at such an unusual peroid.

''Yes ''Said the boy.''but I have been sent to them with a message in person for one of them by general Consantinian Aronburg. and also I have not seen them for a very long time.''

''Well that is nice''Said the general more pleasantly.''But I assure you my good lad that I do not always wish to have too many intrude upon the Vivian Girls when they had just escaped from a series of perils.''He added earbestly. ''But I,ll let you through ''He continued seeing Angeline Angelinas reproachful look ''In that case as you have the notefor them or one of them you are welcome.''

It pleased the boy however to note the res respect which the generals retainers bowed before him a simple boyscout. But nevertheless his fame had not been forgotten in theland of Calverinia by any means.



The boy asked who the Captian general of the christian armies was but they shook their heads and said;

''Be careful and do not question about him.He is very strick strict and a very serious man.That is general Frank Osma.''

''Where is the Vivian Girls or her sisters.''Enquired Penrod anxiously, as he left his horse and stood beside his friend little Angeline Vivian.

''he and her sisters are in general Evans headquarters in his preivate room with him.''Replied Angeline Vivian herself.''But my sisters have seen you come through this snowstorm and at my request we have decided to make you as welcome as if you were one of our brothers and to show you your apartments while you remain here.''''''

The boy looked all around him with eyes full of wonder. such such magi ian magnificence and wealth which was seemed to be displayed inthis big building was more than he hadever dreamed of of seeing within the christian lines before and he could scarcely believe that all the gorgeous glitter was real and not merely unsel. All this had been in the possession of the Landelinians before but the advance of Major Evans army had drove before it the whole rebel army without battle and so this was the reason so much splendor within the christian lines.

''Whar is to become of mythorse?''Asked the lad almost uneasily. He had seen considerab condi considerable life in the arn army camps before and felt that such a regal pal palace like this was surely no place for him and felt embrassed.. It perplexed Angeline ivian, for a time to know what to do with the animalfor in this vinicity was a strong ch christian cavarly force and al, the stalls for such horses were occupied.And the pretty little maidian was indeed astonished at the sight of so unusual a creature as his horse for he had a peculiar red haired horse which were almost unknown in any land but neverthaless those who lived any where in this world or in the Realmns of the Unreal are always apt to be astonished by any queer sights,so after inspecting the horse and noticing the mild look in his eyes the little vivian girls decided not to be afraid of him or the horse.

''here are no mo more stables or stalls for the horse here''Said one of the h soldiers''Unless some have been built elsewhere in the encampment while you h v have been away.''''

''We have nee never needed extra ones before.''newered Angeline''or the hundreds of thousands of cavarly horses and the ones T and my sisters brought with us have stalls now of their own and all those horses also are much smaller and more natural in appearance than this great horse of red hair the boy has brought with him.''

''o you mean that my horse is a freak!''Asked Penrod with a laugh.

''Oh no''she hastened to say smiling in return''there may be many more horses like yours in the plance you came from but in this part of the country a horse with red skin and hair in very unusual a d and probably almost a freak.''

This surprised the lad a little more and now after some thought if you please to mention the pretty little maidian decided to give his horse a room somewhere in major general Evans's palace or headquarters-------such a big building as she knew had many rooms that were seldom in use though usually it was a very queer place to put a horse.

So thelan lad took the reins from the horse and took off the saddle, and several of the soldiers at her request then led the big red horse around to the rear of the building where it was brought through the cellar way into the place and where the soldiers selected a nic large apartment where the horse could have all the room to himself and oats and hay was brought for him and water too.

The Angeline said to the lad;;;;;

''our own room--which is back of general Evans councilvroom h as been vacant ever since one of our generals left us to go to immermanns army. would you like to have it for your own.''

''Yes indeed.''Returned the brave little boy.''It will seem like being at home again anyway and wi with you and your sisters around and so loving and pretty as you are I would like to live near you for all my life if need be.''

He was led the way to it, and two sl soldiers followed him carrying his army canteen and satchel. He was graciously escorted to the rock--the room being so grand and beautiful that at first the lad almost or did fear to sit in the chairs or lie upon the bed lest he might a cidentally dim their splendor. In the closets he discovered many fancy army cu stems of rich velvets belonging to the rebels who had fled and also strange army brocades and one of the attendants who was a sergeant told him if he wanted to masue himself to dress himself for a while in any of the rebels clothes that pleased him but to take them off when prepared to dine with Major General Jack Evans and violet and her si t sisters in an hours time. opening from the main chamber was a fine stately bathroom having a large m marble tub with hot and perfumed water; so the brave boyscout still dazed indeed by the strange novilty of his surroundings indulged in a good bath instead of l playing with the clothing of rebels and selected a maroon velvet christian boyscout uniform with silver and gold buttons to replace his own snow soiled and much worn uniform. there were also purple silk stockings for his sis size, and hard leather purple shoes with diamond buckles to accompany his new uniform custom, and when he was fully dressed at last the boyscout indeed looked much more dignified and imposing than ever beforein his life.

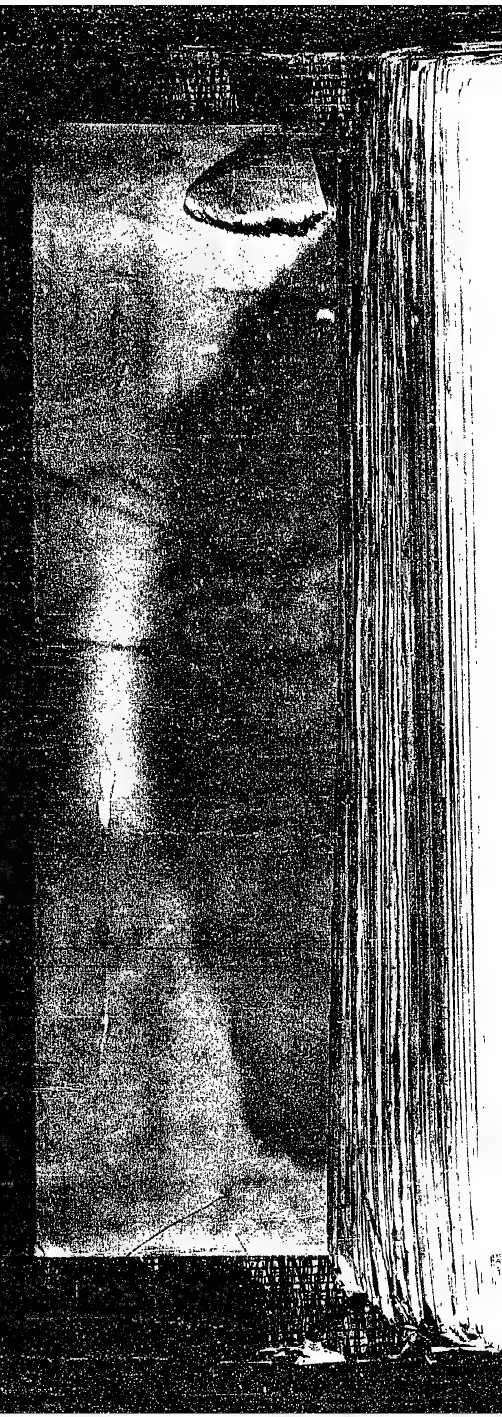
Penrod was all ready when a soldier who acted as an attendant for him came to escort the lad to the presence of t he general and the vivian girls, and it would not be any surprise at all to mention that he followed b bashfully and almost afraid and soon was ushered int o a large room more dainty and yet more attrat attractive than it was splendid. Here he found the great general seated beside six young i or pretty little girls so marvelously beautiful indeed that the boy stopped sudde nly with a gasp of admiration and was too embrassed to proceed.

But one of the little girls sprang up and ran to seize her friends hand drawing him impulsively tward her lovely little sisters wh who smiled most graciously and r prettily upon their guests. hen another general entered n and his presence and the presence of some of other officers and soldiers relieved his embrassment. The general and officers and soldiers entering were uniformed in red with many sparkling golden ornaments decorating their breasts but the bald head of the general and his white whiskers and wrinkled features , made him appear more a usi ng than impressive.General Jack Evans had been curious to meet the little boy who had done so much with his boyscout companies already for his country and who had served so gallantly under generals Gilikin jensin, Quadling nter, and winkor Saunderson, so when all were seated pleasantly at the generals dinner table one of the little girls said;

''Please tell me lad Penrodwhether yo you happened upon any adventure you could call for yourself thrilling or whether you believe the vivian girls went through more exciting experiences than you. It is a matter that I have long wished to enquire about bec n because though you fight or servethe Angelinian army you my lad are of a strange race and nation, and my name is general Jack Ambrose Evans and ma an Albiancanian. no one however I am sure is able to better explain this mystery than you. What it is it they call the Aronburg Mystery I a have heard so much about?''

''That is true.''n swered the little boy' therefore it would surely give me great pleasur indeed to ex lain my connection of brave deeds with those of violet and her sisters but in the first place I cannot explain anything about the Aronburg Mysto ry as I'm not allowed to do so under orders of general Hanson Angelic vivian himself, nd again in the first place I must tell you that I was born in the city of Omaha in Protestentia and my father who was a soldier in a war with Bloomlinia called d Mc Oscar James Penrod. I have already served under other g generals besides those three you mentioned and they were generals Oc Oscar Stanck, Frank porouster, Franklin Phadrig, Isaac picksen, norman pinkle, Emmanuel Francis, Ambrosie jig s and General ndrsn Andrew Gumplin but t ed o do not think I went through any other experience excepting when on the signal towers when under fire from the rebel batteries.Takal Taken altogether it was a dreadfully long time of experience I went through and one of the hardest lessons I ever learned in my life was to remember not to get into the way of any squadron of wheeler Gargoylians on horseback.I was Pinheaded enough once to do so and had to run my horse ten miles without stopping untill it became so jaded I had to abandon it and swim cross a wide river under fire to escape them. But I do think however that violet and her sisters went through greater and more dangerous experience than I did but what I went through only once as I already mentioned I had prayed I never would do again.''

''Surely no one could blame you for cutting yourself our out of as many experiences or dangerous adventures as possible.''Said general Evans very sympathetically.''But did you not think it was rather cowardly to run from them like you did and cut your experience too short.''?



''Perhaps so.''Replied the boy''But at that time I had some very important dispatches in my possession I did not wish o have the enemy get hold of as it would be the ruin of the Angelinian cause altogat her and I be held the fate of the christian cause in my hands at that very critical moment. When I escap escaped the Gargoylian troopers I swam all the way across the Mic-Hollester pun iver and those who rescued me called me a wizard as I was thought to be the first boy who ever swimmed across so large a river. I heard also strange noises at the time I crossed the river which put me in mo mind of somebody doing tt tricks ofventriloquism.''

''hat does that mean!''Asked violet.

''someone who could throw their voice into any b object he or she pleased to make it appear as if said object was speaking instead of the t other person. At a nother time of same day I was persued again by other rebels and had to climb high into a hill and hi hide in a deep cavern to escape the rebels. hen I went till I secured from a rebel encampment without being seen a scouting ball baloon and finally escaped the Hamelinians by making a baloon ascension. On that day a gale blew up and the baloon ran away with me beyond my control and brought me across a desert untill I managed to drop myself into Hansons lines safe and sound . hen the soldiers at first saw me and the ballon coming they naturally though thought me a strange creature and as it was an enemy balloon they believed at first I was a rebel boyscout as I wore the disguise to escape the rebels butnevertheless I wo proved who I was and when they saw my dispatches they called me the greatest little hero on earth.''

''Now I really begin to understand that you and the vivian girls are equal in experiens experiences of several but theirs are more numerious or were.''Said the general smiling.

''t that time.''ontinued the boy Penrod busi busily eating his soup while talking''General Hansons army was seperated into four ermafous encampments each one of them being ruled or co commanded by great generals, Hanson, his brother Robert vivian, general Richard Kindernins and Jacob Baldwin.The soldiers in the army at first th ught I was one of the little Vivian girls in disguise and perhaps the generals thought so too as I am as you see y so handsome looking and they treated me very nicely and no one who were boys scouts dared to oppose me when they found out as well as the generals and soldiers that I was really a boy and nothing else.At the time I landed in the baloon general Hanson had ordered a long line of immense and strong fortifications to be built or constructed just in front of the four immense encampments and when it was completed I was watching the ending of the work and was suddenly confronted by a general who told me I was to be placed in charge of many boyscouts and had been brought before generals Munchkins and Gillikins to be given the commission and then generals winkies and Quadlins com confirmed it. Over these boys I was placed three days later untill I grew lonely and wished to go back to general Evans army again and at least see my friends the little vivian girls once more. o when this snowstorm started early this morning accompanied by thic thic cyclonic windstorm I arranged to go to your lines for concentinian Aronburgs army is only two miles away, but by first horse was shot from under me by rebels hiding in ambush probably some of those looking for violet and her sisters but nevertheless I escaped by hold of the a snow pall and secured the horse I have now from a friendly Calverinian farmer who is strong for our cou cause.After that one adventure to day I reached a portion of your encampment far from here only to find that my little pretty and Good friends were far a a away in the centrd centre of the lines. o having nothing else to do I took out my horse and proceeded on my way through the centre of the encampments always announcing to very sentry I happened to see where I a g am going and got here just in time and was let i by dear little Angeline who came out to greet me in the open despite the raging storm...."

"That is quite a bitt history."Said general Jack Evans' n t there is a little ore history about these fo four encampments of the vast christian army that you my little boy do not seem to understand------perhaps for the reason that no one ever told you.. Many year days before you came down into Hansons lines in that baloon this encampment had been united into one as mine is now, and the main general has been Concentin n Aronburg himself. ut a little before that as I happen to know from your des r description of the four encampments four rebel generals leagued together to despose of general Hansons army which was moving upon the region of rminie Creek to reinforce his brothers army at the small town od mbi and thus overrunning the region have a clear sweep to move against orothy Ga e gale Gale And Ozma and capture Angelinia Agatha so when the Rebels came up they encountered general Robert ivians army near Mombi and Ozama and attempting to steal a lot of provisions from the christian armies started a fierce and bloody battle at Erminie Creek which resulted in the death of over three hundred generals and a tragid death of some little girl. The rebel generals would have divided u up their four immense armies, but a portion of i t e got barred by Hansons army and could not come on and so general vivian escaped and Angelinia Agatha was saved as the enemy had changed their course of advance.. hat was why the many Angelinian generals were so gald to see general Hansons army coming to the rescue of Angelinia Agathia and Ozma and Dorothy Gale, and why they thought from the disaster at the battle of Erminie Creek or Mombi that Angelinia Agatha was in dire danger."

"But at that time said the boy so early in summer" there were two other great generals near by and two rebel generals and their armies which could have advanced had they not feared the immense mobolized armies at Ozma town."

"Yes replied general Jack Evans' Because general Hanson had an immense army which could have conqured all the rebel s combined. ut nevertheless Mombi town was recaptured by Hans n iv a vivian later on. hen the disaster had occured before however after the battle transformed the region int o devastation some of the retreating armies of general ivians main command transformed themselves by disguise into temporary rebel troops to decieve the enemy and with the hope that no one would recognize them and know that they were t retreating christians. ut nevertheless general vivians whole army leaderless as it was(General ivian having been wounded) escaped to general Hansons command saftly and through Hansons efforts to restore all order out of disaster by crushing the enemy at Angeline Junction I suppose Angelinia Agatha was saved."

"I am very glad of that." aid the boy Penrod" nd now hope you will surely consider me one of you r most faithful and de devoted subjects and to serve for the cause as long as I live the war through."

"We certainly owe a great deal to the wonderful and brave boys outs of Angelinia."Continued the general"For it was many of your boys who saved general vivians army from destruction at that fearful battle."

"My boys did it at my own command."He answered."O I only bossed the job as they say in Protestantia."

"But you directed the boyscouts wisely and well for all those terrible moments at that fatal Erminie Bridge."Said violet herself" and made many of the soldiers and surviving generals proud of your act.So as you are now too far to wander back to Zimmermanns army I offer you a shelter here as long as you desire to stay with us. you sh shall be theOfficial leader of my own companies of boyscouts as soon as I can bring them to you and be treated with every respect and consideration."

"I kindly accept your kind offer with all the grattitude I can presume my gracious little friends."The little boy hero said, in a soft voice, and they all could see that tear drops were standing in his keen young eyes. It indeed meant a good deal to him indeed to secure an honor from such little girls as these..

" He may be able to make a humbug out of os some of the landelinians I'll bet you."Said violet smiling at him.

"And that is the safest saftest kind of a boy scout leader to have."Replied general Evans promt promptly.

"The boy can do some tricks which would frustrate the enemy at anything."announced Jennie who was now feeling more at ease ease."

"He shall amuse us with some of his trick to morrow if he likes."Said the general gravely."I have sent messengers to summon all of me officers and friends of you little girls to meet you and give you welcome, and they ought to arive very soon. And I had some telegraph to Hanson that you little girls are safe in my lines."

Indeed the dinner was no sooner finished than in rushed two more men Gertrude Angelina herself and Jennie urmer to hug Violet and her sisters in their arms and tell them lonently how glad they were to see them again.The great general himself was also most heartily welcomed by the friends of violet and her sisters, the little girl also being a important impersonage in general Evans army.

"How is your health Gertrude Angelina my friend." Enquired the great general as he grasped her lovelingly into his arms.

"My health is working fine." answered the little girl bravely and not at all shy. "I'm very certain general that Hanson Vivian are going to leave the commands we have here before Vivian ickey and go to Angelinia Agathia to take more armies to move north northward and try again on Calverine and a bienne and also pannia. Im very certain that you generals and soldiers and you my fair little friends the vivian irls gave me the best reception in th th t he world for I can feel happy again after my recent ish misfortune.

"How long did you suffer from your wounds you recieved two weeks ago?" was the next question.

"Quite a while untill I was brought back to health by the doctors and the nurse who attended me. I also heard already that general Jinjur is approaching with his christian forces with his assistant general Olinida Good and after I heard this I thought I would let you know. General Woodman and Nick Chopper are alsocoming and so general Mansion will certainly have a lot of help when general Hans Hanson and the others go off and leave him in chief command of the seige."

Just then a loud noise was heard outside and when the servent threw open the door with a low bow a yellow uniformed general trutted in. V violet and her sisters up sprang forward and each little girl was caught in his arms as they at the same time uttered a glad cry.

"Oh John Evans" they cried"How fat and strong you are now."

"hy shouldn't I be?"Asked the general in a sharp clear voice."I live on the fat of the enemy--doj don't I brother Jack."?

"You have captured everything you had wished for in your fierce raids." said Jack Evans his brother.

Around this generals neck was a yellow color. iolet nestled hi herself comfortably in the generals lap. He told her how a captured rebel gave a snarl of anger when he heard of the escape of the vivian girls but the general s i said that when the rebel insulted them the guards who had him in their possession gave him a severe cuff which made the rebel hushl up in a jiffy..

"How horrid those glandelinians certainly must be."Cried Jennie."I believe it is the way they would treat any children anyhow."

"The glandelinians are quiter people it seems to be."Replied Angeline in a sad tone.

"Seems to me the same way."Said Jennie scornfully"They are worse than any beastly wild cats."

"Look here "Said Joice sternly"I am good as you all know but I won't have any glandelinians insulting me or my sisters or any one else I can tell you. Not within the christian lines especially and if any rebels are caught m by me at such talk unless they repent of it Ill notify them to my father or uncle and have them placed before t e the firing squad. im ediately. o there."

It was not long after those days the glandelinians had heard of that threat and knowing the vivian girls would keep it they became much frig frightened especially the prisoners alone but nevertheless it was never noticed that the glandelinians ever respected the ivian ir Grisl Girls for all that.

And now some more of their friends arived and one was general wienstine his uniform being most beautifully decorated with medals.that shone splendidly in the r brilliant light of the room. General wienstine lo ved iolet and her sisters and even Gertrude Angeline most tenderly and welcomed with you their return from the enemys prison camp.

"Sir"Said he to general Jack Evans"I can never thank you enough for the excellant aid you have given me. It has also made you and me many friends Im sure and I can assure you that y own heart beats as fully and as lovingly for iolet and her sisters and for you and others as it ever did."

"I'm glad to hear that"said general Jack Evans."I was sometimes afraid that you would get proud after that victory you won at Sunbeam Creek."

"Not all at all "Returned the general"I keep down proud manners finely, and also always preserve my own could for god alone."

The boy Penrod was a litt le shy when first introd e introduced to all these people he had never seen before, but he was a friendly and they also and so sincere that he soon grew to admire them ver much indeed even finding some good qualities in Jack Evans brother. But he became nervious again when the next visc visitor was suddenly n announced.

"This coming"Said general Jack Evans "Is the sumprese Angelinian general M.A Vivian who always assit assisted m armies and other commanders when in great distress and is now proposing to leave all of his armys before ivian ickey, draw all his old commanders away from it place reliable generals in their stead and than take up new armies from Ozma and move on to Calverine once more. we are going to have exciting times I can te tell you."

"Ah "Said the other generals" We are pleased to meet so distinguished personage."

"General Hanson Angelic, Proud Head Vain Glory High Toned, Make Believe Hero Hanson Angelic Vivian and then some."Said a general striding in pompously and with a smile on his face and they all caught his joke as the general always joked with friends whether lower than himself or even privates."I'm also highly Magnified and throughotly Educated. nd I am in realty a big humanbug, a very big bug and doubtless the most intelligent being in all this broad domain."

''How well you disguise your true character.''Said general Evans after saluting and laughing as well tas the others.''But any of us do doubt your words at any time.''

''Everybody doubts it general.''Replied the great general wearing a lieutenant uniform instead of his own and drawing a note book from his pocket the handsome general turned aconsof the leafs to look at somet ing he had written down. „obody minded this as no general cannon really occupied this building so they straightway forgot a'l o as and joined in a merry conversation that kept them well amused until evening arrived.

when he had come to select this f mous building for his headquarters, not for splendor of for richness but just t o spite the re'els he had captured it from general Hanson had selected for general Jack evans and for his little neices and even Gertrude Angelina two large rooms with a strange green marble floor and carved mah marble wainscotting which indeed was so stately and beu be beautiful in its appear ance that it would have awed any poorer person. Violet and her sisters having been through all kinds of poverty buildings and of aple d splendid buildings accepted the room offered to them as a mere deta l detail, and at their command beforethe arrival of the boy the attendants had given their weather worn clothing which they had removed after coming home a good cleaning, combed their hair for them just as they liked it after the little girls had taken their baths and changed their clothes. hen after comrods arival the attendants had told the little girls that di r would be ready and the little girls indeed feeling very hunfry after their trying exp experiences had replied in a friendly and g d manner that they could not serve it too quickly to suit their convenience. ut at the time the table had been set before Penrod was admitted into the building one of the attendants had been half a asleep at his work from overad ring violet and her sisters and had first brought what was supposed to be a steaming bowl of soup for general Jack Evans but instead brought a small dishpan full of dirty dish water and to his dismay h d set it down efore him.

''Are you getting nutty?'' Take that stuff away.''He commanded. ''do you take me and the little girls for gut'ersnips or salamanders to give us dishwayer for soup.''?

he attendant had t therefore obeyed at once a d but being stupid had brought a large urbot on a solver plat er of great size with drawn gravy and some solid poured over it.''

''pish''cried general Evans, with a sniff.''po you take us and the little girls for Tom Cats. his is not Friday but sunday. away with it and quick about it t oo.'' the nutpid soldier was a little discouraged but soon another soldier brought in a great tray containing two dozen nicely roast d roasted quail on toast.

''We ll well ''Said ge oral Jack Evans now throughotly provoked. ''d o you take us forwoonals. ow at upid and ignorant you are for an at attendant and what dreasful things you are feading us. s there nothing more decant to eat in this building. what have to you got in here anyway.''

he trembling soldier left and Evans sent for the St w Steward who came in haste and said;

''I recisved your summons your excellency. hat would you like to see us about.''

''our ' Excellency ' repeated Evans, who was unusual to such titles.''I'm no supretendant general yet.''

''You are a high officer your h nor and you are higher than any one here accept his Excellency general Hanson ivian.''said the steward.

''all his excellency would like something to eat for the little girls here '' Declared general Evans.'' nd not fish, ishwater or Birds.''

''fish . dishwater. And Birds. I never sent no such things to you.'' he Steward replied with much difference.''but there is a great quanity of chicken, granberries, ive Cr m and Ice Creams and other food which we were preparing .''added the Steward humbly.

''well bring it on quick.''said the genera/ gonefa general.''Fr Fetch it on but don't take from now untill a week after as the little girls are hungry.''

You must see my dear readers though general Jack Evans is always respectufl respectufl respectful he is at t imes a little arrogant. owever evans wanted to see that violet and her sisters got everything they desired and also the coming lad for they were treated as more than guests and he did not wish to have many one he loved slighted by any means.. hat evening after supper the little girls and the others had all retired and slept on the softest beds the they had ever known in their lives. In the following morning as soon as it was daylight, as nothing unusual was stirring violet and her sisters nd and Penrod decided or resolved to take a walk no matter how cold it be or how stormy it was and try to find some more information ab ut the enem in pat particular so they ambled calmly through thehandsome arch of the doorway turned the corner of the building, wherein others except the generals seemed asleep and came face to wi face with a strange l ind in the uniform of a glandolinian boyscout and whom they had never seen before. Pend Penrod and violet and her sisters stopp d abruptly, being startled and amzed amazed. he lad himself stopped at the same time and stared at the boy and the little girls in bewilderment and admiration combined. he strange l d a lad was mounted upon a horse with queer prot uding eyes. the legs of the horse was covered with something resembling pantsand its tail was like a small branch that may have been cut off some time ago by a ccident and his mouth was almost funny despite the coldness of the day. he horses hoofs were shod with braz horseshoes and the saddle he was the boy was mounted upon was of scarlet red leather set with sparkling ornaments and was strapped to the horses body if you please to menti ion.

violet and her sisters were almost as astonished and as bewildered as the stranger and they stare stared at thw lad on the alert while the boys horse had his ears erect and his long head drawn back untill it rested against his arched neck. In this almost comical position the oy and the party wh who met him looked at one another closely for a while each being unable to realize what the singular part y or boy might be. hen Penrod exclaimed;

''For Goodness sake what sort of a lad are you. A rebel boyscout!''

''I'm a boyscout but no rebel''Replied replied the other.

''Oh I believe I hear much about boyscouts''said Penrod ''but you with your garb are unli e anything I have ever heard of before and unlike anything I expected to see. And the way your horse appears is kind of absurd.''

''I don't doubt it.''the stranger observed with almost a tone of pride''I am considered quite an unusual boy and you would think so too if you knew me.''

''you are indeed quite unusual.''But that - rickey fleshy thing r you are riding has no right t o be alive.''

''I cannot help the condition of my horse.''returned the other rather crest fallen. ''I have secured the horse from a gl adolinian encampment from which I just escaped late last night after a scouting excursion when I was captured and I just escaped with my life as it were. I know to the horse is not muchaccount as you say boy, but it was the only horse I could secure in escaping and a good runner at that. when I came here I exe expected friend and to be treated with respect and not with contempt.''

''You say you escaped from the rebels.''?

''Yes.''

'' nd you c ll that a horse you have?''

''Oh not a realgood one of course.''there are no real good horses in the rebel encampment I came from..ut it is a splendid imit tion of a good one.''''''

Penrod gave an indignant exclamanation.

''Look at mine ''He cried.''Behold a good horse. If you are really a boyscout of Angelinia dismount from it and ride mine. I'll let you on.'' he stranger gave a st art and then examined the other lads horse intent ly.

''Is it possible friend that the horse you are riding---ix in one formly ridden by a Gargoylian, and those the little girls are mounted on too?''

''ot only possi le but tr e.''replied violet who was gratified by the impression her horse and those of her sisters and the comrade had created.''It proves we can even outdoe the Gargoylians even. or example look at the long hairs on their tails and the red hair of my boy friends with which the horses could wisk away an any amount of flies in sum er.''

''he flies never trouble a Gargoylian horse.''said the stranger.

''nd notice their good strong nee teeth which they could nibble grass grass and roots.''

''It is not necess ary for my horse to eat now.''Observed the stranger.

''lso examine the broad chests and legs of the horses we ride which enables the horses to draw in deepth breaths.''said Penrod proudly..

''I have no need to examine them as I know what horses they are.''Returned the other boy.

''No you miss many plensures in not having a good Gargoylian horse for your own.'' remarked Penrod pityingly.' you do not know the relief you could feel in outdistans ing rebel troopers if they chase you nor the delight of securing from rebel lines delicious food which we christian troops seldom find nor the satisfaction of having a long speedy ride an fierce gallop out in the pure fresh air of winter morningour horse is almost an imitation of a horse but your i s a mighty poor one. I thought rebels had sense enough to use better horses than that .''

''Oh the horse could not hope to be like others when treated by its owner as this one has been''''sighed the boy.''but I am glad to have met a real companion and a friend at last. nd your f ir companions I refer the little girls are the most beautiful creatures of earth I ever beheld.''

This praise of his friends won Penrod completely. To have his little girl friends he called beautiful was a novelty in his experience. s id he;

'Your chief fault my friend is in your stoo great a hast which made you secure the wrong kind of horse but that I suppose you could not help as there was no time for it .eal good horses like the ones we have are made of good strong flesh, at blood and bones and are the swiftest horses we ever had.''

'' n an And ''I can see the bones all right.''Added violet sadly''And they are not admirable and very distinct h which shows the horse was underfed.. ut I suppose as I see your pocket is bulging lad you have something important tucked away inside.''

''Exc'elt.''Said the boy.

''What g goos good is it''Asked Jennie.

he lad did not know as he had not taken time to look at it having secured it from a rebel officer he had foiled before he made his break from the camp but he could not tell the little girls that.

''One of the rebels who persued me sabred me on the arm and cut me badly'' the lad however said''and the blow blood cert inly ran out to show where I am hit and I cann cannot move my left arm at all. Andyou poor little girls.I would like to see any of you bleed when you are hurt. I advise you do not monkey with the enemy any more they are too dangerous.''''''''

''But gut we have never been seriously hurt yet''Said violet''Once in a while we scarat get scr atched up some but we easily recover without difficulty whatever and are soon in so good condition again. And we never worry about a slight break of an arm or any splinters or bullet wounds in the least.''''''

The strange lad was almost tempted to envy the horses of his new found friends but Penrod thought the new friends horse was so unnatural and so absurd in appearance that he would not change horses under any circumstances.

''ow did yo happen to secure a horse shod with gold or brass horseshoes?''Penrod asked.

''he rebe rebel who owned it did it.'',as the reply''and yet it saved his legs from being too tired out. We've had a good many adventures together the horse and I before we got here and the horse likes me as I'm different from my ma his other master.''

Violet herself was about to reply when suddenly she and her sisters and Penrod gave a start and a cry of surprise while their horses stood trembling like a leaf. For around the corner of the house came two enormous columns of horsemen in red and scarlet or purple hunting uniforms their many horses trending so lightly that they were upon the little column of children before the strange boy himself was aware of their presence. The strange lad fearing he might be taken for a Landelinian boyscout was in the act of urging his horse to plunge down the path to escape when the little girls cried out in chorus;

''Stop little boy. Stop little boy. These are friends and will do you no harm.Will protect you, they won't mistake you for a rebel.''

The lad hesitated eyeing the columns of troopers fearfully. One of the foremost Men was a colonel with clear intelligent eyes a tawney colored beard well kept well kept, and a head of hair under his big sombero of a color of yellow puplush. The other officer was wearing a blue purple coat and yellow trousers with purple strips on the sides of the legs and eyes that shone almost under his very hat like coals of fire. The imposing forms of these two officers and the column of troopers were enough to strike terror to the stoutest heart when not used to their presence and it was no wonder that the strange lad was afraid to face them in his rebel uniform when he even knew he was a stranger in general Jack Evans army. But the little girls asking his name introduced the little boy in a calm sweet friendly tone saying;

''This Colonel Hood is our new found friend Gerald Starring and at the same time a faithful vassal of general Hewson Vivian as his papers proves. All these my lad is the body of Angelinian-Concentinian cavarly the terror of the Glandelinians. Whose royal christian troops troopers are warm friends of ours and have been in Evans command for a long while and we wish you to remain within our lines and be welcomed by us and general Jack Evans.''

Hearing these words the lad resolved to conquer his alarm.He bowed his head with as much diginity as he could muster master toward the imposingchristian officers and cavarly men armed with sabres and long carbins and pistols who in turn nodded in a most friendly way.

''Is not our captured gargoylian horses beautiful animals!''Asked one of the littl girls admiringly.

''That is doubtless a matter of taste.''returned the officer.''Among the Gargoylians their own horses are thought very ungainly because as you see their faces are stretched out and their necks are uselessly too long. Their joints are however strong and stoken staunch and their fine flesh is dreadfully tough. My conscious however would never permit me to ride such horses unless on conditions of extreme necessity.''

''We are glad of that for we and my sisters also have a conscience''Said violet''and it tells me not to ride them too often for fear they may throw us and cause our skulls to be smashed in by too swift a throw or fall, but we are able to control our horse when we know how to do it.''

If the soldiers tought thought to frightened any of the little girls by such langnage language they any one of them was badly mistaken. Violets sisters smiled and one of the little girls winked one eye slowly.

''We all have good a noiseless friend violet''said the officer''and if you attend to the school of horseback riding it will do much to protect you from danger and enable to have you ride any horse known in the line of such animals. Some day I will try to explain to you about Gargoylian horses and the way they ride them and then afterwards you will know more about such horses than you do now.''

''Our friend of violet and her sisters must be our friend as well.''Said Penrod''So let us change this talk on horses and converse upon more pleasing subjects. Have you had any breakfast Gerald?''

''Not yet.''''''Replied the lad''but I hope here in our lines there is plenty of eatables so If you will excuse me I would like to be led to a mess hall.''

''He's a vegetarian.''remarked the little violet Angelina.''If I could eat as much vegetables as I can but I would not need to go on a hunger quest to looking for nothing than could teach me or my sisters to devour hard tack and other foods.''

Then having dismounted violet realized that the lad was kind of shy of them and see she and her sisters in control and asked the boy to dismount. Then to his surprise and bewilderment as well as embarrassment they each in turn put their arms around him and hugged him with eager delight. By the time however they all had awell embodied in a real talk right out there in the cold and violet and her sisters had told the boy all about their experience the days before and their recent advent.ed returned they rode back to the pa ha building just as the breakfast bell rang and the little girls went inside to join their other comrades and led laud the new friend to general Evans!

As violet was lost with the boy and as she entered the hall a voice called out in rather a harsh and sharp tone;

''hat are you here again?''

''Yes I am'' he answered looking around to see here the voice came from.

''What brought you back from the rebel prisons so long or so quick?''was the next question and violet looking more carefully saw a rebel prisoner under two guard guards.

''Good gracious.''she exclaimed.''I thought you was some one else. You are one of the Gargoylians who pursued us two days ago.''

''So I am replied the prisoner.''and I admire your bravery and your sisters or companions who ever they be.''Long before I became member of the Ku Klux Klan Glans I was a trooper only under the Landelinian general Quap Quandarson. I was flag then for a time the Head Head lieutenant of the finie finest flying squadron of Landelinian cavarly that was ever known to exist in the Glandelinian army and in battle we did many wonderful things. Afterwards I was wounded but when I recovered I joined the Ku Klux Klan Glans and here I am. I am still talk talk when I feel in the mood which which is not often as I hate Angelinians greatly but I simply cannot help help admiring little girls like you who are so wonderful. I pla placed you in that house in our lines and you escaped so marvelious.''''''

''It is very strange ''said the little girl.''what were you before you ever became a Kl Ku Klux Klan.''

''That I have forgott en.''replied the gargoylian soldier''And I do not think it of much importance. But here comes general Evans of your Angelinians ; so I'd better look up for it would anger him to see me a rebel and traitor chatter with a fair creature like you. I hope hereafter however to be a friend of yours.''

Just then the general opened the door and greeted violet with a good morning kiss. The general saw that violet looked refreshed and rosy and in good spirits.

'' Breakfast breakfast is ready ndear.''He said.''Your sisters are hungry and are waiting for you;so don't let us keep them waiting a single minute longer.''

After breakfast the great general Jack Evans if you please to mention announced that he had ordered a holiday to be observed throughout his entire christian encampment in honor of his visitors and friends. Most of the soldiers and officers and even generals had learned that the lost vivian girls had returned to them again and all were anxious to see violet and her sisters again, for they had also always been a rare favorite to them. So first there was a grand procession of hundreds of thousands of christian soldiers through the company streets headed by the Angelinian Regimental Bands after which violet and her sisters were requested pleadingly totell of some of their deedsand experiences in the great council room of generals in the building.In the afternoon if nothing unusual was mattering considering the enemy there were to be some games and also races.

The immense procession of Angelinian solid soldiers was indeed the most imposing sight ever witnessed before. First came the general Regimental band of the army the soldiers dressed in velvet red and blue uniforms with plenty of yellow satin and buttons of immense cut olden images. They played as they marched.the national in called Repapa Repaza nand march,, the Southerner march and the first brigade march, and also played Onward christian soldiers, and then finished with the peace known as ''Un er the double Kan Eagle one of the grandestmarches known. Cherlands plac played hundreds of pieces one nown as Light's out marche. Each regiment had their standard bearers with the Angelinian flags. The advanced flag of the land was divided into five quarters of colors one being colored sky blue, another yellow, a third lavendar the fourth white and the fifth green. In the centre of this beautiful flag was a large Engraving of the ''Sacred Heart of Jesus'' and all over the five quarters were sewn spangles that glittered beautifully in the shuns sh sunshine. The Angelinian National flag had fifteen stripe red and yellow with a purple colored ground on the upper part. The colors no doubt represented the many loyal states of Abbisannia and the ''Sacred Heart The Blessed Savior.ust behind the many standard bearers came general Ozwa and Evans himself on their grand horses. The horses were decorated with immense black and blue ribbons and bows. Behind the two main generals of this part of the army of a mean i some force rode on their ownhorses violet and her sisters all in splendid raiment and wearing purple hats while violetherself wore around her waistas well as her sisters the cartridge belts they had captured from the Gargoylians before escaping from their encampment.

Following violet and her sisters came other generals mounted on their horses and the people cheered the generals and the little girls as they did the beautiful flags themselves. Behind the officers came with regular steps the famious machine gun companies men which had wound up so much clockwork disaster for rebels during battles and they also paraded for the occasion. They marched as regular as the movement of clockwork and they carried long weapons or bayonets on rifles that appeared to be made of burnished copper from their color but was copper covered steel. Then came the column of boy scouts belonging to violet and her sisters who had much to respect for the little girls but just now as the boy scout columns had been rendered almost useless by so many losses violet and her sisters had left them in command of one of the generals for the present who saw that the boys were suitably cared for.

There followed another grand band after this which was called the royal Angelinian Band. The band players wh oo whore wsnow white uniforms with gold or brass buttons and played "the Starlight March."

When came a long procession of cavarly with a group of officers who wore the Abbieannian ul uniforms. the Angeliniana in this group wore long hair and crimsome uniforms and yelled their "ational Yell every other step they took to the great satisfaction of the onlookers which were glad to have this evidencethat their lungs were in very good condition.the brilliantly uniformed Abyssinkilians marched next at thehead of a division of Calverinian infantry which consisted of one hundred thousand men twenty eight captian generals, one major general, and all other officers from generals down to captiann and lieutenants. here was an ernormous number of prin privates in the procession and all were so courageous and skillful that many were already being or having recieved promotion papers one by one. A cavarly force of Concentinian troopers followed the cavarly forces being led by general Zeb urmer and the general in command almost stood up in his seat on his horse and bowed his head right and left in answer to the cheers of the soldiers and answered all salutes he recieved. Taken altogether the procession was indeed a most grand success and when it had returned to the other section of the christian encampments the many soldiers that could get in crowded around or near the room to try and hear anything the ivian girls would say about their recent experiences.

the first thing violet and her sisters did after tealing of their experiences was to produce a large ro ll of paper given to her by the lad known as Gerald starring and to unto ot and pull other papers apart from it making two ro l rolls. his act she repeated untill overnine sheets were visible and the pr pretty little girl laid them all down on Hansons table. At first the soldiers thought it was a trick of iolet and her sisters thinking they had produced nine sheets of paper from one and were delighted and amazed at their apparance. Violet delcared she was sorry that the other sheets were gone as there were supposed to be twelve but the lad did not secure the others, the other three sheets.Nevertheless violet and her sisters smiled joyiously as general Evans allowing one of them to nestle into his arms examined the sheets. Afterwards it was noticed that the general looked carefully over the papers but it seemed to please the soldiers just as well as to know that the lad had probably saved the christian armies from some great disaster.....

In one of the rooms back of the main generals council room the general had also found a lot of things he had left behind him before his advance on ivian ickey with is army. there were enough materials and paper there to enable him to prepare several new plans which he had intended to make out con cerning the time eneral Hanson Vivian would leave his many armies inunder general Mansion at vivian ickey and general Evans had passed part of the night also in getting everything in r readiness afterwards the general himself told his soldiers and officers of his own trick planned to frustrate all ventions of the enemy and predicted some wonderfe wonfe wonderful feats that he would perform that greatly delighted is audience and for a while it seemed as if the soldiers themselves did not care a bit whether any other general was theirsor not so long as he succeeded in accomplishingall the plans Evans had made out. e apan applauded him every time and at theend of the day a begged him earnestly not to allow the ivian girls to go anyoutside the lines and runthemselves into unecessary peril if he could help it.

"In that case"said the general gravely"I will cancel all my own engagements with other rebel generals and devote myself to gener l ivians armies alone for I love violet and her sisters sowell that I can deney you or them nothing."

After the soldiers had bee be n dismissed with this promish many of the generals and other officers joined Evans at a slap bovate luncheon in the generals headquarters where even many of the boyscouts were summoned and sumptuously fed and violet and her sisters ate all they could themselvex out of a e golden bowl with seven rows of rubies or emeralds combined wi with sapphires and diamonds set around the rim of it.In the afternoon the storm having cleared up the nightbefore they all went to a great field outside the city e encampments mates or our outskirts where the military games were t o be held. there was a beautiful canopy for violet and her sisters and their guests tosit under and watch the soldiers run races, wrestle do bayonet drills, and boxing and jumping.You may be surethe Angelinians did their best with such a distinguished company watching them and finally Penrod himself offered to wrestle with a small Angelinian soldier who seemed t be the main champion. He being a man but of Penrods size and twice as old was nevertheless a strong man for his size and wore a purple peaked hatwith little rounded decorations all around the rim of it w ich shined gaily in the sun as he movedabout. But although the man soldier was hardly small enoughtall enough tocome to Penrods shoulder he was nevertheless more stronger and more clever and he laid Penrod on his back with amazing ease. Penrod indeed was greatly astonished at hisdefeat, and when the pt pretty little ivian girls jeered many of the soldiers in laughing at him he proposed a severe boxing matfh with the same small soldier to which he readily agreed.But the first time t hat Penrod managed to give him a sharp blow on the ear thesoldier sat down upon the ground a most astonished kid not no know what to make of it.

Th a This made Penrodl u laugh in turn and the boy also felt comforted to find that violet and her sisters laughed as merily at the downed soldier as she and her sisters h d had at him. just then Gerald starring proposed a race between fourt e Angelinian cavarly men and violet and her sisters themselves the latter to ride their captured Gargoylian horses and although all the others were doli bted indeed at the suge suggestion the little girls drew back saying;

"uch a race would not be fair Gerald."

"Of course not"Added one of the cavarly soldiers."Those horses of your yours little girls are too good a sprinters to race wit with us."

"It is not that."said violet modestly"But also our horses would not tire untill after a ten mile gallop at the full gallop and your probably would do so."

"ah" Laughed one of the Angelinian cavarly men looking almost with disdain at the little girls"do you little girls imagine for an instant that shes such horses like those of the Gargoylians could run as fast as ours.?"

"Idon't know, Im sure."Replied Jennie"but they can outrun any other horses the other sects of ngelinians would use."

"Well that is what we are trying tofind out."remarked general Evanshimself. "You little girls know that the object of races is to see who will win it or at least that is what many of my excellent officers think."

"Once when I wasa young an"Said one othe gl Angelinianscavarly men

" I had an excellent race horse and defeated all who dared to run agains t me in the derv derby races.I was born in Abbieannin you know where all the best and most aristocratic race horses of Abbieannin come from."

"But you are a old man now GeGeorge."Replied violet "I only wish there were only Angelinian horses for us girls to use against you. I&D show the soldiers and my our friends a fine sight, I can tell you. ut to race by Gargoylian horses against yours wo ld would not be fair.((

"Just the same race with them if w they defy you."Suggested Evans.

"Then why not race with the Concentinian cavarly!"Enquired one of the Angelinian cavarly men."hey have swifter horses than we have.""!!

"I'll bet the vivinn irls are afraid to race them."Said Evans smiling at them.

"On no we ain'T answered violet andher sisters."I merely said it was not fair. but if the Concentinian horses are willing to undertake the race and my sisters are quite ready."""""

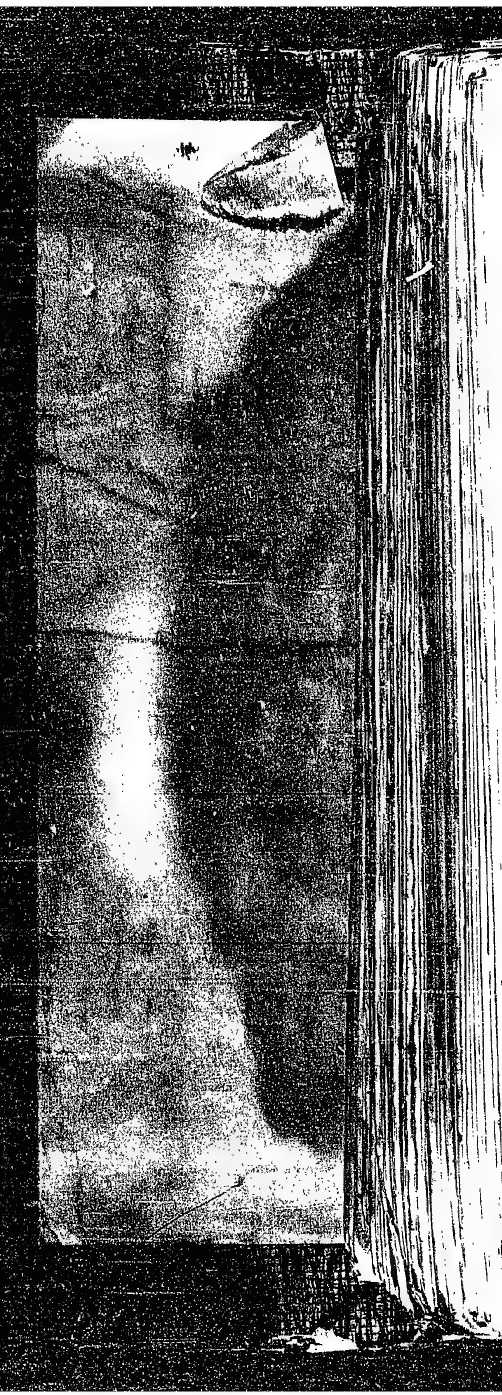
"It did not take long for the preparations to be made. he horses the ivian girls had been had secured when they escaped the Gargoylian encampments was brought to them and soon the little girls mounted and the Concentinians mounted stood b side by side waiting for the order to start.

"When I say go."Penrod himself called to them"you must dig out and race untill you reach those three mildd middle tents,you see half a mile over younder. hen circle around them and come back again. he first one that passes where I have drew the line on in the snow crust shall be named the winnerf...."

In th a moment after he asked;

"re you ready.?!"""

"I suppose I ought to be fair and give the ivian girls and their horses a start of us."Said one of the concentini n cavarly men...



"Never mind that sir"Said iolet"I'll do the best I can ,and so will my sisters."

"Go"Cried enrod and at the word the racers leaped forward simultaneously and the unequla unequal race was begun.he horses of the Concentinian soldiers pounded away at a great rate and although their horses did not lo ok very gravgraceful they galloped in a way todo credit to Abbieannian or even merican Racers.But the horses violet and her sisers rode was swifter than the wind. Their legs moved so fast their movements or twinklings could scarcely be seen and though they had been the second tostart they covered the ground much faster and raised clouds of snow as they went. before they had reached the three tents the horses violet and her sisters rode were far ahead and even coming on the return trip and the little girls returned to the starting place and were ll lustily cheered by the Angelinians before the Concentinian riders came phanting up to the large canopy where violet and her sisters, general Evans and their friends were seated.

I am sorry to record that just as the race was won by violet and her sisters an extraordinary thing occured. just as the horses and riders of the Concentinians came up came up last as ashamed of their defeat there was a sudden trembling of the ground and strange roar in the distance and one of the horses of the Concentinians pitting scared made a most vicious kick at the gargoylian horse that violet rode which threw the horse and made violet tumble head over heels upon the snow covered ground and at the same time broke one of the legs of the horse an and skinned its ear. he astonished horse had also rolled over and off over and for a moment the spectators had been horrified by the ungracious act the Concentinians horse had been guilty of. Violetat first was angry and as she looked at the comical face of the concentinian officer she imagined he was laughing at her, and picking up some snow in her hands she made it into a hard snowball and launched it into the air. he snowball struck the officer full on the side of the face almost knocking him off the horse amid shouts of delight from all around.

"I'm beg your pardon little girl I'm sure."Said the concentinian meekily wiping away the cold wet snow"I could not control my horse when it got scared and I am sorry I laughed but I could not help it it looked so funny. But you and your sisters have won the race and won it fairly, but when can our horses do against the horses you have. hey are fiery str steeds not racers."

Hearing this apology violet had to smile then herself and she apoliged for throwing the hard snowball at him.

''No one must make fun of any of the vivian "irls or injure their feelings in any way
''Growled Evans and Penrod ran to violet and whispered that unless he got rid of that vicious horse he will lose his command. Then several members of soldiers came and making a large heavy stretcher carried the injured Carrovlinn horse to the horse hospital and while this was in progress general Evans had shaking violet and her sisters by the hand as he did so;
''My little dears''I hope to reward you for the swift horses you managed to secure and hereafter r and all soldiers will know that all other horses are imitations compared to our own and your horses or all horses Gargoylians may have are the re l real champions of horses and us Angelinians must try our best to secure such horses from the enemy in raids and captures if possible.''''''
There was more app aluse at this and then violet and her sisters had the saddles removed from the Gargoylian horses except violet s and she rode one of the victorious horses back to general Evans headquarters at the head of the grand procession....
''I ought to have a gargoylian horse.''Grumbled the Conscntinian officer who had been hit by the snowball thrown by violet as he slowly gode tward his own camp''For to have just an ordinary horse is of no a count whatever. nd It's no place for us here.''
''It's lucky we and our divisions got here thr though.''Said one of his officers.
''You know those little vivian irls are unatrually good and even try to live like real saints, kind and good, brave and loving, but if an a ccident happens none of them will take it if any one laughs at them.'' Several days of great festivity and merry making followed during the time general Evans army was inactive for such good friends like the general and violet and her sisters did not meet open and there was much to be talked and told over between them and many more amusements to be enjoyed during this slight time of a inactivity. general Evans despite his grim buisness of war was very happy to have violet and her sisters beside him for little girls of their own age with whom it was proper for the general to acc associate were very few indeed and often the great Angelinian general was lonely for lack of companionship indeed. It was the third morning after the arival of violet and her sisters since their escape from the Gargoylians and they were sitting with general Evans and their friends i in the generals council room talking over old times when the general having recieved that same morning an order from general Hanson to sent the important papers to him said to one of his orderlies;
''Please go to my own room James and get the sheets of paper I.left in the drawer in the main tabme . I want to have it sent to general Hanson vivian.(I'' he orderlis at once departed on the errand and he was gone so lo g long that the whole bunch had almost forgotten the mission Evans had sent him on, when the purple uniformed soldier and orderly returned with a scared and troubled face.
''The papers are not there your excellency.''said he.
''Not there?''Exclaimed general Evans.''Are you sureyou looked right?''''''
''I have not only looked in the drawer but found it broken open and looked in every part of the room.'' he orderly replied with a salute.
''was not the d r door closed and loo locked?''Asked the general while violet and her sisters and Gerald Starring grw pale.
''Yes your excellency; I'm positively sure it was for when I opened it a white uniformed man crept out quickly with a drawn pistol and ran up the stairs. I followed him but he hid somewhere in the building but I had it surrounded so that if he is a spy he shall not escape.''
Hearing this the general and violet and her sisters exchang exchanged startled glances, for they remembered how often they had recently heard about sneaking spies and traitors within the christian li es. The little girls white in their faces and shaking with fear as to the outcome jumped up at once.
''ome general my friend.''said violet anxiously.''Let us go ourselves and search for the spy. He must not get away for we will lose out in everything and then all will be lost.''
So the general and the little girls calling for a number of soldiers and officers went first to the room where the general had left the papers and searched carefully in every corner and among the vases and baskets and other ornaments that stood about th the pretty place. ut not a trace could they find of the papers they sought and were confirmed therefore that a spy was in the building and men were sent everywhere throughout all the place to bring him to view. Violet and her sisters were nearly weeping , by this time because it was a loss to them more than any one else as they had gone through so much to secure those papers, while Evans was angry and indignant .
when they returned to the others the general said;
''there is little doubt that the important papers had been taken by a horrid Glandelinian spy or some one who tries to double cross me and if that is true the offender must be captured and punished. When caught he shall be investigated, courtmarshalled and shot.''''''
''I don't believe an Angelinian soldier would be so mean d to do such a dreadful thing against his own country.''Cried violet much distressed. It must be a spy. o Penrod and getthim also if you can and if we secure the spy we will see what he himself will have to say abou i about it. he''
he boy hastened away, but presently returned and said.
''here is someone under the bed of your roo m armed to the teeth with weapons.
He will not come out and it is foolhardy for any one to try and force him unless a n.m number go in. He thr threatened to shoot me if I dsn dared to come near his hiding place. ' however locked him in the room and he cannot escape even out the window as the place is closley surrounded by soldiers.''

''Where is he?''Asked violet.
''I said under the bed in your own room.''''as the reply.
violet and her sisters immediately got all the searchers to come to that one room , Penrod unlocked it and w allvent in with drawn guns and fixed bayonets and seeing the man under the bed were excited.
''come heresir.''cried violet.
''' won't answered the man in a surly tone.''Come and get me.''
''Oh you fool.''he cried.Why are you so reckless.'' ou are surrounded and the men willshoot if you refuse.''
The man did not reply.
''Ifyou don't come out right away this minute.'' aid the captian getting provoked
''I'll order my men to shoot you right where you lie and you will then wi wish you had not been so reckless. ou are a spy but you cannot trifle with us either.''
''hy do you christian dogs want me for?''Asked the man disturbed by y i this thr q threat as he knew the Angelinians meant it.
''ou must go before general Evans. He want's to talk to you.''
''ll right I will.''Returned the rebel, creeping out.''I'm a not afraid of general Evans or no one else who is a guttersnip like you christian dogs.'' the Angelinian soldiers fearing the spy may do something to violet and her sisters surrounded him immedately disarmed him and then violet and her sisters carried the weapons in their arms to where the generals and the others sat in grieved and thoughtful silence.
''Tell me you fool of fools.''said the general''hi did you steal my important apers.?''''
''I won't answer such a foolish w question for no ons''Asserted the rebel with a snarl.
''Oh yes you will.''Violet declared with scorn. ''he papers are gone, and you ran out of his room when the orderly opened the door. o if you are an innocent man you must tell the good general how you came to be in his ro m without his n knowing it, and what has become of the papers.''''''
''Who accuges me?''Asked the man with defiance and derision.
''No one'' nswered the general himself.''Your actions alone accuse you. he fact is I left my papers in my dressing dressing room table in the drawer and you have stolen in without my knowing it. hen next the door was opened you ran out and hid yourself---and the papers are gone.''
''That is none of my buisness whatever.'' Growled the spy.
''Don't be so impudent sir.''Admonished violet.''You are tempering with a general who has you at his mercy I warn you.''
''It is you who are impudent.''Said the spy''or accusing me of such a crimewhen you can't prove it except by guessing.'' General Evans was not greatly incensed especially by the mans conduct. He summoned his captian general and when the long lean officer appeared he said;
''Have this man standing before me under guard throughoutly examined. He is accused as a spy and shall be court marshalled as soon as possible.'' so the captian general ordered in some of hismen and the general had the man taken to another room in spitd of the mans snarls curses and threats. violet and her sisters were weeping bitterly because the papers were gone.
''hat shall we do?''Asked general Ozma with a digh.''or such a crime had h cast a gloom all over the company in the room;
''I will summon the whole number of my generals to meet in my council room at three o-clock.''Replied Evans lookloking at his watch. It is now half past two.I myself will act as courtmarshall and the spy shall have his investigation by me. We do not tey spies unless they prove they are not guilty. nd he is. He's got theevidence all about him by his manner of spe ch. He defies me and all Christiani christianity.''
''hat will happen if the examination discloses he is guilty of a spy.?''Asked violet shocked at thinking of the mans fate.
''He must die the death of a spy.'' nswered the general determindely.
''At time will the sentense be?''Enquired the general.
''As soon as necessary.''as the reply.''I have asked the captian general to investigate the spy because he can find out whether he is a spy or not, and I am sure he will do his best to make the investigation fair. he general called Gale shall be I suppose the public accuser because he is so learned that no one can decieve him .''
''Who will be the jury?''Asked another general.
''there ought to be the vivian girls to consist of the main part of the jury to convict him.''Said the general.''Because because having soft and kind hearts they understand the situation better and may doe their best to save him as they hate to see him shot. o the jury shall consist of the vivian girls and ten men and four boys. That makes the number which the Angelinian law requires and many of the soldiers will be admitted to hear the testimony.''
They now separated to prepare for the sad ceremony for whenever a such an appeal is made to law sorrow is almost certain to follow-even in the sternest christian generals heart . ut it must be stated that the soldiers ingeneral Jack Evans army were generally so well behavved h behaved that there had not been a single courtmar shall among them for over a year since the war began and no one had even been called upon to sit in judgement upon an offender of the l w. ow it was a spy caught in the nick of time within the christian lines.

The crime of spies being the most dreaded crimes of all for the christian troops to know about the most tremendous excitement prevailed in the whole christian encampment when the news of the spies capture became known. And he was not going to face a trial but only be examined and sentenced to be shot. Violet and her sisters when they returned to their own room wept over the affair bitterly, while general Ozma also returning to his own room was exceedingly thoughtful. He had no doubt that the spy had stolen and hidden the important papers, but he realized that as desperate as a situation his country was already in a rebel spy could not be dependent upon all times to avoid such temps emptations since it is natural to make attempts to frustrate or destroy an armies intention to worse a belu lbeleagured city like Vivian Vickey and even the vert very tame spies we read of in our own American histories and other books are as tame as a cat in our own horse co mpared to a cornered Mandelinian spy which usually gets like a descendant from the wild cat of the jungle--the fer' ferocious tiger. The good general knew that if the unfort unate spy was found guilty in the investigation and condemned to death the little girls would be very much unhappy; so although he and they even grieved over the sate fate Evans had confronted as much as any one else, he resolved to save the spys life if possible to see that the examination was made fairly and squarely.

Sending for Violet and her sisters the general took them into his own apartment and said;

"My little fairy friends" It is your duty as you know in acting as jury to see to it the spy gets a fair treatment but I fail fear you will fail because I know a spy is desperate these days, facing death for failure, if he returns to his own lines andfacing death here if he is captured especially to my certain knowledge, and in my opinion in that the spy beingconfronted with this desperate condition had been unable to resist the temptation. Yet his disgrace and death would not bring back the lost or stolen papers but only to serve to make you little girls more unhappy as you realize you were really resp onsible for his capture. So I intended to prove the rebels innocence by a trick."

He drew from inside his pocket a duplicate of the papers Evans had lost and continued;

"These papers you little girls must hide in a safe place and if your advanced jury may decided against you that the spy is guilty you may then produce these duplicate papers and claim it they are the ones that were lost and that you found it during the time the preparations were being made. All thepapers he had lost are exact ly alike so no one can di dispute ou your word. It is a c deception to be sure but this deception will save the spys life and then we will be all happy again."

"I donot like to decieve my friends." Replied the little girls." t is the loss of the papers we mourn and unless the real papers are found, we will ourselves bring the verdict of condemnation. " Our kid hearts urges us to save the nation not a reckless spy and I can usually tryst our hearts to do the right thing. So I will do as I and my sisters wish. he papers are found really or the spy dies."

He took his ow own chance so let him have it."

After some thought the general put the papers inside his pocket and went back to the other room to think over his own speech to the jury. At three oclock in the afternoon the council room was crowded with soldiers and officers all being eager to witness the great investigation. General Evans dressed in his most splendid uniform sat in the magnificent chair. Behind him and around him stood thirty nine generals and thirty eight underofficers and many officlas of the army. At he his right say sat the jury soldiers, offic ers and the little girls and the boyscouts, all gravely prepared to listen to what was said. The spy had been placed on top of a large platform to the view of all under guard where he stood sullent and defiant, and gazed with derision at the crowd of Angelinians around him with great unconcern.

And now from a signal from general Jack Evans the general Ozma arouse and addressed the jury. His tone was indeed very pompous and he walked up and dow in an absurd attempt to be or appear dignified.

"your excellency and fellow comrades." He began" The strange man you see a prisoner before you is accused and found guilty of the crime of first attempting to murder two or soldiers as he entered the building through the cellar way and then stealing the important papers of our esteemed generals property which he had intended to sent to general Hanson and to whom he wired is lost. In either case a grave crime of spying and stealing and attempted murder had been committed which deserves a grave punishment."

"do you mean the spy will be led blind folded outside and shot to morrow morning!" "Asked Violet.

"Don't interrupt little girl ." said the general." hen I get my thoughts arranged to good order I do not like to have anything upset them or throw them into confusion."

"f your thoughts were any good you dog dogpasted christian dog they would never become confused. "Remarked the spy scarnestly." y thoughts are always--"

"You are under investigation and this is no time for arguments for things about thoughts and we wish y , toheld your tongue until you are asked to speak!" demanded the general hotly." u You are under a str ck examination but your presence and manner is a trail to all of us Angelinians."

"at the public accuser continue." alled general Evans from his chair." nd if you interrupt him again you will be shot where you stand."

"his spy and criminal who now stands before the courtmarshall." Resumed the general." as no doubt from desperation long desired to secure some important plans or information concerning the situation of the besieging christian lines. nd finally knowing how closely our armies are pressing the seige of Vivian Vickey he made a wicked plan to satisfy his craving for information. In my full minds eye I can see him and have seen him!"

"What was that!" Asked violet herself seriously;

"I say that in the eye of my mind!"

"Your brains have yo no eyes but your head has." Declared Violet." Your mind and brain itself is blind."

"Our excellency." Cried the general appealing to Evans" Has my mind an eye or has it not!"

"If I has it is invi ible." Said the general.

"Very true " Returned general Ozma bowing. "I may I see the criminal and spy in the eye of my very mind creeping stealthily in to the room of our beloved little child heroines known as the Vivian Girls and secreting himself when no one was looking untill every one had gone away and the door was closed and supposedly locked but he had a duplicate ket key to open it iwth. then the spy and ta traitor was alone with his intended stolen property and I could see him pounce upon that coveted ddrawer and take the papers out and hide them somewhere--p "

"Are you still seeing with your I minds eye!" Inquired Violet seriously.

"Of course how else could I see it child." And we know the very thing is true because since the time of that interview there is no important papers to ve found anywhere."

"I suppose if the spy had been gone or escaped instead of the papers missing, the one eye of your mind wu would see the papers stealing the spy." Suggested the little girl Jennie.

"Very likely" Acknowledged the general grimly." nd now fellow comrades and persons of the jury and court marshall I assert that so awful a crime as to attempt to overthrow the seige in the manner of stealing important papers deserves death, and in the case of the ferocious criminal and spy before you, the deq death penalty should be inflicted to morrow at sunrise."

There was great applause when the speaker sat down. Then the general sp-ke spoke in a stern voice(Evans);

"Prisoner what have you to say for yourselve. Are you guilty or Not guilty. Produce those papers and you will not face the penalty."

"hat that is for you to find out." Replied the spy." If you can prove I m guilty I will be willing to die a thousand times but a minds eye as you say is no proof because general Ozma has no mind to see with."

"never mind such words." Said general Evans.

When another man arose a and said;

"Respected jury and dearly beloved Vivian Girls" I pray you not to judge this prisoner unfeelingly unless the prisoner can be found guilty and surely it is unkind to accuse a man as a spy unless the real evidence can be found against him. Think of the wife and children he has left at home when he went to the war and he may have some lovely little girls like you whom he admires and loves. Look at t e the manns intelligence and his clever eyes. Gaze at his smiling face mark the tender poise of his hands. Would such a man be guilty of stealing papers when he knows its impossible to escape the lines. No a thousand times no."

"Oh curt it short you christian fool." Said the spy." You have talked long enough."

"I'm trying to defend you you poor boom." Remonstrated the officer.

"hen try and say something as sensible." Retorted the prisoner." Tell them all that it would be foolish for me to steal the papers, because I had sense enough to know it would raise such a row with me and you dogs if I did. But don't try to make out I'm too innocent to steal anything of good information if I could do it and not be found out. I imagine it would suit me good to see you christian dogs forced to raise the seige and clear out of this part of Calvinia."

"Perhaps it could to you insurgents." Remarked the man." I myself have tried two spies like you beforeso have many experiences in such sat sts. But I remember a poem which I learned when I was a child;

"To kill a sw spy is sweep sweet,
"ut I'm afraid to lay down in his seat, or his death may demand of me a threat, nd with great speed I would use my feet."

Take this to consideration, friends of the jury and you will readily decide hat the man may be wrongfully accused and that he should be properly examined and investigated and if not guilty should be held as a prisoner of war."

When this officer sat down no one applauded him for his arguments had not been very convincing and few believed that he or any one else could ever prove the spies innocence. As for the jurt jury the members whispered to each other for a few minutes and then all appointed little Jennie Vivian to be their spokesman girl. the little girl arose slowly and said;

"All spies have no conscious conscious conscience so when they do spying depred ations they are apt to seize whatever they please to lay their hands upon. The jury believes the spy should be forced to reveal where he hid the papers for he is guilty and we recommend that if he refuses to reve l the papers or where he hid them he should be put to death to morrow at sunrise for punishment."

The judgement of the Angelinian jury was recieved with great applause, although after she gave the verdict Jennie was sobbing miserably at the fate she had to command for the spy whom she felt so sorry for. The general Evans was about to order the spy to be searched closely when another brilliant person he arose and dre addressed him.

"Your excellency," said he "See how easy it is for the jury to be mistaken." "Why spy could not have stolen your papers for here it is."

He took from inside a small bundle and produced the sheets which he had left that night and held them clearly.

"General Evans was was delighted and exclaimed eagerly and joyfully;

"Give them to me general Dick Chopper."

And all the soldiers cheered and clapped their hands rejoicing that the spy had escaped the rapid examination and been proved to have failed to accomplish his purpose to steal them. As the general held the papers in his hands and looked over them carefully he said;

"Everyone watch the prisoner that he does not escape. Where di you find the papers general Dick Chopper."

"On his person when we examined and searched him." He answered.

"Justice" Remarked Violet with a sigh "Is a dangerous thing to meddle with. If you general had not found those papers on his person the seige of Vivian Wickey would certainly have been broken as without them in his possession our Uncle and general Hanson Vivian cannot do anything."

"At justice prevailed at last!" said general Evans "For here are the papers and the spy had been guilty."

"And I refuse to have him investigated now." Cried general Dana in a very sharp voice. "Heylin failed to produce any evidence that he is not guilty."

"And I refuse to free the prisoner from the death sentence." Said general Evans unless the Vivian girls cancells it."

"Shall I?" Asked Jennie.

"Hush Jennie" Turned Violet.

"Don't be foolish" Advised Catherine "Or you may be sorry for it. He is a dangerous spy and will kill you if he gets a chance."

Jennie arose and said;

"The papers have been found, but if you general Evans can prove they are not duplicates I will cancel the degree." She said loudly enough for all to hear.

"You else is right." Exclaimed Evans looking over the papers "I am sure they cannot be the real papers. They save us from disaster but not the spy from death unless he confesses."

"Of course not, the papers Gerald gave you were yellow and these are white altogether" "Explained Jennie" and I must say it was a mistake on the part of the general to produce them. But now that this foolish investigation is over let the spy if he wishes to save his life tell where he hid the papers and I will and can save him life."

At this every one in the room suddenly became quiet and the spy hoping to save himself from such a disgraceful death since he failed said in a calm mocking tone of voice;

"I will confess that I intended to steal the important papers, so I crept in the room where they were kept while the general and the little girls were together in his own room and I myself under the table until I I secured the papers. When the general went away he closed the door and left the papers in the table drawer. As soon as he was gone I at once jumped up and secured the papers but they were the duplicates which you found on my head was I did not secure the duplicates but they were given to me in exchange of the real ones by a fellow spy who was shot just a minute ago when he attempted to flee at our disco ery. When he was wounded he threatened to squal on me so I jumped upon him and told him not to dare make any fuss for if he spue squealed on me he would be inside the world in a moment, but no one can teach a fool to be reasonable. Instead of keeping still he shouted where he and I was and he so trembled with fear when the soldiers and persuers came up that he fell into a swoon. I fought the soldiers with my sabre and got away but fled back to the house and I then hid under the bed untill I was discovered."

All were astonished at this confession and Evans at once sent a man to bring in the other wounded spy. When they returned with the wounded man he was searched and the yellow papers were found on his person. Then the crowds cheered lustily and Violet and her sisters hugged one another and told each other how delighted they were to know the papers were discovered. The spy was saved from death because he had not succeeded but sentence to fifteen years in prison.

"But you fool why did you not tell us first!" he asked a of the foolish man.

"It would have spoiled the fun with you christian dogs." Replied the spy yawning.

General Evans retained the duplicates which substituted for the recovered ones. But now the coursers will being over the soldiers and officers went back to their own camps well contented with the days amusement and excitement.

Indeed the unfortunate spy was much surprised to find himself in disgrace, but he was in spite of the fact that he had not succeeded in obtaining the proper sheets of papers. For the Angelinian soldiers and the generals knew the spy had tried to obtain the dishonorious crime and that only an incident or accident had prevented him from doing so, therefore not even other Angelinian prisoners preferred not to associate with him not because of his attempt but because of his failure. He spy was even forbidden by his fellow prisoners to wander around near them and soon was made to stay in confinment in a seperate room in the guardhouse so he finally began to beg some of his Angelinian guards to have him sent to so e se e other place where he could enjoy himself better and it was done.

When having secured disguises and feeling very tired the little girls before leaving the christian lines got their horses and swiftly they trotted through the last stretch of the christian encampments through the pleasant land of the catastrophe many soldiers and officers waved to them from windows of barracks, from camp fires streets and from fields and lanes for every soldier loved Violet another sisters and on they passed general Jack Evans headquarters, one of his orderlies came out with no provisions for the girls.

"I saw you coming" And thought you little girls and your ponies must be hungry and tired thirsty." He called hospitably."

Violet and her sisters and the soldier drank and ate without alighting from their horses.

"We are in an awful hurry for we are looking for general Chopper who had been missing for nearly three weeks." Violet explained apologetically.

The soldier drank his cup of tea at one gulp It was so hot it made his eyes water.

"How I to wish the Glendellinians these days. If it had not been for controlling a temper it is hard to say what I would do to them." Said the man as the orderly went back into the generals headquarters. "But No I am afraid of genuine unnecessary bloodshed bloodshed. Ugh what a terrible thing it would be girls girls to meet the soldiers and other Angelinians now."

"Nonsense" said Catherine wiping her eyes with a small handkerchief as some dust was blown in them. "You must not be reckless my friend. But let's go very fast so we can get out of the lines before dark."

So like the wind away raced the eight on their horses Violet and her sisters holding fast to the reins with their curls blowing straight outbehind behind and quietly in two or three hours and eighteen minutes or so they came to a dazzling and big corn field not yet damaged by the rebellion and standing near by was the headquarters of general Jack Evans himself.

Hurrying through the cornfields that surrounded the generals singular headquarters which was agreat mansion, Violet and her sisters after beingadmitted by the guards rushed through the open door followed by the soldiers.

"Welcome come for dinner." Announced one of the little girls who happened to be passing.

"And I am hungry enough to eat anything you will givems." said Violet, then all stopped in dismay for the whole place was almost empty. Then from a room above came a shufflingof feet and a boyscout came running down the stairs.

"Where is general Jack Evans?" Asked Hattie anxiously. "Isn't he here sir?"

"No he is withgeneral Hanson just now." Said the boy.

"And where is general Chopper?" Asked Catherine He is here I hope for this is his quboding place."

"Here? Is he not with general Hanson Vivian also. Is he not within general Vivians lines yet." Gasped the little boy looking at a note book upside down.

"No he is not little boy. Oh dear I just feel that something had happened to him." Wailed Angelina while she and her sisters sank into a chair spies fanning themselves with a silk soft cushion.

"Now don't be alarmed." The old soldier rushed to the side of Violet and her sister sisters and knocked three vases and a large clock off the little table just to show how calm he was himself. "Think Think of how good God and his blessed mother are they will look after him I'm sure. The general through his whole service in the war has never come to harm yet and all we have to do is to return to the main christian lines under general Hanson Vivian and ask permission to go and search the rebel lines for him when when we find out and know where he is we can go and find him and tell him what he a fool he was to take such chances of staying away I so long." He added looking hopefully at Violet an her sisters....."

"The generalthimself could never have so spoken in a more sensible manner." Observed the boyscout, with a great sigh of relief and even Violet and hersisters felt better. In general Vivian and general Hanson had his chief adviser general Henry Henry Joseph Darger and when he or any one else or Violet and her sisters want to go out and see if anything happened to any of their friendsthey have merely to ask permission and if Darve Darger believes all is all right general Hanson would readily consent and they could go on the instant and find out what he or they were doing at that certain time.

"Of course" sighed Jennie. "Why did not we think of it before!"

"Better have something to eat even a little lunch before you start backnow." suggested the boyscout and bustling about had soon set out a most appetizing repast. Violet and her sisters however were too much worri worrying about their friend general Dick Dick Chopper to have much appetite, but the soldier ate all he could down. It was quite late in the late spring afternoon before they could go away. The boy insisted on putting up a lunch or provisions and it took some times time to make enough sandwitches for them all. But at last it was all ready and packed in an old provision knapsacks once belonging to some rebel soldiers who had been captured. Then the little girls putting the knapsacks on mounting their horses, and assuring the boy they would be back in a few days with the general if possible they bade him a tearful and loving farewell. The boy himself almost spoiled things by bursting into tears himself but he managed to restrain himself long enough to say goodbye and the little girls and the soldier feeling very solumn themselves started back toward the main christian lines

It had however begun growing very dark and foogy for the time of the year and by the time it lifted violet and her sisters found themselves not within any portion of the christian lines now.

"My but it is growing dark for such a time of the year." Said violet after they had gone several miles toward what they supposed to be the christian lines. "I believe we are going to have a rainstorm."

Scarcely had she finished speaking when there came a bright flash as if of lightning and followed simultaneously by a crash like terrific thunder but more subdued and less reverbrating and down near them crashed a tree while from other places they heard the falling of several other objects. Two of themwere dismounted and one other horse which violet rode promptly seemed to sit down. Off a no another horse from the shock bounched the sandwitch box and into the big sandwitch box rolled Angeline head first.

"Ho ow terribly upsetting indeed." coughed the old soldier.

"I should say it was sir." Angeline crawled almost indignantly out of the sandwitch box and began wiping the b tter and other food from her nose. "I'm afraid this incident has entirely ruined our supper. Are you alright violet Jennie and Joice.?"

"Yes th" they answered "ut our horses are dead. It was the explosion of a sharpnell shell right above us. It's a wonderful occurance indeed we are not allannihilated."""

"My heart is almost standing still from fright at the suddeness of it." said Daisy placing her hand there" and it jumped so hard that I felt it was not only going int o my mouth but trying to upset me. We will have to get onto the remaining horses and run as fast as possible for shelter. ome rebel artillery man may have spotted us and are trying to shell us."

"but were are you sisters?" violet asked in real alarm for a thick haze of powder smoke hid everything from view for a few minutes.

"Here" quavered the little girls and guided by their voices the other dismounted as child eroi os heroines stumbled over to them and soon were mounted on the remaining horses. One crash of thunder after another followed from exploding shells and the explosions seemed exactly t follow them as they leapt forward faster and faster untill they fairly flew through the dark down a certain roadway.

"It won't take us long to reach the christian lines at this rate." Called one of t he little girls Joice Probably but the wind caused by their speedy race tossed the words far behind her and seeing that conversation was utterly utterly impossible in such a stirring time they l clung fast to the horses mane and began thinking more about the one they were seeking than the exploding shells now. The thunder for a time continued at most frequent intervals following above them but fortunately from the shells no rain of the falling fragments hit any more of their hor horses or even them and af after they had been running for what seemed to be hours and hours a sudden terrific crash and noise far in front of them tumbled all of their horses within nigh of terror and po pain and the little girls and the soldier went tumbling head over helles in a brier bush. o breathless to speak they felt themselves carefully all over. hen finding that they were still in one piece and not injured or torn they called for the old soldier. hey could hear him moaning and muttering in a pitiful manner.

"My bones broken!" Asked violet as she examined her badly torn clothes.

"My head was badly bumped." Groaned the soldier dismally. "It was one of the shells thatexploded right on the road. All our horses are killed. Next thing we know we will be wi with the horses here."

Just then the moon came out from beh nd a thick cloud some of the intense darkness lifted and the little girls with hearts thumping with fright saw him leaning against a small tree with his eyes half closed. here was a big bump on his head. ith a little cry of spy sympathy the little girls hurried forward toward him when all at once something strange about their surroundings st struck them.

"hy where are we." Cried the little girls together stopping short. he old soldier s eyes flew open and forgetting all about his bump he looked around in great dismay. o sign of the christian lines or the encampments were anywhere. Indeed they were as it seemed in a large dim forest and considering the number of trees it w was a wonder to them at last why the shells did not kill any of them or their remaining horses long ago.

"In our panicy flight from the shells we must have run our horses the wrong way" altered the soldier in a most distressed voice.

"we could not help that." Said Angeline generously "but I wish we had not either fallen or lost our sandwitches. I for one fell hungry."

"so are we" Said her sisters. Do you think we can find something to eat and shelter in this forest Angeline.?"

Angeline did not answer for just then she caught sight of a big red sign nailed to one of the trees.

"Avoid the rebel positions." directed the sign.

"Oh come on" Cried violet cheering up immediately "We are near the enemy lines. I believe we are going to have another thrilling adventure."""

"Id'd rather have some supper." sighed Catherine wistfully "But ules unless we allwant to spend the night here un er fire we might as well move along as fast as we can wit out horses now. And we are to be fed up on adventure I s u suppose!"""

"Avoid the Clandelinian encampments" advised the next sign yet the party rdid not pay any attention to the signs and hurried on trying to keep a straight course through the trees as they had left the road to escape the shells shouldany more explode aboiv above them. In such a war stricken country like Calverinia, where on account of the war hardly any trains or trulleys or even anythingelse is seen now for travelling iolet and her sisters felt it was like going through all kinds of unexplored regions. And though violet and her sisters had been at one time or another in almost every part of western Calverinia thecountry through which they were now passing seemed totally unfamiliar to them. ight was coming on with intensor darkness and it was growing so dark that any of the little girls could hardly read any of the other signs when they pres presently came upon one with a white bor.board and white letters.

"on't dare to sig.n about or a make hymns." irected the sign sternly.

"ing about or mak o hymns." apped violet indignantly "who want's to do that I'd like to know!"

"We might as wel, kep keept on." Said the soldier in a resigned voice and they walked along some distance in great s silence. he trees of the forest were now th nn thi thinning out and as they came to the edge of the forest a white clothed Ghnome looking man confronted them with leveled musket.

"Slow down you in the party." said the man what y do you want!"

The answer he got was a sharp blow on the head by the old soldiers sabre hilt and the strangely dressed rebel soldier fell without a sound and was bound and gagged and dragged off to a deep grassefield and left there.

"Slow down for such sentries." Said violet with great diffucilty and yawning for she felt sleepy now. "what nonsense. I'll we stophow shall we ever get anywhere and find our vr friend!"

"ait t a minute." used the soldier half closing his eyes. A "Are there not two roads just ahead one going west and another going northeast. We are to take the northeast road I supo suppose. We had better slow down our walk however for the road descends very steeply."

"It certainly did descend very steeply and slow down it was for the road was so steep and full of stones that the solcie soldier and violet and her sisters had to pick their way with the utmost care. but even bad roads certainly do end somewhere and coming sudde l suddenly to the edge of the woods they saw a great seemingly never ending extentive city of encampments and tents, and wooden houses in the form of barracks lying just beow below. A countless number of dim lights burned here and thereoutside and within the encampments and now toward this violet and her sisters and the soldier hurr went as slowyly and as cautiously as they could. hey were not so very fast at that for aninaccount able drown drowsiness was stealing stealing over them.

Slowly and more surely the tired little girls and their companion advanced toward the encampments knowing from the form of tents it was some rebel armies. they felt so tired and drowsy that they had ceased to talk talk but they dragged on.

"Hah, oh, mm." Yawned the good soldier. "what makes my feet so heave. I think it is rather early to get so sleepy."

He stopped short and examined the distant encampments of the rebels sleepily. Violet and even her sisters swallowed a yawn, and seeing a distant house not far off tried to make for it but they were so tired that t hey could only manage to go at a walk. they fairly gaped as they stumbled along with their eyes nearly closed. By the time they hadreached the house they were yawning so hard that they seemed seemed in danger sure enough of dislocating their jaws and they were perfectly breathless indeed and so sleepy t hey could hardly keep their eyes open. As they went on they soon reached the house and one of the little girls blinking up most uncertainly at a sign over the house door.

"Here we are." Yyanned violet as she held her hand wearily before her mouth.

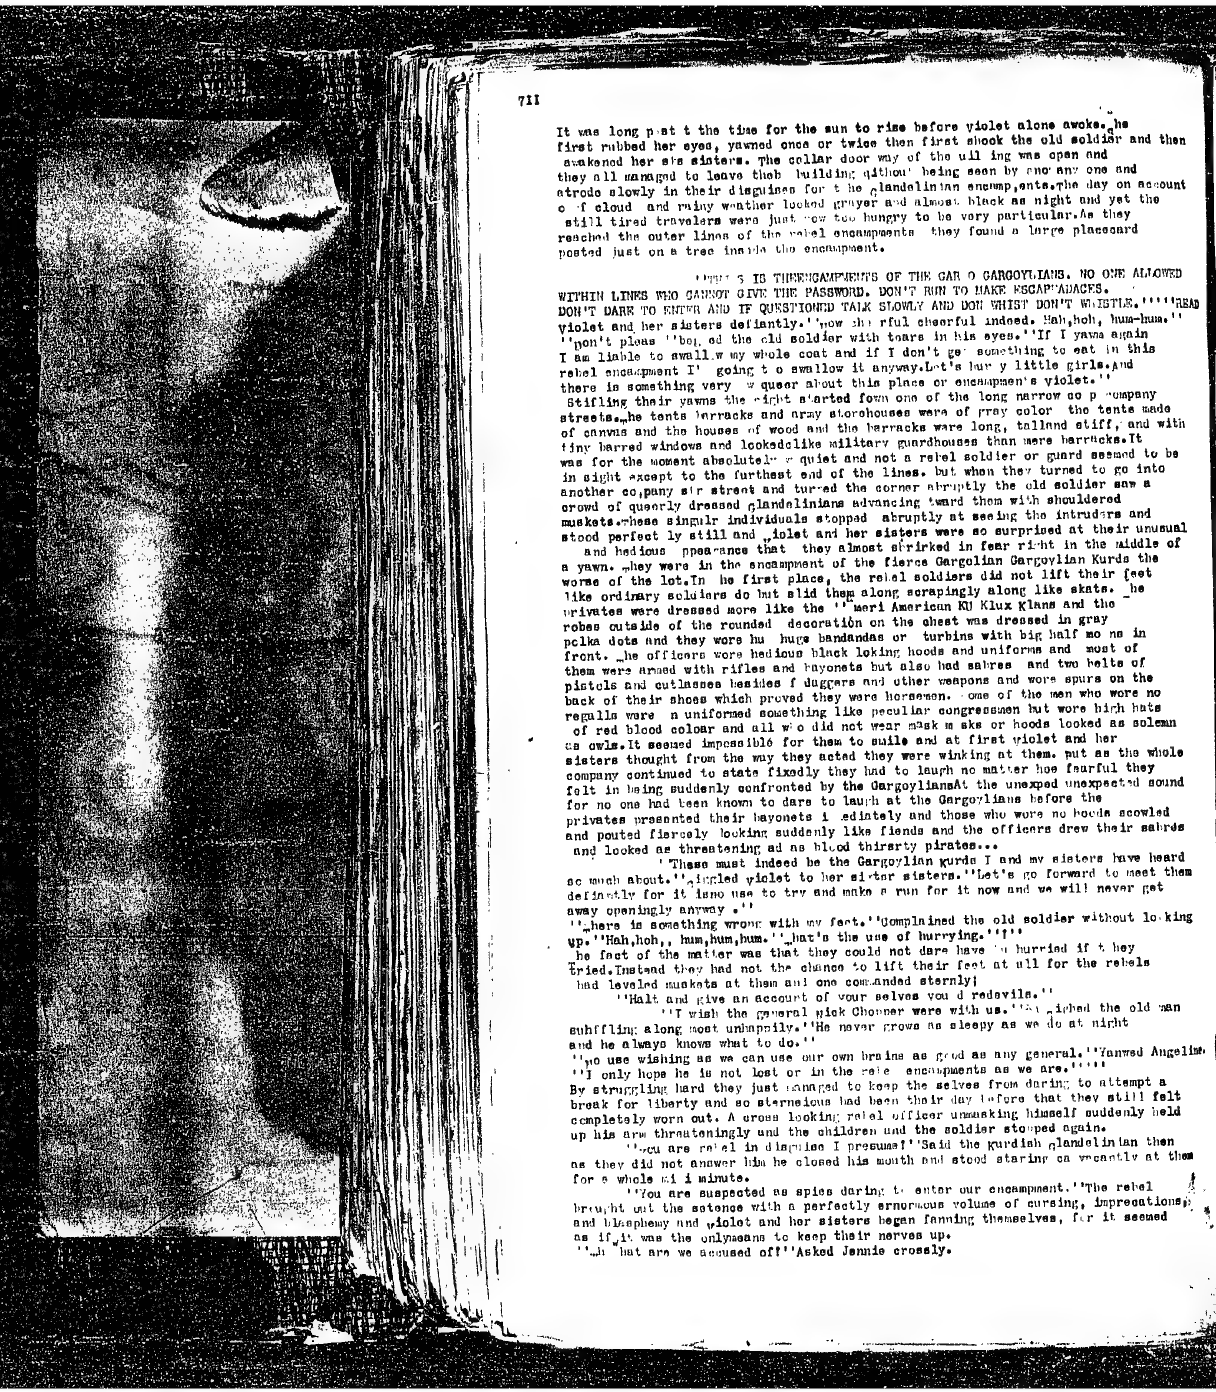
Then with some great effort she read the words of the sign.

"Um,--hah,--hoh. Headquarters of general Johnston Jackson Manley chief commander of rebel army in northwestern Calverinia acting under his son John Manley supreme commander here. Uh-hah. general M n Manleys headquarters. ow about sleeping in his cellar!"

"Anything to get in shelter." Was the answer and they were all soon in without having been seen by any of the sentrie sentries.

"Shall we all sleep onthefloor i in the darkest corners!" Asked violet. of the soldier. who had laid down.

There was no answer from him.



"o you hear!"" he repeated.

"Hah, hoh, hu, umm." came from one of her sisters.

They looked around in alarm, despite their sleepiness.

"o you hear jh ohn Henry." hey repeated anxiously as no answer answer came through the gn gloom.

The old soldier did not hear. He had laid down in one of the corners and was fast asleep, and so in another minute t was the little girls, violet having her head pillowed against his kind comfortably brave hea t. Fast asleep in the enemy generals headquarters. "hat if a guard should come in the cellar. Think t of the nerv nerve of the children will you!"""

It was long past the time for the sun to rise before violet alone awoke. She first rubbed her eyes, yawned once or twice then first shook the old soldier and then awakened her six sisters. The cellar door way of the building without being seen by anyone and strode slowly in their disguises for the glandelinian encampments. The day on account of cloud and rainy weather looked grayer and almost black as night and yet the still tired travelers were just now too hungry to be very particular. As they reached the outer lines of the rebel encampments they found a large placeard posted just on a tree inside the encampment.

"THIS IS THE ENCAMPMENTS OF THE GARGOYLIANS. NO ONE ALLOWED WITHIN LINES WHO CANNOT GIVE THE PASSWORD. DON'T RUN TO MAKE ESCAPE ATTACKS. DON'T DARE TO ENTER AND IF QUESTIONED TALK SLOWLY AND DON WHIST DON'T WHISTLE."""READ violet and her sisters defiantly."How cheerful cheerful indeed. Hah,hoh, hum-hum." "don't please "boo, ed the old soldier with tears in his eyes." If I yawn again I am liable to swallow my whole coat and if I don't get something to eat in this rebel encampment I' going to swallow it anyway. Let's hurry little girls. And there is something very queer about this place or encampments violet."

Stifling their yawns the eight started down one of the long narrow company streets. The tents barracks and army storehouses were of gray color the tents made of canvas and the houses of wood and the barracks were long, tall and stiff, and with tiny barred windows and looked like military guardhouses than mere barracks. It was for the moment absolutely quiet and not a rebel soldier or guard seemed to be in sight except to the furthest end of the lines. but when they turned to go into another company street and turned the corner abruptly the old soldier saw a crowd of queerly dressed glandelinians advancing toward them with shouldered muskets. These singular individuals stopped abruptly at seeing the intruders and stood perfectly still and violet and her sisters were so surprised at their unusual and hedious appearance that they almost shrinked in fear right in the middle of a yawn. They were in the encampment of the fierce Gargolian Gargoylian Kurds the worse of the lot. In the first place, the rebel soldiers did not lift their feet like ordinary soldiers do but slid them along scrapingly along like skats. The privates were dressed more like the "Mexican American KU Klux Klans and the robes outside of the rounded decoration on the chest was dressed in gray polka dots and they wore huge bandandas or turbins with big half moons in front. The officers wore hedious black loking hoods and uniforms and most of them were armed with rifles and bayonets but also had sabres and two belts of pistols and cutlasses besides daggers and other weapons and wore spurs on the back of their shoes which proved they were horsemen. One of the men who wore no regalia wore a uniformed something like peculiar congressmen but wore high hats of red blood colour and all who did not wear masks or hoods looked as solemn as owls. It seemed impossible for them to smile and at first violet and her sisters thought from the way they acted they were winking at them. but as the whole company continued to state fixedly they had to laugh no matter hoe fearful they felt in being suddenly confronted by the Gargoylians At the unexpected unexpected sound for no one had been known to dare to laugh at the Gargoylians before the privates presented their bayonets identitely and those who wore no hoods scowled and pouted fiercely looking suddenly like fiends and the officers drew their sabres and looked as threatening ad as blood thirsty pirates...

"These must indeed be the Gargoylian kurds I and my sisters have heard so much about." giggled violet to her sister sisters. "Let's go forward to meet them definatly for it is no use to try and make a run for it now and we will never get away openingly anyway."

"There is something wrong with my feet." Complained the old soldier without looking up. "Hah,hoh,, hum,hum,hum." What's the use of hurrying."!"

The fact of the matter was that they could not dare have to hurried if they tried. Instead they had not the chance to lift their feet at all for the rebels had leveled muskets at them and one commanded sternly;

"Halt and give an account of your selves you d redevils."

"I wish the general Nick Chopper were with us." sighed the old man suhffling along most unhappily. "He never grows as sleepy as we do at night and he always knows what to do."

"no use wishing as we can use our own brains as good as any general." Yawned Angelina.

"I only hope he is not lost or in the rebel encampments as we are."""

By struggling hard they just managed to keep the selves from daring to attempt a break for liberty and so sleepy was their day before that they still felt completely worn out. A cross looking rebel officer unmasking himself suddenly held up his arm threateningly and the children and the soldier stopped again.

"You are rebel in disguise I presume!" Said the Kurdish glandelinian then as they did not answer him he closed his mouth and stood staring at them intently for a whole minute.

"You are suspected as spies daring to enter our encampment." The rebel brought out the sentence with a perfectly enormous volume of cursing, imprecations and blasphemy and violet and her sisters began fanning themselves, for it seemed as if it was the only means to keep their nerves up.

"What are we accused of!" Asked Jennie crossly.

"You are under arrest." said the rebel officer after a long pause and violet and her sisters seeing there was no hurrying his began counting to themselves. just as they reached a hundred the rebel officer in a fury at their apparent defiance pushed back his ridiculously shaped hat and shouted;

"I tell you you are under arrest."

"You bet all of you eight persons are under arrest." shouted all the other gargoylian glandelinians so loud that the old soldier roused himself with a sudden start and the little girls looked embrassed

"Under arrest! Under arrest! Under arrest is not what we want you dodgasted rebels. we want a breakfast or something to eat." Growled the old soldier irritably and started to curse and swear at the Gargoylian glandelinians but their fierce scowling looks spoiled it. One simply cannot defy the Gargoylians while they assume such a threatening attitude.

"You------" began the glandelinian officer. but violet and her sisters or neither the old soldier couldnot stand hearing such words again. Putting her fingers or hands to her mouth to act as a thrumpet violet shouted back defiantly;

"What for are we under arrest?"

The rebel officer regarded her most angrily and sternly. Some of them even scowled more fiercely. then the one who had first addressed the old soldier and violet and her sisters pointed with his hand to a small sign on a large tent at the corner of the company street.

"ANY STRANGERS ENTERING THE ENCAMPMENTS WITHOUT PAPERS OR A PASSWORD ARE HELD AS SPIES""" said the sign.

"We are arrested for being spies" the sign says "houted violet to the old soldiers while her sisters nodded.

"Did you say we are arrested for spies!" Asked the poor old soldier looking around him with a start. "If we are go to sleep again before we are fed we are liable to starve to death. they cannot prove we are spies anyway."

"Then keep awake and look out for yourselves and us." Yawned violet. By this time the glandelinians had surrounded them all and were waving them most imperiously ahead. they looked so threatening threateningly and their weapons looked so ungly and dangerous that violet and her sisters and the old soldier began to creep in the direction of a gloomy looking barracks building. Of the journey neither of them hardly remembered a thing except the fierce look of the glandelinians for with the fierce and sanguinary looking Gargoylians it was almost impossible to escape being afraid. So unconcerned were they however that it seemed as if they had been walking in their sleep sleep for the next thing violet and her sisters knew a harsh voice called most fiercely;

"The rebel Six christian spies are asleep or on unconscious. Poke them and arouse them."

Greatly alarmed violet and her sisters opened their eyes. They were in a huge wooden hall hung all over with all kinds of weapons and even armour and seated on a great chair in another room room about a table snoring snoring so loud that all the weapons seemed to be rattling was a rebel general. The tallest and crossest looking rebel Gargoylians ar used him and for arousing him from sleep like that the general rushed at himwith a long long poker giving the private such a shove that he sprawled to the floor with a crash.

"So" Said the old soldier awakened by the clatter "A rebel has fallen by the cause of another one."

"Prisoners and spies general." shouted one of the lieutenants of the fierce Gargoylians lifting the fallen private. The fallen soldier arose with great effort and the general removing his mask violet and her sisters thought they saw a kind timid looking face with great melancholy blue gray eyes--not at all like a glandelinians, as they explained to general vivian their father later.

"What means all this unwonted clamor!" Asked the general, peering most curiously at the prisoners.

"We are sorry to awaken you sir" said the rebels "But we have prisoners who are spies before you."

"We are really sorry that you were awakened sir." said one of the little girls politely "but we are not spies I tell you just now. And could you please be kind enough to give us some breakfast."!

"A lot of eatings." Added the old soldier."

"If it safer for you children not to ask such questions and talk so much "Said the general mornfully and throwing back his head he roared in a high hoarse voice.!

"don't stand there, dont stand there like poke s you get me ought out of breath. Begone every one of you out of my room while I look the prisoners over. And don't allow any one to interupt me either unless I call for some one or die the death."

The glandelinians murmured and growl growled something threateningly, and some brandished their weapons but said nothing.

"If he were not in uniform I'd thrash him." Said one of the Gargoylians under his breath. "But he is too cowardly to take it off."

"He cannot be a wicked Mandolinian general at all." Thought Violet and her sisters too interested to pay much attention to the old soldier for at the first words of the generals fierce oath and the G Gargoyliane who had unmasked themselves began to scowl horribly and by the time he had finished the stern order they were backing out of his room faster than Violet and her sisters or the old soldier ever imagined they could go.

"So that is why they took us prisoners." Thought Violet to herself. The air seemed clearer somehow, the sun had come out and she and her sisters no longer felt sleepy. When the last of the scowling Gargoyliane had disappeared the general sighed and sat down again in his big chair.

"We so seldom take them very very wroth. In fact the are mostly independent and cannot endure to remain unless they have to." Explained the general. "But hold it was food you asked of me, breakfast I believe you called it though it is far in past breakfast time now."

With a peculiar glance twart the old soldier the general banged on a bell on the table with his hand and a tall Zimmermannian came quickly into the room. Frank Fidder bring the stew and other food." roared the general as the rebel stood looking at the prisoners fiercely and wickedly.

"Get stew and food Fidder." He repeated loudly and angrily and began to draw his sabre at which the rebel fairly flew out of the room, returning in ten minutes with trays for every one of the children and the soldier. Inturn these from a big cart were handed very ungraciously to Violet and her sisters and the old soldier. However Violet and her sisters thought they never had tasted anything more delicious. The old soldier was gulping down his share with almost closed eyes and at the same time thanked the general.

"Are you little girls, perchance seven little pretty damsels disguised as boys in distress please?"

Quite startled and surprised Violet and her sisters looked up sure from their soup bowls and saw the general up appearing to regard them most wistfully.

"The little girls are in the Mandolinian encampments in the Gargoyliane power and that is the same thing please." Said the old soldier without opening his sleepy eyes.

"We are lost among you troopers." Began the little girl Jennie "but))"

There was indeed something so quaint and gentle about the rebel general that the little girls forgetting themselves soon found themselves talking to him like an old friend indeed. Finding afterwards by his pretty proof and showing them his real uniform that he was a real spy and a soldier of Angelinia assuming as a rebel officer the little girls told told him finally of their adventure since leaving the christian lines and even told about the disappearance of the general called Nick Chopper.

"Passing strange as it seems but I saw you little girls entering the lines while out scouting and entered elsewhere in disguise as a rebel general to rescue you" Murmured the general "but really I'm no general but a private. And if I seem a little behind times little girls must not blame me please. For an hour after I entered this place - I pretended to dose lowly in this building or room and it had come over me that things had greatly changed. This old soldier you have with you he talks quite manfully and this christian encampment you mentioned this one under general Hanson Vivian. Never heard of it being in this location. I was in Concentinian Aronburge army."

"Never heard of the army under general Hanson being in this location." Gasped all of the little girls. "Why sir you are a subject of the army and his army was not far from here though we don't know just where."

Here Violet and her sisters gave him a short history of the situation of the christian army when they had just left it two days before and of the many wonderful and hairbreadth stirring adventures they had gone through since the beginning of the rebellion. The aged and parenty rebel general listened with growing melancholy. "I see think" He sighed mournfully. "But you little girls became prisoners here "

"Are we really prisoners?" Asked Violet and her sisters in surprise. "When we first were brought before you we thought you were a rebel general."

"Never" Almost thundered the soldier so suddenly that Violet and her six sisters jumped. "I am a christian in disguise I tell you."

Seeing their startled expression he controlled himself. "I am a christian soldier but not a spy." He continued brokenly. "Just only yesterday mounted on my gentle steed I went out scouting to find out the movements of the enemy The name of the rebels!" The soldier tapped his forehead uncertainly. "No to--I have forgotte a I cannot be able to remember."

"Could his boys been General Manley or his gang." Exclaimed Violet wide eyed with interest. "Why just think of your self being alive."

"That's just the point" Spoke chocked the dispirited soldier "I wouldn't have been alive. I was so excited that I can only remember what happened accurately." He confessed miserably.

"But how did you escape and how did you get here." Asked the old soldier who did not like at all being left out of the conversation.

"I had barely left the christian lines with my small party of soldiers before we met with a rebel squadron who appeared to be Mic-Hollenstinians" Said the soldier sitting up very straight. "We had to clash and my troopers were annihilated in the combat but I spurred my fleet horse forward, our sabres met whereupon a sword duel with the rebel leader and the stranger was unseated and I escaped. But by faith it was as it seems to mortal rebel." The curious soldier sighed deeply and lapsed into silence.

"But happened?" Asked Angeline curiously--for the soldier seems to have forgotten them entirely.

"As I raced away the rebel officer" he said with another mighty sigh "Struck the ground with his lance and cried "Stand there" mounted his horse, "I'll get you for this you infernal National" and then charged he until I was and he and his column disappeared for a moment and then charged he until I was rescued. But now to day out scouting I saw you in danger and entered the lines to intercede for you." With a sorry sorrowful gesture the soldier arose his tears of emotion coursing down. "I feel that I am brave--------very brave but how am I to know until until" I have encountered real danger! Ah! Ah friends, I behold in me a soldier who though in the war so long already who has never had a real adventure--never killed or wounded even a rebel--nor championed a lady-- ---nor gone out on a quest."

Dropping on his knees before the pretty lovely vivian girl children and heroines he took the hand of the prettiest one Je Jennie.

"Please let me also go on this quest with you in quest for the valiant general Nick Chopper. Let me be your guardians." He begged of them eagerly.

"Good night fair ones." Coughed the old soldier who to tell all the truth was feeling a bit jealous. But Violet and her sisters felt greatly thrilled by he honor thus shown to them and as the poor soldier continued to look at her very pleadingly one of the little girls took off her beautiful hair ribbon and bound it around his arm.

"You shall be our own true guardian and we your fair little lady children" Jennie announced very solemnly.

At this very interesting juncture the old soldier gave a tremendous yawn and the new found soldier friend with an exclamation of alarm jumped to his feet. The rebels were returning in the hall and Violet and her sisters also felt much alarmed for some of the rebels had seen the performance.

The rebels had opened their eyes in a mas o ast onishement and alarm alarm but did not retire this time. The two soldiers managed to swallow their anger and fear and the other soldier hastily clearing his throat throat shouted;

"Up up, my legions of troops sweep them away;
We take the field of battle and carnage to day;
For millions of small ladies fair to day to day;
And o for God and my blessed Mother, up up my merrey men."
Avaunt, be off, and begone you bottle of inks;
Or I'll put all of you to sad sleep in fourty three winks."

As he had drawn two pistols the rebels left sullenly but the effects of their scowling and angry presence had thrown Violet and her sisters into a violent fit of fear, and suspicion.

"If I run out of ammunition now nothing can save you little girls now." Said the soldier in an agitated voice. "We have been discovered at least they saw my actions."

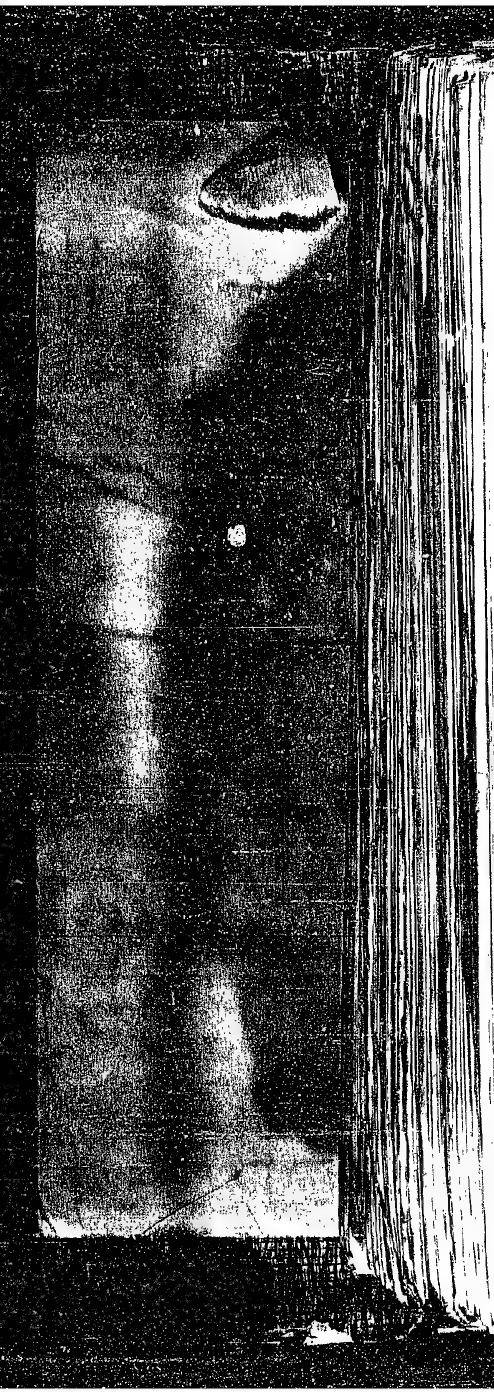
"Don't allow yourself to run out of ammunition. Don't do it." Begged the little girls piteously as Violet shook himviciently. "Don't we all ra run away now."

"I know of pr somers who were held and who tried to run away for a year in vain." Wailed the soldier in a discouraged tone. "But if we make the break we may be shot dead by the rebels before we reach the company street. They would be rather fond of you little girls if they knew you were the fair Vivian Girls." He added very apologetically."

"Couldn't you keep us well supplied and shoot like mad." Asked the old soldier in an anxious anxious tone for the prospects of seeing the little fair girls being treated as spies by this horrid G Gargoyliane was more than he could bear.

"Could not we all be armed with the pistols hanging on the walls and have p plenty of ammunition and could not we all shoot?" Suggested the little girls. "Surely all nine of us won't run out of ammunition all at once."

"I'm not much at shooting with a pistol." Groaned the old soldier, beginning to tremble "But I'm willing to try and do my share."



"I like you sir old man and friend." Said the soldier going over and shaking hands with him. "You ought to be promoted for going with the children so far."

The old soldier blinked his eyes but knowing knowing it was kindly meant he bore the praise bravely.

"I am henceforth going to be promoted." He whispered to Violet and her sisters

Next the soldier secured for the little girls and the old soldier weapons and a good sull supply of bullets and ammunition and handed them to the fugitives.

"Be confused confuse the enemy if they persue." He exclaimed. "And now all little angels if you are ready we will start on the quest for the honorable general Nick Chopper and remember everybody-shoot and fire,---and shoot for your life."

Taking a deep breath and seeing that every revolver had over chamber loaded, the two men and „iolet and her sistersburst out of the room and dashed into the hall shooting wildly in every direction with the purpose to cause great confusion among the „lan' Indians outside the building. "Now I" did.

"Do not shoot save one unless we have to." came out „iolet.

"„hat's the „ifference."Whispered one of the soldier friends."They would kill us the first chance they had.."

"Yo]r your lives they would.." cried the old soldier firing blindly at the first rebels he saw. The „landelinians in the building were so completely taken aback at the exact moment and the bewildering sounds of the splattering guns that not knowing who would be first hit many scattered or ran scurrying right and left, some stopped and fired in returned others but did not down the fugitives.In another minute the nine fugitives were on planes to south were out of the building in short order and within on their way through one of the „ide openings looking acoupy streets. „iolet and her sisters seeing their revolvers were getting out of ammu ition drew their other guns and stuck to the wild shooting, the soldier who had befriended them fired shot after shot and the guns of the old soldier roared and snapped a volley of their own making, while considering it was a first attempt of his kind shooting with pistols was not so bad as it laid a number of rebels low in the co-courage streets. „landelinians panic stricken and not having their weapons at that no ent stumbled this way and that, and all went well until the fugitives rushed into a company of „landelinians who were playing football. The swiftness at which they were aroused to the danger of the fugitives getting away fascinated „iolet and her sisters and finding themselves without loaded guns now they were forced to stop a and made a minute or two to reload their pistols.

"Do not on't stop as you load guns fools." Growled the old soldier in the middle of the line of resistance.To make up for lost time „iolet and her sisters fired swiftly than ever and ran all the harder but alas , next instant one of them who was Jennie fell over a stone w ich ex deprived er of breath that she could hardly nor scramble up, let alone reload her pistol which was empty again.As soon as she was at forced to stop shooting some of the fiercest of the glandelinians stopped or paused in t eir thier flight, and as soon as the they paused Jennie gaping from sle-plessness again began to hastily load.Shooting, for dear lif with one pistol the old soldier jerked Je ie by the arm if you don't mention and the other little girls rallied and screamed as loud as they fired that t e nearest „landelinians covered their ears while those at arms looked away with leveled muskets with the intention of shooting the fugitives down.

"The glandelinians are aiding their rifles at us now." came one."Yes,ad the old soldierand Jennie came and in a few minutes was able to use one fi er small pi t ols again. But running and shooting at once is not an easy and at all. And running through a crowded street filled with „landelinians trying to head you off and presenting you with harpoons was like trying to run through a big crowd of people. "We pistol is not loaded now and I can't fire another shot as I'm out of ammunition." gasped poor Jennie stumbling along, while the old soldier was puffing like a steam engineas a „landelinians in the rear had recovered from their first alarm and panic, and were following at a safe distance. The outer limits of the „landelinian enemy encampment were only a short distance off but it seemed to „iolet and her sisters that they could not go another step as they were all tired out beyondextreme on horseback had gathered at the entrance ready to pour the outer limits of the encampment's and a long the fugitives could short their way clean through they would all be either shot down and killed or wounded or maimed as I overpowered and innominiously carried back to the prison house they had just left. If we don't believe it ask them."""

"Now"spoke and the old soldier"We a lar it in for the sake of the sacred you are seeking."

A[illegible] followed took a deep breath and their their hearts residing strength into their own in our fighting, and with „landelinian officer had now a reached with his sabre drawn.

"Take that"He drawled."A before violet realized what he was going to do he had made a fierce stroke at her with the sword.She leaped aside from the terrific blow a trip of stone[illegible] and fell with a loud and was knocked almost senseless.

"Violet. O ed Oracle e at last."wailed the old sol ier stooping the officer rebel down, and then stop ing the st in his fierce work was leading over the little girl while her sisters returned. „e poor old soldier gave a sigh and gave od despair and „iolet's sisters began firing as fast as they could and beat the „landelinians back[illegible] free stones as they came slowly. One of the rebels nodded to each other and pleased and in a moment one of them started forward with a long rope coiled at the end like a serpent's eye. „e three ile and the other soldier seeing the danger recalled their efforts seeing that Angelinian was mortally wounded began shot and then she was likely fell the old soldier leaped on the nearest rebel and fought with all his strength down crashed the Angelinian rebel to the ground clinging against the stones that paved the tanted company street.

"Shoot at the rebels like mad."„ared the old soldier glaring at the rebels fiercely. One of the little girls had been at unready by her fall and for a few minutes had not the strength to rise.g[illegible] up on the hard stones and to king fearful and repel reproachfully at the old soldier Angelina reloaded her weapons and began firing again as she knew how. who old soldiers heart was like to burst between lack of breath and fear but making one last tremendous effort, and still shooting madly, he bounded at the „landelinian who had the long piece of hemp o rope seized the rope and was back f lafore the surprised rebel had even the chance to drawn his own weapon.Seizi the wounded rebel the old soldier bleeding "pie It arrest d his rush."Violet."s w If the last though was plainly dazed had just enough consciousness of mind to o obey and the next minute the fugitives with reloaded weapons are dashing and shooting their way madly through the roup of „landelinians who were under general roPokes midways dragging the wounded rebel officer aft er them.

"Bumpty bump--bump bump---bump. Bangaty--bang-bang.Went the rebel officer v over the do ples holding his hat with one hand and his only we p weapon a sabre that in the other hand. From the re action the rebels sent ared or fell this wa way and that and such was the deter ination of the fugitives that they never stopped dashing forward or avoiding firing sadly kill they were out of the company street, and half way up a rough road probably the same one they had so recently travelled.Then with a mighty rope with a mighty sigh the two soldiers who had hold of the rope drop ed it, and the rebel officer rolled over and over down the hill and lay panting with exhaustion at the bottom.

Indeed the worst worse of this exciting moment had awk awakened the fugitives throughcutly. Indeed the poor old soldier from his fierce exertions was black and blue and his small darrger which he carried in his hilt was dented and scraped frightfully in important planes planes.

Violet and her sisters considerably s shaken by the experience, opened their eyes when they felt sure the danger seemed over a d and then all stole behind a high ledge of rocks waiting for the persuers to appear.

"Probably ng need."Puffed the old soldier. Your only selves have saved us."

"won't the „landelinians com e come up here?"Asked one of the little girls who was catherine staring around a bit dizzily and anxiously.

"they can not live in any numbers if they do."Said the old man fingering his revolver. "they can only come up the road two at a time it is so narrow and we are nine and have enough bullets yet to hold off an army all day."

At this violet and her sisters drew a sigh of relief. The other Angelinian soldier however was looking very very grave.

"I have surely failed on my first adventure with t he „landelinians. Had it not been for you little girls yourselves and your old friend here we would not be prisoners among the „landelinians or at least on our way to a miserable death."He murmured in a very sad tone."Then he unfastened the large black plume of his „landelinian hat "It is surely not good for me to wear it."He sighed mournfully and though violet and her sisters tried their best to comfort him he refused to put it back. Finally she fastenedthe black plume to her own hat and they went down to where they had left the wounded rebel officer who was lying do below unconscious. There happened to be a small stream near by and after they had poured some cold water over him head the wounded rebel opened his eyes.

"Been in a good many fights with the christian dogs."Gasped the rebel disdainfully "But I never fought one like this before. Trying to capture fugitives. Bah."

"But I never fought one like this before. Trying to capture fugitives. Bah."

They however did not answer him, but untied the rope from his and proceeding on their way somewhat allowed him to return to this own lines as best as he know how how.

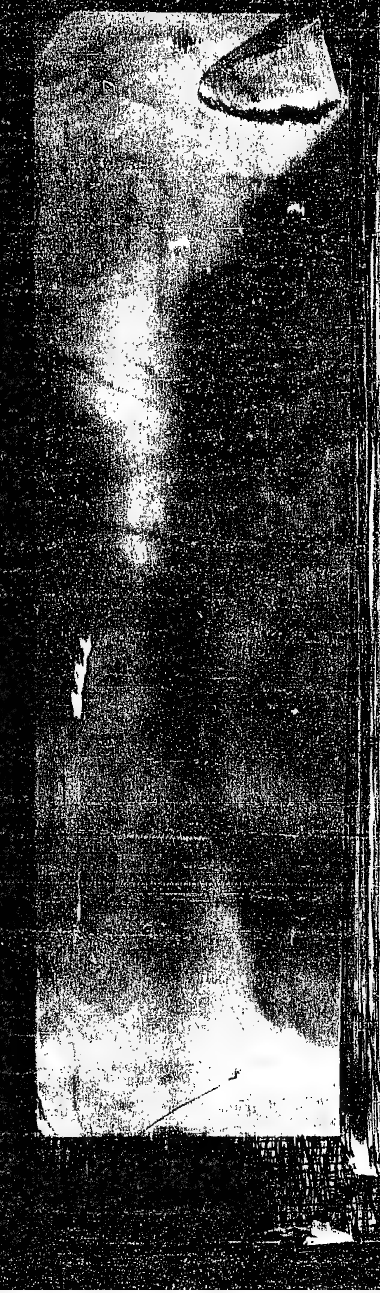
"noble soldiers and friends of Jesus how can we ever repay you."Faltered the little girls at last."Alas that we cannot failed in the hour of trial."

"why it was not a question of courage at all.""Declared the old soldier greatly embarrassed."I had the best guns and the quickest motion that was all. We all got the rough end of it though we did escape."

The two soldiers and the little girls looked ruefully at their clothing. violet had the back of her clothes almost torn away so that at the back she was almost almost naked.

"Never mind."She said bravely."It is our front that we present to the rebel foes."

"How you are certainly talking like a real little hero[illegible] e heroine."



"How you are certainly talking like a real little hero[illegible] e heroine."

said the old soldierViolet's face shone with pleasure but she did not say anything."And now you are talking like a real christian Knight."Said Angelino. "A while ago you said we could not escape and first-thing you know we will all be near the christian lines or near where our friend Nick chopper is."

"Happy days. The little maid is moral, right."The old soldier exclaimed in an attitude that was evidently striking."I[illegible] once we do the rest will be very easy.

"can't may rest to be a pleasu."Yawned the other soldier."Just to think of it makes me yawn. Now don't don't you all think we had better start off as soon as possible."

"If you are rested."Began violet. The soldier put his hand over his left ear and to had no comi cal that the little girls and the old soldier laughed heartily. "If you and we are all ready."Ascended „ violet and the whole party of adventures started up again on the steep roads.

"The first thing we should do."Said Jennie"Is to now get back to the christian lines as quickly as we can and then have an expedition go out and find the generals."

At this very minute general Hanson Angelic Vivian the chief christian general of all the christian armies in his headquarters not far fro Kralnic Greek was puzzling over an important note he had received. This note seemed to be telling everything that had happened in the war up to now and while it did not give any lengthy details it was nevertheless a very useful possession. The main thing he read was " GENERAL LEONIA MELDONIA NICKNELL HAS RETURNED TO THE REBEL LINES".

"Now who in the world is this general Meldonia Nicknell."he asked himself. He puzzled over it a very long time and then deciding it had nothing to do with his business of war just now he closed and folded the note and dispatched it to his brother, and then went out on little scouting tour with some officers.

Violet and her sisters and the two men with them had in the meanwhile reached the first edge of the dim forest,. Two great roads led ahead out through the forest, and after much debating they took the wider wider.

"Do you suppose thisleads to the christianarmieswhere they encampmen encamped?" Asked the old soldier dubiously.

"Only time will tell sir."Said the younger soldier.

"You indeed "murmured the old soldier."time will tell---but what!""""

Violet and her sisters sort inly want be having a lovely time at their fathers - headquarters....."""Remarked Gertrude Angeline to her friend Jennie Turner one afternoon as they sat reading in general Vivians headquarters garden several days after Violet and her sisters had made their departure from the al main christian lines.....

"One always would and always have a jolly good time and general Revort Vivians headquarters."Laughed the little child marion og of Angelinia. II"I must go and see them some time too and ask them what they had been doing. Too bad they missed the two Glandelinian prisoners who had been bro brought in the encampments not just a few hours ago. Were they not the funniest freiels ever seen for Gargylinns.!!!!!!"

Both the little girls went off heard their own pleces pluce in a perfect gale of laughter. Laugh you poor Rcons.The two queerly dressed Glandelinians had tried to enter the christian lines with the intention of trying to find out where vivian and her sisters had gone and what their quest had been for but they had been hoodwinked with their surrounding to keep themselves from being suspected and arrested and partly because they had no sort of memories whatever where they had placed themselves they had never mentioned why they entered the christian lines nor said anything about the Vivian girls and thus saved themselves from being arrested as spiesand were only suspected as intruders.The Glandelinians however were quite good natured for Glandelinians and talked incessantly of their own generals and their ways, and the ways of their encampment life and told the t captors and even children near them innumerable stories. As no evidence had been against them however they were later on with general Vivians order been allowed to go free and some of the many soldiers in turn gave the two rove rebel visitors some provisions and that very morning they had started back to their own lines and all the celebrities of the army had gotten up to see them off.

"Maybe those funny dressed but real good Glandelinians will come again sometime and become to our own side."" Said Jennie Turner swinging her feet."But look Gertrude here comes a messenger."

A messenger it surely was dressed up the quint red uniform of the Abyssinkilians. It was from general Hanson Angelic Vivian the main Angelinian chief and caused the little girl to sigh with vexation.....

Tell Frank Jackson to harness my horse"Said Gertrude Angeline after glancing hastily at the little note.."The Angelinians under general Hannon Vivian and a bigrebel army under generals Hon porters and no vers are moving against each other near Goblin and Bee Betsy town and it is to be one of another battle is going to rage, and so soon too.and tell one of the to scout companies etc make ready for a journey."

"May I come too please!"Asked Jennie Turner.

Gertrude nodded with a troubled little frown and Jennie hastened off in very important manner.In all the world not many of the little girls are called upon or probably are brave enough to go out on any kind of dangerous adventures or to help settle dangerous situations in any army and command boyce boy scout companies as wonderful as Gertrude Angeline and her maid and her friendsand Violet and her sisters.....

General Hanson Vivans army had indeed been confirm confronted by a Glandelinian army of sixty million on under generals Francis Turners and Jennine Hoppers and fearing something was wrong sent Gertrude Angeline, Jessie Turner and a company of boyscouts and the soldiers were running first the last speed their horses could manage.This indeed was pro in fact for their horses see ed to never get tired and could outrun any horse near their size and strength. But the fact is that Gertrude Angeline did not have a chance to know at all the adventure of Violet and her sister Violet and her sisters nor knew of what exciting adventures they were really having.

As for general Robert Angelic Vivian who had also much trouble with his enemies was busily at work over his plans and found a certain note which was modestly written;

J.J Manley.T.E.P General in chief o of Glandelinian army.
.M.D.M.B.V.MN.

"I simply believe we will never find our way out of this strange forest.' Violet stopped with a very discouraged little sigh and leaned wearily against a big pine tree while the others looked around bewildered.They had followed the road for sixteens. irst indeed it had been very wide and seemed to be a fine road but it had gradually dwindled to a crooked little path that for a time wound in a most crazy way in and out through the trees and then finally disappeared altogether.Although it was almost noonday hardly a ran of the sunshine could penet penetrate through the thick green depths though the scenery was beautiful nevertheless.

"I surely think"Said the old soldier peering into the green gloom ahead"that a very great adventure is in ahead of us."

The other soldier lo listened carefully.

"What makes you think so."""He asked anxiously.

"Hark and list! listen carefully."Said the brave old soldier holding up his finger warningly. From a great way off sounded a curious thumping, like a great numbers of giant hammers pounding on the ground. Sometimes it sounded nearer and nearer and then would slacken up recede and then renew renew again.

"Good gracious and Heaven and the blessed Mother help us."Cried Angeline catching hold of her sisters ar ."This is worse than being inside the rebel encampments."

"Perchancelittle girls it is a battle somewhere araging."Exulted the old soldier drawing his sword and pistol."Ah how it would refreshme to slay a number of the bloody Glandelinians."

"I don't relish any more Glandelinians for the present. Got badly wounded while you s persued once."Said the other soldier in a husky voice.""" but he added;"Nevertheless if we ar persued I' ll fight desperately with you brother. Stand back behind the trees Violet and your sisters."

"As more thudding sounded and still nearer this time the old soldier fairly danced up and down with delight and excitement.

"Approach you villains."He roared lustily"approach til. I impale you on my sword.Ah but had I and yo others only a horse. How we could finish our persuers in these woods."

"We would still be riding on horses if it had not been for those fatal shells." Said the other soldier."But cheer up my dear old man and Violet and your sisters and my poor man your voice is little hoarse."

Violet and her sisters almost gladly nervously then seized hold of some trees trees for the whole forest seemed to be shaking from the din of some great explosions which continued.

"Now now what is up ."I gasped the old soldier.There was a fearful roar of explosions a terrific quaking of the ground that threw them all on their faces and tore every tree and branches shaking like mad if there was a hurricane and then a great eruption seemed to occur just near the edge of the clearing but then seen in the forest and a great storm of missles came crashing through the tree tops not three paces from the little party. Before they could even swallow a gigantic explosion flashed upward and a great number of trees were seen to fly up by the roots and disappeared in a cloud of white smoke while suddenly all the trees some voices were heard to shout;

"What are little christian dogs for/,
To feed the giant guns of theGlandelinians calledBanfadors;
torn or mangled, flayed or boasted;
We know there are eight in the woods or maybe more."

"You hear that."quavered the old soldier. The others did not answer to this.

pin hat b had been jam ed down over his eyes by his fall and he was fixing i t it into shape with both hands. Frightened though violet and her sistrs were they ran to the old soldiers assistance.

"Look out for the landoli in glandelinians they have a concealed battery in the woods and are firing at us."Cried the old soldier as soon as his hat was replaced."Forward but go from one tree at toanother."

"My heart is beating a quick retreat."Gulped Jen ie and her sisters nodded but they boldly bounded forward after the two soldiers.

"Look out here comes some."Yelled the old soldier and one seeing him rushed him but the soldier gave a mighty slash at the rebel while the other soldier gave a spring and downed the rebel in a moment. As more rebels appeared the little girls drew their pistols and yelling from fear and excitement opened fire.

"Ou hOuch "came one of the rebels while there came a crash that shook every leaf in the forest.

"Hey you fo ls."Yelled another"You stop those christian dogs from firing Or I'll report you to the aurthoti aurthorities."

With that the rebels darted behind some trees themselves and sent in a volley that sent many leaves of the trees down with t he concussion of the din and a shell explodin from a concealed battery was followed by another that went flying through the tree tops and then came crashing to earth smashing trees like grass blades and then exploded but too far from the fighting fugitives. At the awful crash of the explosion for a moment the litt le girls stopped short in their firing, and at the command of the two soldiers they put their hands over their ears and ran as far and as fast as they could. When as a shellexploded right in front of them at about a hundred feet they stopped short opened their eyes and stared around giddily.

The soldiers in retreating had fired upon the rebels and one of the glandelinians who had overtaken them had been shot down and wounded and was lying flat on his back but the rest of the rebels came in a column that stretched the distance of four or five city blocks. The old soldier still clung to his sabre and he was girling and struggling iwith a rebel who had overtaken him in a way violet and her sisters could not understand.Then finally looked around in a panic panic for the other soldier friend. Just then he appeared through the haze of smoke.

"Good night."He pusah puffed a stre m of blood running down his face and looking ruefully at his sword which had snapped off at the handle."These are indeed a great number of rebels."

"Don't you think we had still be running."Shivered Angeline thinking of the ferocity of the glandelinians who were after them.

"Not while I wear a uniform."Exclaimed the soldier proudly touching violets hair ribbon which still adorned his left arm."come my good friends let us dispatch these dirty rebels.

"Look out for the glande l glandelinians they are aiming at you."Screamed Jennie making me at empt to move from behind the tree she was at.

The soldier jumped from a rock and got behind a tree just as a volley crashed out.The f gitives returned the fire and down went a dozen rebels.

"the rebels seem to be frightened no the selves."whispered the little girl catherine who was beside the soldier."But whatever is the matter with them!"

At this minute the nearest of the rebels began rushing forward from tree to tree. The soldier had a piece of cloth in his hands which whenhe had held of stretched a certain length and violet and her sisters stared in amazement as they saw him flaunt it to the enemy as it was colored white.

"Don't do that."Screamed violet"WE'll never surrender."

"It's only a ruse."He roared stiffening p and reloading his gun. "they will think we mean it and come out in the open and we can shoot them down."

Seeing the flaunting of the white flag the rebels sprang nimbly from behind the trees and the leader shouted;

"surrender yo christian dogs."He demanded it threateningly.

violet and her sisters seeing that nothing c ould be done followed the example. As she bit off a cartridge she saw one of the rebels making a signal and believing their ruse was discovered they all fired and brought down twent y rebels before the rest of them reached the shelter of the trees.

"by there are all thousands of them."Violet cried excitedl .

"Oh hush please."Cried the soldier."We would e annihilat d in a moment if the enemy knew how few we were."

"They are mighty anxious to capture us that is certain."Said Hettie looking o longingly in the direction of retreat.The rebels seemed to be surrounding them.

"go way"Screamed the old soldier shooting the nearest rebels and just then there was another crash of a gun which made the ground shake and violet I slid into a hole as she ully e a cubbish crossly out of the depression of the ground.

"We will be prisoners if we don dood do something."she moaned the old soldier, wiping the dirt from her face.

"I can't fight such acolums of rebels as that."sighed the soldier dodging just in time a great fra fragment of bark that had been torn from the tree by a speeding bullets."Then I have to apologize for that attack though."

"We'll"Cried ZAngeline suddenly"I believe I have a great idea."

One rebel lay wounded near her and she said to him;

"We demand of you to tell us how to escape the rebels encircling us. If you don't we will hold you in front of ourpersuers as we go and expose you for our own benifit to get awa .If you tell us we will let you go."she called loudly, for the wounded soldier seemed to start sobbing.

This rebel off soldier seemed to be afraid of the fugitives and he readily granted their request and gave them directions.

"You won't kill me now will you!"gnified the fool-i fcolish glant Linian.

"Never allow your selve to join in a crusade of children a girl"Demanded the old soldier sternly.

"o sir I won't."Answered the rebel sor le."But your bullet do much damage to my leg.!"

But before he had resolved the answer to the question and before h realized what had happened the fugitives had worked their way through the only avenue unseen and the next minute were in a wide clearing near a large field of flowers of a ll kinds.

"Oh splattered Hettie as they continued on swiftly."Oh what if they should persue us now and we in the open."

But they had outwitted the glandelinians who did not know where they had gone so suddenly and no rebel appeared.

"What's this! what's this!" Exclaimed the old soldier seeing his companion was wounded and he him, at the stream of blood wildly."Don are shot comrade."

"We w got out of the forest anway."Explained violet as she dressed the wound which was only a scratch."Have you swallowed our powder smoke."

The wounded man was still dizzy from his experience and only she k his head feebly. The other soldier sight sighed and sat heavily down on a tree stump"There is a sort of honor in overcoming a bunch of rebels I think."He observed looking wistfully at the little girls."Ah a had it been but a proper fight and not a runaway o one."

"We did splendid as at that. But I think you did more splendid."H Jumping up violet issed the two soldiers."And you are talking just beautifully more like a good soldier every minute."She added with conviction or something like that. The poor soldiers tried hard not to look pleased.

"give me a milder enemy.My legs ache yet. first shooting out our way out of rebel lines---then fighting in a dense forest. Ugh. What next!" growled the other soldier.

"why luc lunch i or something like it if we still fell like eating."Said Daisy beginning to give out some o of the provisions still in their possessio . She had bread and other eatables and violet and her sisters and the two soldiers found them quite delicious.

"We did better t eans on them."Said Angeline when she and her sisters and the two soldiers had eaten enough."We may need more later."

"Everything is green so we must be somewhere in the state of punchkin"announced the old soldier who had just finished eating."There's another road too."

"Maybe it will take us to the christian lines."The other soldier shaded his eyes and stared curiously at the long lane stretching invi invitingly far ahead of them now.

"Well anyway we are out of the enemy possessed forest and the rebel encampments under general Pokes and maybe we will meet so some who will tell us about the whereabouts of general Dick chop er. come on all of you."Cried Juice gaily."I think we are all on the right track this time."

Indeed the whole afternoon went on very pleasantly pleasantly for the nine travelers. he road they had taken was very wide and quite shady and really seemed a bit familiar to at least violet and her sisters.violet and her sisters, violet and her sisters walked in a comfortable and dignified manner beside their two soldier friends and took their time to make the time and as they went on one of the little girls told their new friends all about their own friends and of general Dick chopper.....

"By the name of jerusalem. He should be o promoted.."The old soldier exclaimed, slapping his knee,,, as violet told how the clev clever general had helped outwit general Gnome ing at the battle of Combi on the the Ermine creek when general vivian and his son germania vivian had the bloody four hours battle there. when the wicked general had tried to force troops a across the Jennie's Bridge and failed.

"ut where in the world i e the handsome man now pray!" he old soldier sobred quickly."Maybe in need of many friends I'll bet. Mayhap at the mercy of some terrible human monsters like the Manleys, or the other Insurgent leaders."""""

"""""Oh I hope not." cried violet and her sisters together dismayed at so dark a picture indeed.""Why oh why did he be sovcolish as to bother about the situation general vivinn our father was talking about."""""!!

"Trust the ol general to ta take care of himself."said the other soldier in a very gruff voice. nevertheless he and the others quickened their steps." he sooner we reached some c christian encampments if you please to me t o mention the sooner we can find out where he is."

The country through which they were passing, was beautiful but on account of the near approach of an i enemy glandelinian army was quite deserted.About five thirty o-clock they came to a clear strem stream and after violet and her sisters and the two soldiers and washed their hands and faces and even at different points took a good b bath if you dont like it they all felt refreshe refreshed. Later tward the breaking of night they came to a fine big peach and pear orchard and as no one seemed or was even about they all helped themselves very generously. The more violet and her sisters saw of the old soldier and their new soldier companion the fonder of them they grew. They were indeed so kind hearted and jolly and so polite and so fond of the little girls themselves. If you don't believe it ask them yourself.....

"he two soldier friends we have with us will be very good company for us girls back in the christ ian lijes lines." "himpered Joice to her sisters asth oneof the two soldiers the old man went off to kindly get violet and her sisters a cool refreshing drink of water, water, water, water, water, water from a little spring ding ding." but is if he forgets his peculiar talking ''

"I think we old it sounds very lovely." Said Angeline "nd they are surely renem remembering our own ways all the time. put I wonder why there are no Calverinians living in this neighborhood. I do hope we meet some body before the night comes on." put no person did they meet violet and her sisters saw many villages but all were devoid of pere persons of anykind. As it grew darker darj darker the old soldier complained of some little pain in his right leg. He had been slightly wounded in the leg during the fright from the woods and though it had pained him considerably he had never ma made any complaint whatever.

"" sed resting do you." Asked the yound younger soldier peering anxiously athim through the gloom.

"Joints in my right leg feel weak and sore." Puffed the soldier easing one foot and then the other." h had I a good horse and you e people also." He expressively waved a piece of bread at which he had been nibbling.

"Better walk slowly behind us." Adi Advised Angeline sleepily, but the old soldier bravely shook his headdd for he knew that violet and her sisters and his companion were all tired too.

"'''''''''I'll managed most famicusly. This very night we al, may find a flock of steeds. Never can tell."

"How asked the other soldier with a yawn.

"If we sleep beneath any e trees we may have a nightmare." Chu chuckled the old soldier triumpantly.

v "you are a good joker ain't you." oared the young soldier friend while violet and her sisters l elapped their l ittle hands. but they were not to need a case of sleeping beneath any trees after all for a sudden turn in the big wide road brought them right within view of an immense encampment. hey know from the color of the tents it must be an extensive landelini n encampments because all the tents had the landelinian co,or and form.

"A glandelinian camp." Said violet." hat a funny thing it is that we come upon one again so soon."

"Maybe as long as they m may have no ch nc chance to recognize us they will be able to fix us up sure." umbled the old soldier winking at his coma companion.

"Perhaps we shall hear some news of the valiant gnora general ick chopper "Cried the yound young soldier and all limping f.rward they heard a strange thudding noise far off and suddenly was confronted by a stern looking sentry. A bell rang loud back in the encampment and the sentry demande d who they were. not being able to answer the sentry looked at them suspiciously and then believing they were recognized by him the two soldiers suddenly flung the selves violently upon him and the attack was so sudden that the t ree fell on their faces but the rebel guard was quickly overpowered bound and ganged andplaced somewhere where he would not be seen by his comrades.

"Out upon them." oustered the old man getting up stiffly and running to help violet and her sisters tio the mahman up." hat way is this for glandelinians to welcome strangers like us.?''''' e pulled the little girls who had fallen hastily to her feet then as the guardsmen surely a they all ran forward for two more guards were making an appearance again. It seemed almost as light s as day for camp fires were everywhere within the encampments and strangely enough far in the distance great lights seemed to dart vividly about like huge fireflies and the little girls were almost fascinated as they saw red ones bobbing down and up . when they gasped in real ernest and one of the little girls caught hold of the old soldiers arm.

"Goodness Gracious." ghouted atherine." Two large fatw glandelinian soldiers were running down the company street and right in front of violet nd her sisters the larger caught the smaller and began pulling off his coat violently.

"Leave me alone. Leave me a lone." You disguised christian dog." eroaned the smaller man.

"hat I will not do." Said the bigger man savagely." I want your coat and there wont be any o thes re making on you when I get through with you rob.''''''

Though it may be a spy in disguise the soldiers did not like the idea of a bigger man attacking a smaller one under any conditions and the old soldier cried;;

"Unhand the little man you vil ian." nd he waved his sword at the larger man. he two men looked up in surprise and lara and when they saw the sup oeadly beautiful lo ing little boyscouts, and the two soldiers one young and the other old they vfell into one others arms and burst into the most uproarious laughter indeed .

"Mr dear Jamesmagnolia it is extremely ridi to see. dear fellow comrade, wait w till general pixdit sees this ------he will be convulsed. I'll bet they are spies."

Quite forgetting their furious quarrel the two landelinians,, went rol ick down the company streets together but st op ing every few minutes to lo k back and laugh at the nine strangers.

"Id such things as this veryusual among landelinian encampment if you please!" Asked the old soldier looking looking quite dazed." I never heard of one landelinian fighting together or running around like these did and one call the other a "christian dog" but just the same I.ll confess that I may be a few centuries behind times in my way of thinkging."

"Neither did I." Exclaimed violet while her sisters also looked surprised." ut then almost anything is la liable to happen in the rebel lines. There are hellies among t he landelinian soldiers scales as they s ay."

"I, those with those peculiarly colored lights do not look out so e something will happeb. Look out for those blasted searchlights. "Growled the ol other soldier." Ig If I had a long range gun I'd break them all to bits and just then all in the party dodged a strong beam from a searchlight.

"ow could they look out." "iffed one of the landelinians looking in a surly manner at the strangers.

"hey could put the lights out and not flare them as at least." iggled one of the little girls who may be Catharine.

"hey moveg go int unless someone puts them out." cried another rebel passing and a squad of landelinians began talking indignantly among themselves about the strangers entering their lines without passports. However by this time the nine had become accustomed to the changing lights of the glaring searchlights.

"I wone onder where the most of the landelinians are." Said violet as she and her sisters peered down a wide company street or avenue. "there don't seem to be any army houses or barracks. Oh goodness Gracious look."

Three squadrons of landelinian cavarly came along followed by a s all wagon train with the most appetising viands and provisions drawn by horses that trotted jauntily down the company streets while the landelinian horsemen talked among themselves like old fashioned women men women.

"There must be millions of landelinians here." Cried violet to her sisters.

"here ought to be one supper or dinner for each of all of us." eclared the old soldier his mouty mouth watering." ome on. Kot's raid the vos wain train."

"Within the rebel lines! I should sky not." Forshame however t not knowing us the rebels may invite us. If we follow the mess meal train we will come to the suppers." Said the old soldier mildly.

"Right as usual'))))----the others looked ashamed for they had all intended pouncing on the wafon train without ceremony.

"ush. Let us all go quietly. If they hear us they may be suspicious and surround us." "smered Ji J i Joice.

So the whole party walked softly after the wagon train their curiousity about the landelinians in this vast encampment growing keener at every single step indeed. several platoons of drilling troops, an officer and a company of landelinian boyscouts led by a handsome looking rebel boy rushed past them but as violet and her sisters said later to Gertrude Angeline and their other friends after encountering the two who called each other christian dogs nothing more surprised them. he drilling troops turned the corner at the end of the company street in columns of four and the sight that greeted violet and her sisters and their two companions was very strange indeed. long the s the length of each company street as far as they could see stood long ranks of landelinian soldiers in rows and rows all the front ranks being before large mess halls. Each column of soldiers waiting for their army mess were dressed in the uniform of the fierce Mis-pellestinians, and other scouts of landelinians combined and they stood so still and patient that, violet and her sisters and even their two soldier companions thought the landelinian soldiers must be statues. but no sooner had the wagon train made their appearance then bells began ringing furiously, bugles blared drums drrolled and ,ere landelinians privates and officers combined came running in swarms from every direction. All the mis-pellestinians of the encampments looked alike. they were large round hats sailor fashion like little girls do but of black color with a bleat wavy plume on top, had military bearing, and the uniforms mostly like butlers in a rich mans house of deep blue gray o color. some of the officers had coats that almost had the form of mother hubbard dresses. hey were all fierce looking landelinians but the most striking of all was the Zimmermaniams. their hair was styled in all kinds of ways like little girls, some bobbed, braided or curled, or hanging loose, but most of them looked so fierce and had such scowling faces that violet and her sisters felt they must be cautious.

While the nine friends of ours were observing all of this the landelinians who had answered the supper mess call had been taking their places wherever they chose and started eating like pigs. One officer stepped before another officer and after much bumpin bumping chewing and so on soldiers alike placed themselves properly. At a signal from one of the rebels in the centre of one of the company streets the whole mob of landelinians sat down anywhere they could and started eating. violet and her sisters, and the two soldier friends of theirs had been at first too startled and ing interested to speak but at this moment a whole flock of nine mischievious landelinian boyscouts clustered near the nine strangers spying them curiously and in a hostile manner manner and at the sudden commotion caused by the boys one of the whole street of soldiers stopped eating and stared, with all expressions of faces.

"Oh "cried the landelinian nearest to them pointing with his finger' look at the strangers."

"his way nplace pleasse strangers. This way nplease strangers. nd don't take any more steps toard us th n you can help I please." ommand an important voice from the middle of the group of glandelinians. o down the center the nine were compelled to march feeling as the two soldiers finally put it, one comedy like a circus procession.

"Stop strangers and give countersign and names please immediately."

A rebel officer had rode up and held up his hand commandingly. Thinking of something cleever to say so as not to be suspe suspected as christians the old soldier stepped forward with a bow!

"These are my eight eyescouts under general Manleys command if it ple see your gracious dignity and the dignified soldier friend of ours whose name is Barnles Pinner.

"And Sir Boldon of Clandelinian roared the old soldier as his young soldier friend modestly stepped back without announcing himself

"Sir eight boyscouts and their two companions and comrades" bellowed the officer "you Meet his excellency general Manlet and the noble officer general Cowardly Pixitive."

"Right little boyscouts following two soldiers one old and young. That seems peculiar to me," complained the general who with the exception of his soldier shoulder straps looked like all the rest of them wearing a privates coat. "I,ll leave out all the rest of the argument. What do you want little Clandelinian boyscouts please.

"Our names Manleys had not allowed us to reveal but if your excellency could give us some supper and tell us something about general Nick Chopper and—"

"One thing at a time please little boys." Said general Pixitive reprovingly" What do your two soldier friends want. Have they anything to prove their identificat ion!"

"Only ourselves and it please your gracious excellency." Said the old soldier with a bow.

"It does not ple: please me at all." Said the general taking a sip of strong coffee mixed with brandy. And there you have all brought up another serious question. How do you know wher whither we believe you are friends or enemies! We never saw any of you before and neither has general Manley."

The rebel chief folded his hands apparently in a helpless manner on the table and looked appealingly at a general next to him. "How am I to settle all these questions general Stickem Plasterton! First they come running around like crazy at crazy horses and—(())"

"You might have them held for investigation or something like that." suggested general Stickem looking curiously at the disguised boys girls and the two soldiers. The general leaned back in his chair with a sigh of relief, then ordered a bugler to blow his bugle. There were at least twenty buglers within sight and one of them was selected.

"The rebel officers or generals are talking very perfect nonsense." said Violet angrily. the two soldiers looked ominous but the old one said! "Let me handle this my little dears, I'm used to Clandelinians and their ways. "Out of them when excited talk nonsense enough but if they suspect us, or grow wrathful we will have all the soldiers in the street around us with fixed bayonets. I don't like their faces either.now jus just.""))))

"Bump. the two soldiers and Violet and her sisters saw down very suddenly. Clandelinians had arrived with two benches and to make them sit down had hit them smartly behind the knees with the front edge of the benches. The old soldier had dodged but in time but just the same sat down.

"Now that you strangers are settled nicely in your seats." again the general in a most resigned voice "We might try you again. What is your motto for coming into the encampment!"

His took even the two two soldiers by surprise but before any one of the nine could answer the rebel general snapped out!

"Come into our lines to find information eh. Well you have come very late, and had better loo e early. Now's that be books!!""""

"Very good." Said the old soldier with a wink at Violet and her sisters.

"Next time don't come to our lines at all please.."""Mumb/some mumbledthe general whose name was probably Stickem Stickem plasterton his mouth full of something to eat sleep.

"And what was it you people wanted please!" the general asked in an uneasy tone. "Supper for nine go out and dine."" Said the old soldier promptly and with another low bow.

"Now that is certainly talking this time." The general looked in admiration at the old soldier. "Those little voyscouts had matters all tangled up for me. One question at a time. That is my motto."

Leaning over the rebel officer wis whispered an order to one of his men. By this time most of the Clandelinians all around had lost interest in the strange child and man visitors and went calmly on with their suppers. Soon Violet and her sisters and the two soldiers were led up to nine tables and they enjoyed the first real good meal they had since they left the country of rebel lines under general Pokes. They were gradually becoming used to the strange surrounding among rebel encampments and enemy territory.....

"Can take the chance to ask him about general Nick Chopper." hissed Violet of the old soldier. "Everybody had finished by this time and were washing their own mess dishes and canteens and the soldiers were all withdrawning in the most orderly groups and companies. The general still remaining was leaning sleepily back in his big chair.

"Ahem Ahem." Began the old soldier rising stiffly." Has your excellency seen aught of general Nick Chopper. And could your excellency tell us aught please?—"

The general opened his eyes.

"You are asking too many questions at once." He interrupted crossly." We are only to the second point.How will you strangers spent the night here may I ask."""!!

"We would like to sleep somewhere." Answered the old soldier promptly(If your excellency will n permit it."

"I do"said the general most solemnly." That gets me out of the trouble of entertaining strangers whom I don't know. Early to bed and at ill earlier to rise is my motto. I M Next it is your turn now sir." he added almost irritably as the old soldier did not make an immediate answer.

"Have you seen anything of a general or soldier whom we know called Nick Chopper!" again asked the old soldier and all of them waited anxiously for the generals reply.

"I don't know anything about a general called Nick Chopper. I've seen many a Clandelinian general and know many and sensible shops they are but I do not know anything about Nick Chopper. Does he chop wood."

"Where is the chief" Clandelinian general of the nation!" Asked the old soldier in great agitation.

"You mean general Ne-Hollester Phantom. Why he is here. This is his army." said the general. "Wair I'll ring or have him called for if you wish to see him very badly."

"No use to call him now." Said the old soldier in a disappointed tone of voice.

"We are looking for another man."

"And would you mind telling me why you all eat out in the company street, when other soldiers eat in their mess h lls and tents or barracks!" Asked Angeline who was growing a little restless." You little hitgoodness forget where you are." and you are placing yourself out of turn. At Us Clandelinian soldiers will overlook it this time or this once for all nothing." said general Pixitive.Have you ever noticed little boy that there are only tents and no barns barracks in this encampment!"

"Why yes indeed it is true" Admitted Violet.

"""Well there you are to be sure."""He general folded his hands and regarded her most comps complacently. "Here we being on the march constantly manage things better without barracks. General Manleys armies are moving on to ard some location to oppose general Hanson and his northern armies which are advancing to seize the country and take possession near Marie Stuart on the Conderaine river or crook so he had established a base and move armies again to help in the seige of Vivian Daley that is still going on. We are just now only at a stand still until to morrow for as it seemsnow great battle is going to rage we do not want to we wear our selves or the army out too soon. How does this strike you!"""""

"It seem to be a very sensible remark indeed." Acknowledged Jemmie." But don't your troops ever grow tired of such feerced marching and counter marching."

"I have heard of growing hairs and flowers and corn and other are s but never growing tired. But say you boys have the voices of girls ha how is that!" That is it!" asked general Stickem plasterton leaning toward violet and her sisters. "I think the boys have talked enough to me to night." Said the rebel general closing his eyes. The old soldier had been staring anxiously at the general for a long time. Now he came close to the rebel generals side and standing on his tiptoes whispered very hoarsely to prevent any suspecision which he felt might come!

"Have you any christian dogs here!"

"And you any linking dogs!" Asked the general opening the eyes with a terribly big yawn."

"CHRISTIAN DOGS!!" hissed the old soldier.

"Never heard of em among my lines yet." Said the general. The old soldier chuckled behind his whiskers and the other soldier in gr at se f confusion stepped back.

"What is up now please!" demanded the general suddenly as a strange commotion was heard. He then was aroused by a blare of brass probably a world of bugles, drums rolled, shots were fired, a common beamed signals and a whole company of soldiers were running down the company streets. the big soldiers pushed the smaller ones and a large overgrown lummox ran so fast that he tripped over the foot of another soldier and fell on his face, which was bruised all the way.

"You fools have plenty of time why don't you take it and not act like crazy loons!" called their officers n angrily, while two men helped the fallen soldier to his feet.

"They are all hughouse." Giggled Violet nudging Angeline her sister the stood nearest her. One of the rebels stood still on the instant.

"Why should they not" come when called for in a hurry!" Asked general Stickem most haughtily." One run faster than others when they hear the call. We have secured a rebel spy within our lines and they want to see him as he faces the firing squad."""

"Pass the line please and hurry!" Said the general looking hard at violet and her sisters and the two soldiers.

"The lazy lump he always divests purposes and seems too lazy to get up from his chair." Growled the old soldier.....

But Violet and her sisters not wishing to arouse suspecuon or the rebel generals' anger when on an important quest obeyed the command and so did the two soldiers.

"I thought the spy would come in time to be captured." Yawned the general pointing at a man between two columns of soldiers. At this every body began firing muskets in the air, and rolling drums and blaring bugleand firing and clattering signals and yelling t ill 'io lot and her sisters unable to hardly stand it were obliged to cover their ears. In an instant the whole street was filled with wildly mobbed soldiers but soon all excitement died away and as most of the soldiers were soon retiring promptly before Taps sounded ,iolet and her sisters and the two soldiers and rebels showed were shewed their own beds in tents.

"Here comes your guards." Said the general shorlyty.' Tell them to watch out for any one snapping around the corners of the company streets.

"I don't think we will be in any danger from the Nationals thank you." Said Angelina confidentally but the rebel general and his officers had gone off to their own headquarters to assume some important duties before retin retiring.

"We might as well go to bed now I suppose." Said the little girls. "We are tired" Their beds were in single tents and they saw they each had to sleep nine in one tent which seemed crowded and without undressing at that as a sign was set up sinside the tent which read;

THERE IS NO TELLING WHEN ARMY WILL REMOVE AT NIGHT.
DO NOT REMOVE C CLOTHING OR UNIFORMS WHEN RETIRING."

The beds were tall four p osted affairs but mostly without any kinds of hangings. Violet and her sisters choosed the smaller ones, and then after the two soldiers helped the little goils to get into the ,ra he went off to take a smoke and as he smoked he saw two drunken ,landolinians in an argument over a bottle of whiskey. When he yelled at them commandingly they left off and went into their own tents. Later just before taps sounded the two soldiers looped int o their own beds and soon there was a guard at each tent evidently following the generals instructions one saying;

"It is the custom to place guards over boyscouts to see that no harms comes to them.Violet"

Violet and her sisters felt uncomfortable in t he beds with their clothing on and when no one was looking they at least slipped off their shoes and then nax nestled more comfortably down among the very hard covers.

"just like sleeping in a long train." ,iolet thought in a drowsy way.

"What A lot I or my sisters shall have to tell the christian generals and others when we get back to the christian lines. And we had some information. General Vivian is not far I m sure for this is the region of Cedarmine right here."

"Good night boys." Said the guard politely.

"Good night " said ,iolet and her sisters too nearly asleep to even think it strange for guards to p be placed over ,landolinian boyscouts. "Good night and sleep tight"

"It certainl u certainly must either be a shipwreck or an earth earthquake or something like it." Thought Violet while she and even her sisters sat up in alarm. hey seemed to be tossed about wildly by some one.

"Rise for you little boyscouts to get up." Grumbled a harsh voice that seemed to come from one of the guards in the tents. Violet rubbed her eyes. One of the guards was adressing her and another guard was shakining her sister Rose as if he was going to dance a jig.

"Oh o stop stop Lemez." Cried Rose holding onto the post of her bed to prevent him from bouncing her out. "Can't you see I'm comin. "

"Well its somebodys elses turn now I'm going off guard duty now and you and your comp nions will surely have to hurry; I'm su due at the army convention at nine."

"Army convention!" gasped Violet while her sisters started stared in amazement.

"What is so queer about that boy." Demanded the guard so, coldly. "We all have to keep well posted with the generals don't we. ? I thought you knew that . I for one belong to a highly dignified set I do. Hurry up and getbout of the bed little boy or I'll throw you and the others out."""

"I'm glad no one among the christian lines does not talk to me or my sisters in thisnext impertinent fas i fashion." Thought Violet slipping on her shoes, and combing her hair with a side comb and putting on her cap. "Imagine being ordered about a guard who is supposed to be under you. If it was not for the danger of arousing suspicions as to who we are I'd tell him something mighty quick." Inwonder if the two soldiers are up."

Finishing the work of her hair and placing her comp combs jumped down her sisters soon followed and the three guards without even saying good boy took themselves off shouldering their long rifles.

The old soldier was sitting on a large stile polishing his shoes shoes with a pillowslip he had taken from his bed and the other soldier was lying beside him lizzily thumping the ground with his first, and making slight fun at the departing guards.

"Have you two have had breakfast yet!!!!!!!!!!!!!!" Asked Jennie as she and her sisters joined their two friends.

"We were patiently waiting the presence of the ladyship of you little girls " Chuckled the old soldier. "would you mind ordering two breakfast s for us too!"

The old soldier threw away the new dirty pillow slip(maybe it did slip) and talking and laughing cheerfully they walked toard one of the biggest tents at the edge of a large and long company street(It certainly was company), as they entered they saw inside large tables still unset and that the whole camp no doubt was busily eating.

"Good morning comrade" Said one of the little girls voice by means to an officer "We would like to a have breakfast for nine people and that is.ourselves."

"Don't need to ask for it." Exclaimed the officer with a mathfull. "Go take your canteens and get it."

"But we have no canteens.They did not give us any." Said Angelina.

"Indigested what kind of boyscouts are you." Thundered the officer in a rage. "Lost your canteens. Well I'll see that you get something to eat but if this happens again to the guardhouse you go."

The officer fired his revolver fourteen times without looking from his oatmeal. Seeing that he was a mearly rebel captian and that he did not wish to be disturbed the three waited patiently and quietly for the men commenced to prepare the breakfast for them.

"In some ways at that" said Catherine munching a hot roll in a contented manner "I s some way it this is a very comfortable place even if it is a mean opponent of a vast landolinian army."

"In some cases it is." grumbled the old soldier his mouth full of cake and baked apple and coffee combined. As for the rest they finished their breakfast in no time if there is such a time.And now" Said the young soldier as they left the food tent and the soldiers were walking off "Let us continue our quest.could you tell us the way to the city or town of Marie ,tonk my good Captian."!!!"

"If you wish to go away for a while to scout on t he christians go away and do it. and if you dare the chance stay away." That is agreeable." answered the officer shortly." I cant have so many boys running around here with two soldiers like common chickens." he added in a grieved voice. All the other Slandolinians near by nodded vigoriously.....

"Let them remain here or take their departure as they do not belong to this camp anyway." Said general Stinkem Plasterton coming up at the moment.

The captian felt in his pocket and brought out three pieces of paper plots. "Go to the christian lines. house a place and see what you can find out about their movements to oppose general Manley. As soon as you find out return to us or go to Manleys lines and you will be saved all this unnecessary motion in getting lost in the wrong encampment."

"But we don't want to go near the christian lines and spy." Objected Jennie pretending to be afraid.

"No by the name of Jupiter." spluttered the old soldier pretending to glare around nervicously. Then seeing the general and the captian looked displeased and angry they all b made low bows. "If your excellency could graciously direct us out of the encampments and to Manleys lines"—

"Take yonder road and go where it may lead to." snapped the officer. "and don't come here no more unless you are sent for or called for."

Having no more was to be got out of him they started down the long company street surprised indeed it going through a company street of the enemy so easily without any excitement or pursuit like usual. It seemed very unusual to them but they took good advantage of it nevertheless.

"I wonder that the landoli- mans do on the march when the rain pours!" said Violet looking curiously at the many marching columns of landolinians. "march in the rain and get wet silly." snapped a rebel officer staring at her rudely. "If you scouts would spend your time thinking instead of asking so many fool questions you would know more. "

"Go to and swallow a canon!" snarled the old soldier waving his sabre at the rebel and Violet and her sisters fearing an encounter, begged him piteously to come on which he finally did though with many backward glances at the rebel. The whole encampment seemed to consist of many company streets, and Violet and her sisters believed if they would have counted the tents by hundreds it would take half a day to count only one third the full number. It took a full day before they came to the very end. hey had traveled a little be beyond the encampment then they all stopped.

"But the"— gasped the old soldier.

"Great guns and little fishes." snored the other soldier. As for Violet and her sisters they did nothing else but stare. hey had gone through a little green wood after out leaving the camp and the wood ended surely enough and beyond was there was nothing at all but a broad expanse of water that stretched so far that the la land looked like a blue haze far across.

"Well" said the old soldier backing a few paces. "This is a pretty fix. It is the great Kenzigle yuss river. I know from the current in its waters."

"And you like the river and its color" Said a whose wheezy voice. The nine travelers turned in sudden surprise. A hi heavy rebel officer was regarding them with great interest and looked kinder than a rebel had ever been to look before. Beside near a large boat and above the boat stood a sig was fastened a sign on a tree;

" RIVER FERRY BOAT.

"Do not pay attention that ferry boats are in use on rivers everywhere everywhere." With getting the an omitted watertons to the old soldier.

''Can you direct us to the city of Stamuk which probably lies a re aqueo this sea of water my good man ?'' shed the old soldier with a plaite hau. The rebel jerked his thumb back at the sign. ''Can't you read signs?' He asked. ''What kind of a ferry boat do you own.'' He asked hae hoarsely.

''A ferry boat that will take us across this wide river and to the town of Mary St*muk please.''Said Catherine.

''I cannot guarantrr guarantee anything of an att empt like that.''peclared the soldier shaking his head.''Our ferries only go where they please in most cases, and you could not get a ferry to go to the other side of the river where the christians might capture them. If you want to get across I'll give you a couple of boats and you can go where they will take you or you can row to.''Do you want to go entirely across or down the river aways.''!?'

''Across the river straight ahead.''shivered the young soldier looking with a shudder over the wide expanse of rushing water.

''What k nd of boats will you have. ? N ho up your minds please.I'm in a hurry!''

''What kind of boats or ferries have you!''Asked violet almost timidly.''It was her first experience at leaning boats and she and even her sisters also felt a little perplexed.

''Gunboats, l u launches, , tugs, sailboat and a schooner.''snapped the soldier.

''We sh would not want or need a schooner.''Said The little girls positively.

''Have you any with six oars at the least three on both sides of one boat.!''

''A boat for how many?''Asked the rebel taking a pair of shears almost half as large as himself from a shelf near a tree.

''For us all.''said the old soldier as the little girls looked confused.''That ought to allow us to be able to go somewhere.''

The Angelinian fired a shot into the air. The next minute a big trap door in the ground opened, a ladder appeared and a n ll number of men climped up. The rebel officer said something in an undertone and soon the men went off and presently came back towing a big rowboat up the side of the river.

''Get on everybody.''commanded the soldiers in such a sharp tone that the nine almost jumped to obey. Holding fast to the sides of the boat the little girls stepped inside and the soldiers looking very anxious followed took their seat and took possession of the o a ours while the little girls who had a chance to oars did the same. No sooner had they started forward than by the force of all rowing at once the boat h gave a terrific leap forward that stretched three of the little girls flat on thi their backs, but nevertheless they went onward at a terrifying speed.

As the boat sped down the river a little ways first they passed long wo lines of tall trees standing fully erect and there seemed to be a sound as of derisive laughter at the nine travelers six of which were almost huddled together in the middle of the boat.

''And we took a boat and did not dare attempt to swim.''stuttered violet to the soldiers whose oars through the water were rattling like a fond. As for the boat it seemed to go a e along about ten miles a minute(It did not do it but it seemed to) and before they had time to grow accustomed to this singular mode of travel the boat gave a final jump that sent them all sprawling into the air, then o p captsized and all went splashing into the broad stream of water. The boat had struck a rock unseen in the water.

At first it seemed impossible for any one to swim in the water.

''Help help!''screamed violet as her head rose above water and she and her sisters and the others began striking out feebly. But the excitement of the boats collision with the rock had taken all her breath.

''What do you new swimmers want!''

A thin column of men were watching them anxiously from the bank of the river one of them maki ng careful notes in a book that he held in one hand.

''Help save us we can't swim in this strong current.''hooted Matilda feeling herself going down in the water again.

''Wait I'll throw a line.''Called the man making a trumpet out of his hands.

We ''We are on a small island entirely surrounded by water. The litt le girls heard him mutter.''Sorry he called back shaking his head slowly.''But we have one rope. We can only throw o once at a time. You others will have to fight for shore and keep yourselves afloat at least untill you are rescued.''

''Stand aside Mexon'' ried another of the men to his comrade at he plunged a second rope into the stream and orfe orders s ordered all to grab hold if possible and be pulled in at one time.

''It's no use .''Thought the little girls closing their eyes for the rope had been thrown far below the spot where they had been pitched into the water and those on the shore of the island seemed to be making no progress whatever. The waters rushed over their heads a second time then they felt themselves being gradually dragged upward by something like a net. When they opened their eyes a bunch of christian soldiers were standing over them.

''Are you boys all right.''One of the soldiers asked anxiously.''I threw the net as soon as I could. You fell in way up stream. Seen the two soldiers with you!''

''Oh they'll drown.''Cried violet as she and her sisters forgot their own narrow escape.''They y can't swim in that heavy current of wa ter either.''

''Never fear we'll get them''Puffed another of the men and without waiting to catch their breath the man plunged the net back into the stream again. One of the other Angelinians now approached timidly.

''I would like to get a statement from you about the reason you boys are here in the uniform of Clamelinian boyscouts if you don't mind. It might help t o prevent you from being suspected as Clamelinian boyscout spies.''

''You might have helped us in the press present by not addressing such questions to us.''Said violet trying to wring out the water from her clothes.''You ought to be ashamed of your selves to adr address us the daughters of general Vivian like that.We are no Clamelinian boyscouts.''

''I'll make a note of that sure.''Said the man sergeant ly''but how do you know whor But how do I know whether you are the Vivian Girls or boyscouts imposing as them!''He waited his pencil poised over the little book.

''o sunny please.''Cried violet in disgust trying to remove her disguise and half succeeding.

''But My dear young little lady—''

''I'm not your dear young lady. Oh dear why don't the other men come back.!''

''Go many Women and little the little girls alone.''Another man dripped dripping wet came up hurriedly.

''I was only tryingto get a litt le information of why they appear in the uniform of boyscouts.''Grumbled the Angelinian soldier in a surly manner.

''I'm sorry we g ould not get to you faster but we only had one rope among us when we saw the sad accident.'' said the wet soldier, approaching the l t little girls apologetically.

''We certainly thank you for trying.''said violet''Are they your men. and could you tell me where you and your comrades are. You are all dressed in purple so I suppose we must be in Angelinian territory.''

''Wrong in both cases.''peclared the fellow. My name is James Ra Ram and the lieutenants name is Newton. He ''He jerked his thumb at the retiring officer. H''e mistook you for boyscout rebels!''

''I think I do indeed''Said violet half closing her eyes''Is that why he is always taking notes of someone.''

''Not exactly.''But you we wear rebel boyscout uniforms and he suspected you were rebel boyscouts in an accident.''

''It m certainly must be confusing.''Said Angelina herself Then she and her sisters caught sight of the others dragging the two soldiers and they jumped up excitedly. They dropped the unconscious soldiers and started working on them to bring them to. Jean violet and her sisters helped the soldiers soon revived.

''urely good of you.''..he k heeked the poor soldier trying to straightentmp.

''Save your breath old man.''Said one of the Angelinians regarding him most affectionately.

''Oh why didn't we watch where we were rowing''sighed Catherine.''But anyway we are on an island safe from the rebels at least for a while.''

The old soldier and the young one though still sputtering were begg ing to revive.

''You noble lit soldiers shall be rewarded for this. You have saved our lives.''.

Rising unsteadily t hey both tottered over to the Angelinian soldiers of whom there was ten and shook hands wit h them warmly.

''We will all have to wait untill we get rested.''Said violet''and untill us girls get our clothing dry.''

They began running up and down then suddenly stopped before the old soldier.

''And there is something else for general Hanson Vivian to hear about.''She Jennie suddenly exclaimed.

''Oh that rescue stunt.'' mumbled one of the Angelinians looking terribly embrassed.''..he ever heard of rescueing people from a river as a brave stunt someone.''d rather have the honor of going through the wildest battle alive.''

''o in it is not nonsense nonsense.''Said violet sternly.''You are our heroes from now on. Won't general Vivian and even general Jack Chopper be pleased!''

''If we ever find him.'' ighed the old soldier.

''We will ''said the little girls gaily.''W just feel it.''

Per five days and nights they had now wandered through a most deserted part of the Calverinian country near Cedernine, sus subsisting largely on berries, and other food sleeping under trees wo whether it rained or shined, and looking in vain for any signs of the armies under either one of the great Vivian Generals.On the fifth day they had while looking for provisions of some kind encountered an ancient looking Calverinian farmer, who was however too old, and deaf, and had no information w a whatever to give them as he had never seen any signs of t the general who was called Jack Chopper..he old man did however invite them all into his farm house and gave them a good meal, and afterward when they were leaving gave them provisions, good sandwitches, ammunition he could spare and directed them where he believed one of the christian armies were situated.

''ut of for some good old christian army and its many friends.''sighed the old soldier, late on the fifth afternoon as they had finished the last of the sandwitches.

''o you know my two friends.''said violet lok looking through the straggly fiels fields and woods ahead''I believe we all have been going in the wrong direction again. Per there is no sign of either another Clamelinian army or even a christian christian army anywhere.''

''Again you say.''checked the old soldier''you mean we have still been going in the wrong direction.''I've been in good many parts of Calverinianbut this is the worse yet to be lost here with in enemy territory.''

"Not even one little christian encampment in view, not one friendly city." The old soldier shook his head very mournfully. Then seeing that Violet and her sisters looked discouraged and very tired he pretended to strum on a fiddle or guitar and sang in his high tone of voice!!!!

"Two soldiers with children fair to bedite;
And indeed a seven children so fair;
One old soldier bold with sow sword and gilt of gold;
And might, bravey bravery and gallitently to spare,
With help from Heaven also to spare!.

The daughtless nine a warlike company,
Of wit and dauntless bravery sure are;
Who seek the valiant christian soldier man,
Who seek general pick chapper mear and far;
Who seek general pick chapper mear and far."""

"Oh dear old friend I we like that indeed it sounds good." cried the little girls one of the jumping up and giving the old soldiers hand a little loving squeeze. "Only you should have added another two verse ."

The other soldier shook his head. "Let's all do a little reconnoitering violet" He said almost carelessly He felt and so did the rest that th he must give up to the inevitable and sang somehow. "Perhaps we will find a christian army unexpectedly. It has had happened."

"I don't believe in anything like that any more now." Laughed Jennie. "But Ill coming too."

The old soldiers song had cheered them all and it was not the first time the old soldier of his younger friend had helped to make the best of a tiresome journey though not yet really to thrilling or exciting as no Clandelinians had molested them as yet as they had not been discovered. But unfortunately now violet and her sisters had discarded their Abyssinnian uniforms and appeared like their real selves. So now they had to be very careful."

"The air seems to grow very hot for so lat early in July" Observed the old soldier after they all had walked along silently for a long time. "Have any of you noticed it."

"Yes it is hot and I have swallowed some of it." coughed the younger soldier looking suspiciously through the trees fearing the approach of a war forest fire.

"I'll step forward a little ways and go and see what it is "Said the old soldier. "It may we a forest fire is advancing upon us and we were going right into it."

As he disappeared, the truth dawned on violet and her sisters at once.

"Oh please wait. Oh please ple please wait. Don't go onward . Please, please please soldier friend come back--come back at once." cried Jennie and she and her sisters came running after him as fast as they could.

"What's the matter now." mumbled the younger soldier, thudding after violet and her sisters. Then both coming suddenly out of the woods saw a sight which made all of the little girls as brave as they were scream and the shrieks w startled the old soldier so badly that he ran back to them in a hurry. Just in time too for another step would have taken him on to a Deadly mine which was placed in the ground, and which if it had exploded could have destroyed a whole regiment of human beings and wounded a brigade. Violet and her sisters having sharp eyesight had seen it when the two soldiers did not.

"What happened little girls." Put'ed the old soldier. Naturally he knew nothing of the deadly-concealed mine.

"Nothing happened." hissed the younger soldier in an agitated voice.

"Why did you little girls scream for then!" Asked the old soldier walking toward them nervously.

"Sit down on a rock." Commanded the young soldier mopping his brow with a handkerchief. "One step on that deadly mine and it would have been one good night with you and all of us combined."

"I should say it would have been." Stuttered violet while her sisters had faces white as a sheet and she then explained that they alone had seen the place where by the depression of t he ground a hidd en mine had been placed and it gave an explanation how they could tell one. And then she said; "Do you know what that means!"

Violet and her sisters were nearer to tears than even I or probably the reader would like to think about. "It mean s we have come not only in a completely wrong direction and are further away from the christian armies under our father and uncle than ever when we first started but are also on the old time battle field of Abbissans. It is one of the last mines set during the battle. It exploded even a little pressure is on it from above. We all had a narrow escape that time".

To prove she was not wrong Violet picked up a rock which was heavy and handing it to the young soldier said;

"Throw it right where the old soldier was going to thread and see if we are not right . But let's all get to a safe distance first. This was done and then when far enough the soldier threw the stone with all his might.

There we was a flash, a roar as if a volcano suddenly opened up before them and an immense cocu column of smoke and wreckage of earth and other debris rose high and in the air and all the trees in the neighborhood actually took a fit, and all in the part y were thrown down violently by the concussion.

"And seek the christian general near and far, near and fa-fah-har." mumbled the old soldier with a troubled dazed light in his kindly blue eyes. He had been knocked almost senseless by the concussion and Violet and her sisters felt stunned also.

"Fa Fah--har-har.I should say it was." as Violets bitter reply."

"But no one else need to sing it."

"No I suppose not." said Jennie getting up. "I suppose not. But what hit me."

All of the others had lasped into a most discouraged silence and all sat and stared dazidly and fdreadi do drearily at the stretch of wreckage before them and then thought gloomily of the rough country beyond, and also of the force of the mine explosion and the old soldiers narrow escape from it.

"It must have been an earthquake and a volcanic eruption at the same time." guessed a strange hoarse voice.

"I doubt that very much" I can and do doubt it very much"

The shrill voices so startled the nine still half dazed traveler s that they swung about in amazement and astonishment.

"Great Long Daddy Long Legs." burst out the young soldier jumping up. "And on the whole for them all this exclamation was suitable entirely for enabling toard them was a column of soldiers in scarlet uniforms on fiery steeds galloping swiftly toard the scene of the explosion. They halted at seeing the two soldiers and Violet and her sisters.

"At last. A flock of steeds." Cried the old soldier bounding to his feet also while the little girls looked surprised.

"I fdoubt that indeed." The leader of the soldiers in scarlet uniforms stopped and looked at the two men coldly.

"What are you two Clandelinians doing with the vivian girls." Demanded the other leader sternly. However Violet and her sisters explained all and all suspicion was immediately gone.

"Well then said the soldier amiably. "My horse is more comfortable.But I doubt if you will care to ride back with us. We are Abbissanians and belong to general Vivians command I only.

"I doubt that too." Said Violet.

"How many doubtful little children always had to weep,
As over the battleswept lands they found their friends in sleep,
Christian soldiers in battle with the rebel,
Has made all children very doubtful
Now when they hear the ring of the Christmas bells."

"How did you know that please!" Asked Violet opening her beautiful eyes wide.

"It has just now occured to me little girl." Admitted the Abbissanian officer clearing his throat verymodestly for he had been the one to recite the verse.

"I cannot help but doubt that. Some body must have told you about us." Said Violet very bitterly "Pon my honor little girl I,m not kidding you." Said the Abbissanian officer in a very modest tone if you please to mention.....

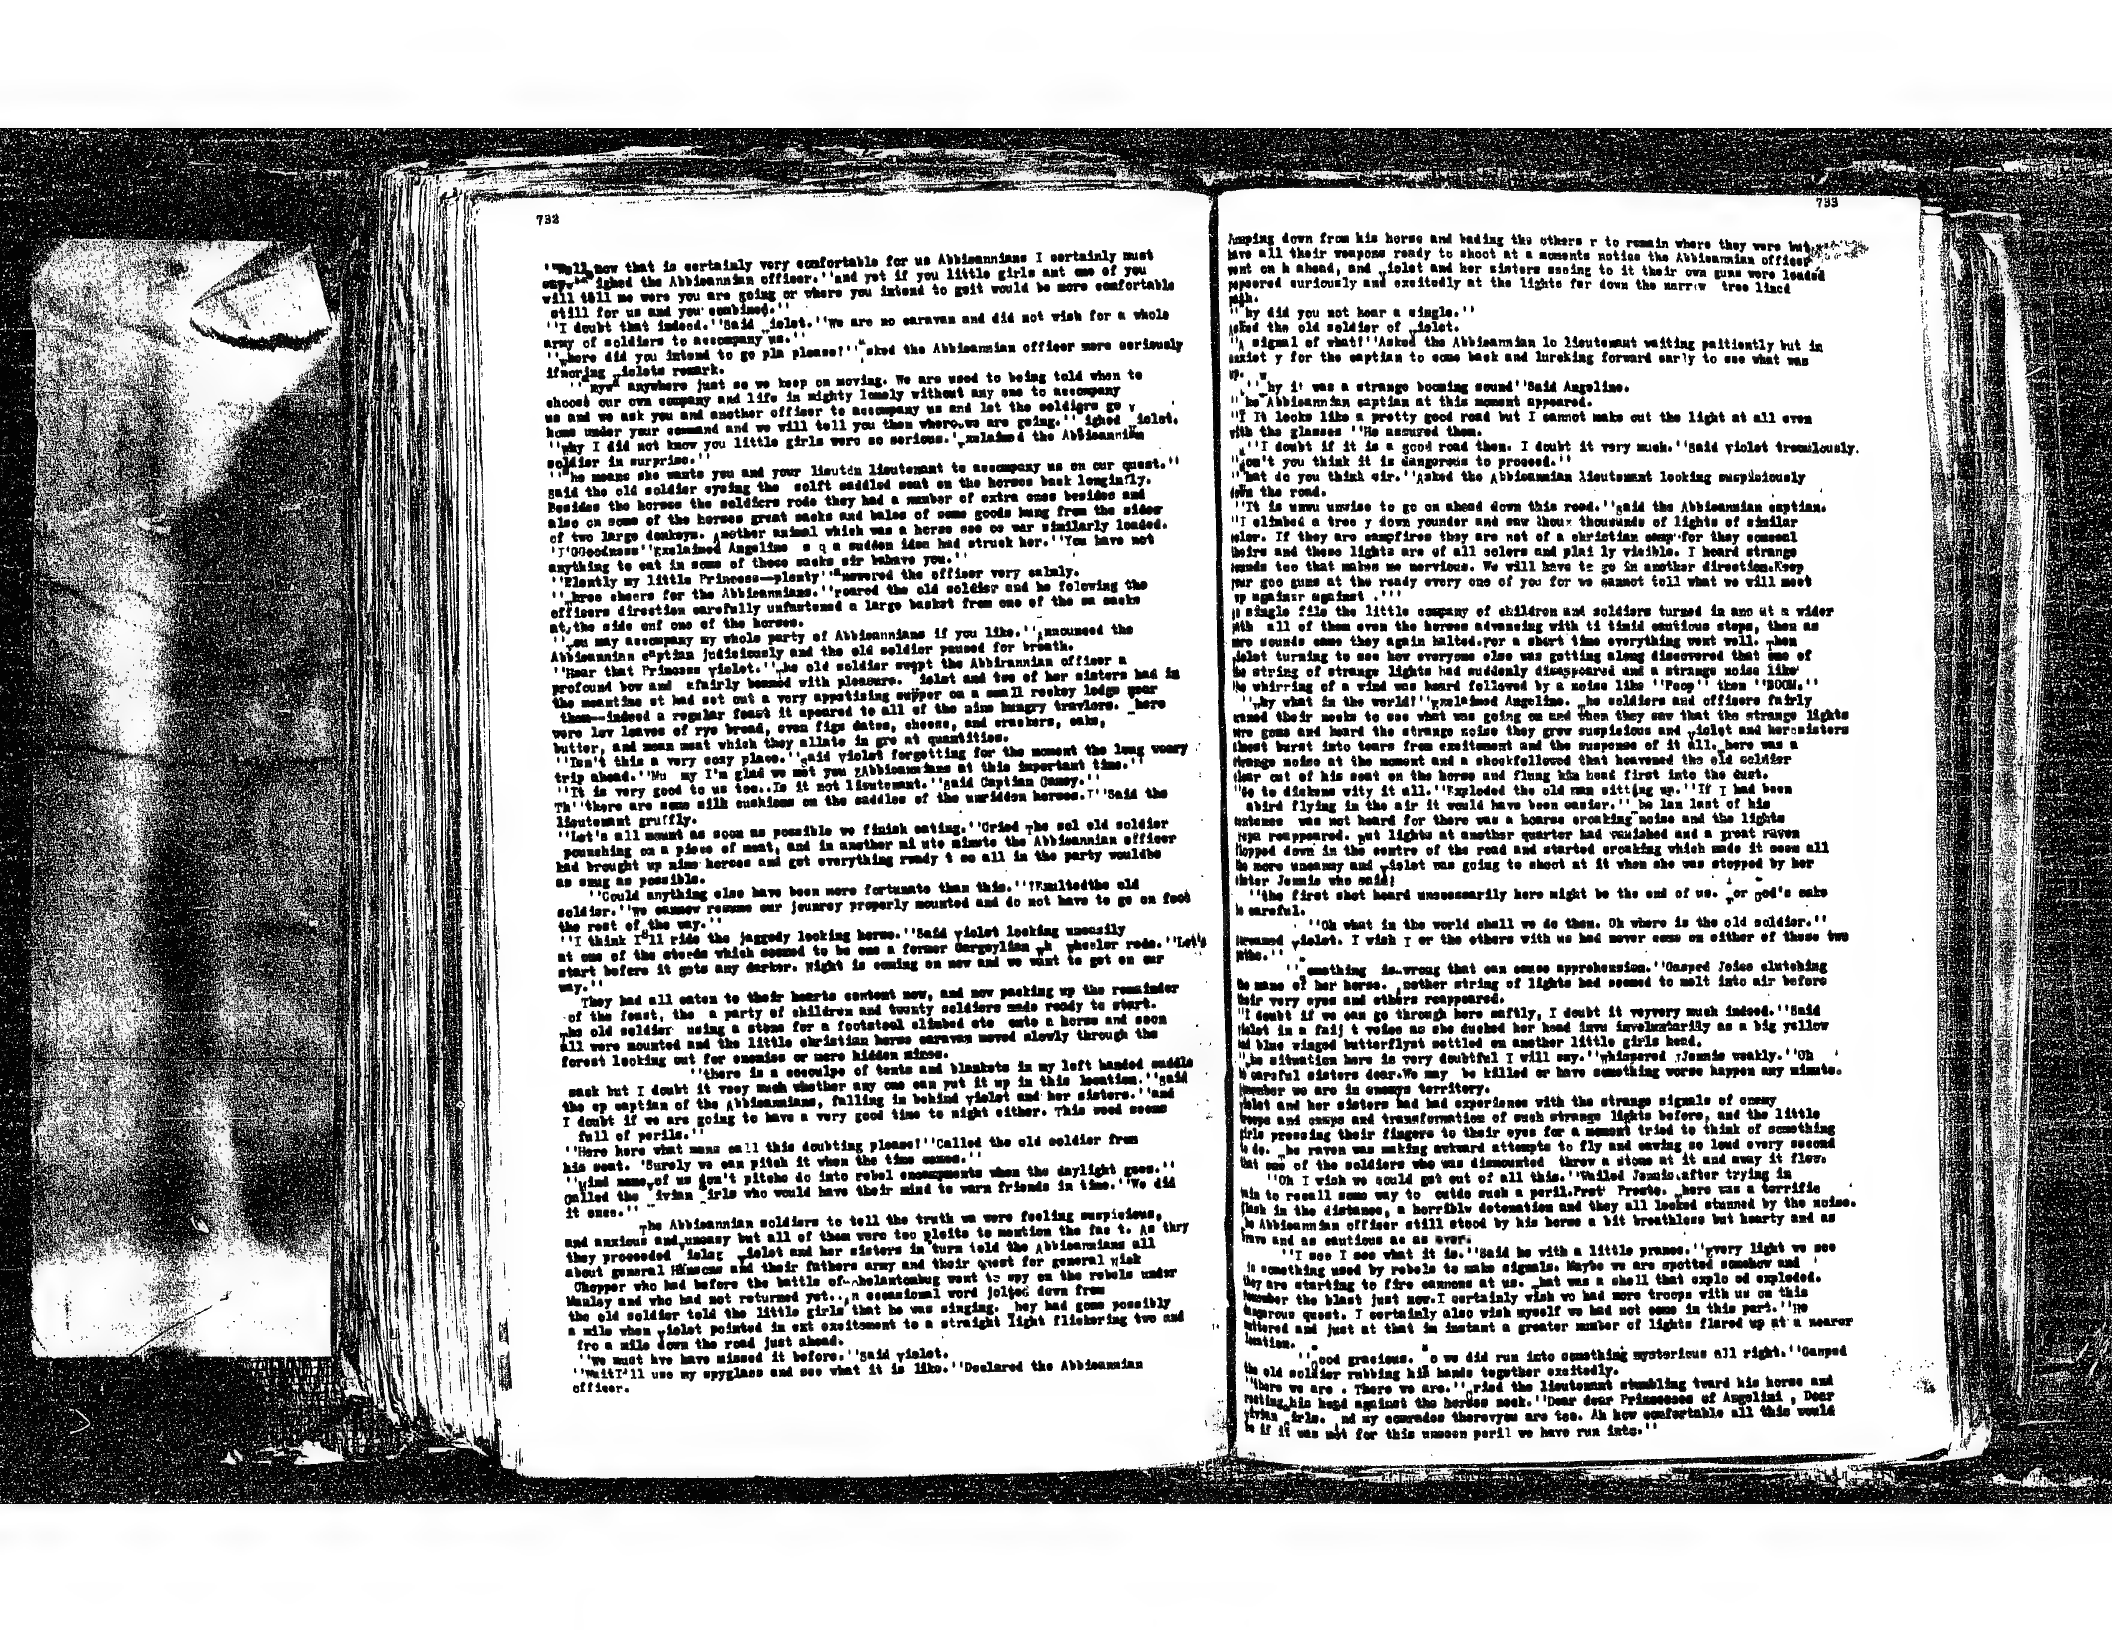
"I doubt it and I doubt it exceedingly." Persisted the little Vivian Pair girl or Angelinian Princess wagging her pretty little head very sorrowfully.

"At this moment violet dear you seem to doubt everything that seems to happen."

Jennie laughed in spite of herself and Violet regarded her joking sister almost reproachfully.

"She does." said Angeline. "Sometimes she tries to pretend she is very doubtful company. Now we all like to be very comfortable and happy as possible and yet no one can be if we always have our own troubles and yet always doubt things, even people kindness. Ain't it so my dear sisters!"""""



"Where did you Abbissanian soldiers come from!" Asked Catherine Vivian. "Strangers here or from a strange christian army!"""

"Well yes it is so." Admitted the Abbissanian soldier nibbling a - i pieces of hard biscuit. "There was a terrific battle not far from here just a few days ago and during the battle we had been sent out several times to go out scouting and after traveling and traveling we found ourselves in this little wood to day and were attracted by the explosion of the mine and thought a a disaster had happened. The best part of it is that you little girls were found here alone with two soldiers. Never knew of little girls like you before to take the chances to wander so far from any of the christian armies. What are you doing violet with your sisters!"

"You are certainly surprised indeed but we are here looking for a friend of ours." said violet with a smile. "All friends of ours are worthy our search."

"And the odd part of it is that you little girls talk in our own language. You little girls must be Abbissanians."

"You are not talking Abbissanian to us you are talking Angelinian." Laughed Jennie. "All Abbissanians ought to be able to talk our own tongue."""""

"Well now that is certainly very comfortable for us Abbisannians I certainly must say." sighed the Abbisannian officer. "and yet if you little girls ant one of you will tell me were you are going or where you intend to quit would be more comfortable still for us and your combined."

"I doubt that indeed." Said Violet. "We are no caravan and did not wish for a whole army of soldiers to accompany us."

"Where did you intend to go pla please?" asked the Abbisannian officer more seriously ifnoring Violets remark.

"Nyre Anywhere just so we keep on moving. We are used to being told when to choose our own company and life in mighty lonely without any one to accompany us and we ask you and another officer to accompany us and let the soldiers go v home under your command and we will tell you then where we are going." sighed Violet.

"Why I did not know you little girls were so serious." exclaimed the Abbisannian soldier in surprise."

"He means she wants you and your lieuten lieutenant to accompany us on our quest." said the old soldier eyeing the soft saddled seat on the horses back longingly. Besides the horses the soldiers rode they had a number of extra ones besides and also on some of the horses great packs and bales of some goods hung from the sides of two large donkeys. Another animal which was a horse see co war similarly loaded.

"Goodness" exclaimed Angeline s q a sudden idea had struck her. "You have not anything to eat in some of those packs sir behave you."

"Plently my little Princess—plenty" answered the officer very calmly.

"Three cheers for the Abbisannians." roared the old soldier and he following the officers direction carefully unfastened a large basket from one of the se packs at the side onf one of the horses.

"We may accompany my whole party of Abbisannians if you like." announced the Abbisannian captian judiciously and the old soldier paused for breath.

"Hear that Princess violet." he old soldier swept the Abbisannian officer a profound bow and gravely beamed with pleasure. Violet and two of her sisters had in the meantime st had set out a very appetising supper on a small rocky ledge near them—indeed a regular feast it appeared to all of the nine hungry travlers. There were lev leaves of rye bread, cven figs dates, cheese, and crackers, cake, butter, and mean meat which they allate in gre at quantities.

"Isn't this a very cosy place." said violet forgetting for the moment the long weary trip ahead. "Mu my I'm glad we met you Abbisannians at this important time."

"It is very good to us too..Is it not lieutenant." said Captian Canny."

Th "there are some silk cushions on the saddles of the unridden horses." Said the lieutenant gruffly.

"Let's all mount as soon as possible we finish eating." Cried the sol old soldier pouching on a piece of meat, and in another mi ute minute the Abbisannian officer had brought up nine horses and got everything ready t so all in the party wouldbe as comg as possible.

"Could anything else have been more fortunate than this." Smiledthe old soldier. "We cannow resume our journey properly mounted and do not have to go on foot the rest of the way."

"I think I'll ride the jaggedy looking horse." Said violet looking uneasily at one of the steeds which seemed to be one a former Gargoylian wheeler rode. "Let's start before it gets any darker. Night is coming on now and we want to get on our way."

They had all eaten to their hearts content now, and now packing up the remainder of the feast, the a party of children and twenty soldiers made ready to start. The old soldier using a stone for a footstool climbed ato onto a horse and soon all were mounted and the little christian horse caravan moved slowly through the forest looking out for enemies or were hidden mines.

"there is a cocculpe of tents and blankets in my left handed saddle pack but I doubt it very much whether any one can put it up in this location." said the up captian of the Abbisannians, falling in behind violet and her sisters. "and I doubt if we are going to have a very good time to night either. This wood seems full of perils."

"Here here what mean call this doubting please!" Called the old soldier from his seat. "Surely we can pitch it when the time comes."

"Kind menof us don't pitche do into rebel encampments when the daylight goes." Called the Avina girls who would have their mind to warn friends in time. "We did it once."

The Abbisannian soldiers to tell the truth we were feeling suspicious, and anxious and uneasy but all of them were too polite to mention the fac t. As thy they proceeded Violet and her sisters in turn told the Abbisannians all about general Himmens and their fathers army and their quest for general Wink Chopper who had before the battle of Abelantomby went to spy on the rebels under Manley and who had not returned yet.. n occasional word jolted down from the old soldier told the little girls that he was singing. hey had gone possibly a mile when violet pointed in ext excitement to a straight light flickering two and fro a mile down the road just ahead.

"We must hve have missed it before." Said violet.

"Wait I'll use my spyglass and see what it is like." Declared the Abbisannian officer.

Jumping down from his horse and bading the others r to remain where they were but have all their weapons ready to shoot at a moments notice the Abbisannian officer went on h ahead, and violet and her sisters seeing to it their own guns were loaded peered curiously and excitedly at the lights far down the narrow tree lined path.

"hy did you not hear a single."

asked the old soldier of violet.

"A signal of what!" Asked the Abbisannian lo lieutenant waiting patiently but in anxiet y for the captian to come back and hurching forward early to see what was up. w "hy it was a strange booming sound" Said Angeline.

"he Abbisannian captian at this moment appeared.

"I It looks like a pretty good road but I cannot make out the light at all even with the glasses "He assured them.

"I doubt if it is a good road then. I doubt it very much." Said violet tremulously.

"don't you think it is dangerous to proceed."

"hat do you think sir." Asked the Abbisannian lieutenant looking suspiciously down the road.

"It is unwise to go on ahead down this road." said the Abbisannian captian.

"I climbed a tree y down younder and saw thous thousands of lights of similar color. If they are campfires they are not of a christian camp for they comeeal theire and these lights are of all colors and plai ly visible. I heard strange sounds too that makes me nervious. We will have to go in another direction. Keep your goo guns at the ready every one of you for we cannot tell what we will meet up against against."

In single file the little company of children and soldiers turned in ano at a wider path all of them even the horses advancing with ti timid cautious steps, then as more sounds came they again halted. For a short time everything went well. hen violet turning to see how everyone else was getting along discovered that one of the string of strange lights had suddenly disappeared and a strange noise like the whirring of a wind was heard followed by a noise like "Poop" then "BOOM."

"hy what in the world!" exclaimed Angeline. he soldiers and officers fairly craned their necks to see what was going on and when they saw that the strange lights were gone and heard the strange noise they grew suspicious and violet and her sisters almost burst into tears from excitement and the suspense of it all. here was a strange noise at the moment and a shockfollowed that heavened the old soldier clear out of his seat on the horse and flung him head first into the dust.

"Go to disknow wity it all." Exploded the old man sitting up. "If I had been skird flying in the air it would have been easier." he last last of his sentence was not heard for there was a hoarse croaking noise and the lights were reappeared. ut lights at another quarter had vanished and a great raven flopped down in the centre of the road and started croaking which made it seem all the more uneasy and violet was going to shoot at it when she was stopped by her sister Jennie who said:

"the first shot heard unnecessarily here might be the end of us. or god's sake be careful.

"Oh what in the world shall we do then. Oh where is the old soldier." Screamed violet. I wish I or the others with us had never come on either of these two paths."

"omething is wrong that can cause apprehension." Gasped Joice clutching the mane of her horse. nother string of lights had seemed to melt into air before their very eyes and others reappeared.

"I doubt if we can go through here safily, I doubt it veryvery much indeed." Said violet in a fai t voice as she ducked her head down involuntarily as a big yellow and blue winged butterflynt settled on another little girls head.

"he situation here is very doubtful I will say." whispered Jennie weakly. "Oh be careful sisters dear. We may be killed or have something worse happen any minute. Remember we are in enemys territory.

Violet and her sisters had had experience with the strange signals of enemy and change and transformation of such strange lights before, and the little girls pressing their fingers to their eyes for a moment tried to think of something to do. he raven was making awkward attempts to fly and cawing so loud every second that one of the soldiers who was dismounted threw a stone at it and away it flew.

"Oh I wish we could get out of all this." Wailed Jennie after trying in vain to recall some way to outdo such a peril. Prest Presto. here was a terrific flash in the distance, a horrible detonation and they all looked stunned by the noise. The Abbisannian officer still stood by his horse a bit breathless but hearty and as brave and as cautious as as ever.

"I see I see what it is." Said he with a little prance. "every light we see is something used by rebels to make signals. Maybe we are spotted somehow and they are starting to fire cannons at us. hat was a shell that explo ed exploded. Remember the blast just now. I certainly wish we had more troops with us on this dangerous quest. I certainly also wish myself we had not come in this part." He muttered and just at that in instant a greater number of lights flared up at a nearer location. "

"ood gracious. o we did run into something mysterious all right." Gasped the old soldier rubbing his hands together excitedly.

"There we are . There we are." cried the lieutenant stumbling tward his horse and rubbing his head against the horses neck. "Dear dear Princesses of Angelina , Dear young girls. nd my comrades thereyou are too. Ah how comfortable all this would be if it was not for this unseen peril we have run into."

''...ere is not one thousand lights---there must be thousands.'' ...hoosed the old soldier. ...nd violet and your sisters I doubt very much whether I'd care to go on any f r further. I just hape happened to recognize one of those lights. We are only two thirds of a mile away from general Manleys monsterous encampments.The town
I recognize in the distance is Mary Stanch.''
''don't make any more advances then please.''Said the captian of the Abbisannians sternly.
''I think a proper idea might serve us all swftly and well''Observed the old soldier. He having also been dismounted was pacing up and down in the greatest excitement. ...by now try''---- 'Oh stop.''Begged violet''wait untill we have thought it all out.''Trying is awfullly particular work on such an occasion as this.''
''One person beter speak for the whole party here.''Said the Abbisannian officer.
''Let's make a retreat.''
''Oh be careful''Screamed violet again.''...here are those strange lights behind us too.I wish you would all stop talking so loud. We may be heard and fired upon by unseen foes.''
...he old soldier looked at her reprocahfully for displaying such alarm but she had reason to. And no wonder...s as a distant flashlight glared they found themselves literally in a wooded country where a great rebel encampment was pitched. ...hey had entered Manleys lines without knowing it and it was a mystery why they had been passing any of the guards without being halted or hailed.
...or the first time
...he eyes of the soldiers gleamed with surprise and amusement.
in their lives they had ridden into a rebel encampment without knowing it was there.
''How we will have to be careful or we'll never escape at all.'' thought violet and a closing her eyes she tried to think of the very best way to escape for all of the Abbisannians were in the red uniforms and they themselves were not disguised either. It was night and growing darker and that was why they were not seen as they entered the lines . ...he little girls and the soldiers peered anxiously at one another wondering what in the world was going to happen. Being inside of a rebel encampment so suddenly was no joke I tell you...or five minutes violet and even her sisters thought and thought. ...hen moving toward them on two sides in the middle of the road was a number of objects o in the form of men. ...ut stars. ...o sooner had they appeared when in the distance there was a splintering crash and the detonation knocked themall unconscious.
After recovering the very next thing that any of them knew they were lying on the hard ground of a great roadway. One distant light still burned feebly and in the dim red light they could make out the old soldier scrambling awkwardly to his feet.''' smell smoke from somewhere....''...niffed the younger soldier politely.
''I doubt very much whether we are going to have an easy time getting out of this place.''...he voice of the old soldier came in a hesitating manner t hrough the gloom of the night.
''By Heaven and earth.''...asped the Abbisannian captian'''Are you there comrades!''
''Thank God and his blessed ...ether they are!'' Said violet.''...umming unexpectedly into unseen ...landelinians encampments is a risky and most responsible business for us. ...hey are all here but I wonder where'''...ere is!''' he and her sisters ...umped up but a shuffly of many feet from several directions made them draw back.
''Pigs. Weasl wassels and spies intruders and impositors.''Shrilled some angry voice and an unseen man hurled himself at the old soldier, who happened to be at the time in the lead.
''Get away from here w...o ever you are or i'll blow off your head.''...eered the old soldier drawing his pistol and shaking his unseen assailant off like a horse does a fly.
''Colonel Happy Tappy. ...ention what 's up. what's all this row.''
At the s r surprising sound of that dear and very familiar voice the hearts of violet and her sisters gave a skip of joy and without stopping to exclaim they rushed forward just as a big camp fire flared up but was immediately halted as a number of unseen soldiers surroundedly surrounded them and de...demanded''Halt who ever you are. ...on't dare approach him.''
''It is the famious ...ivian ...irls.''cried the general when the ...ivian ...irls recognized. ''Stir up the camp fires boys. Stir up the camp fires. Give us more lights.''
...he colonel who ever he was however who had attacked the r old soldier was very busisy backing away from the old soldier but with his sabre drawn and attempting to knock the pistol out of his hand.
''...pproach you insulting wretch.''Thundered the old soldier attempting to get in trigger in position to fire into the darkness his blindly but the unseen man said something and the old soldier did not understand a single word of the speech.''...pproach and fight me''He thundered again. I think you have insulted me''
He drew his other pistol and glared ar angrily and furiously through the dense darkness and the unseen man having backed away as far as he possibly could feel heels over head over one of the camp smouldering ...mpfires..At the loud cries he set up some soldiers rushed to his rescue and pulled him out before he got burned.
''...hey must be friends and I believe we have found general ...isk
...hopper, we have found general ...isk ...hopper.''Cried Angelina seizing the old soldier and shaking him untill his teeth rattled.
''Happy Tappy. Happy Tappy.''Called the general.''...here in the world did he go to I like to know.''...hat was what he o ...emately said but to ...violet and her sisters it sounded like he was some swearing and using some strange language at the same time.

''...hy ''Cried Jennie in great di...dimmay.''It is surely general
...icholas Chopper but I can't understand a word he is saying.''
''I think he must be talking China China tongue.''Droned the Abbisannian officer''Or talking the language of a chicken.---I knew a certain man once---a very comfortable party to and I----''.
''I doubt if it is anything like a Chickens language.''Put in the old soldier importantly but no one paied any attention to the two soldiers. ...or the colonel Tappy or Happy Tappy had at last recovered himself after being dragged out of the camp fire and the r soldiers in the dark had set fifteen or sixteen campfires going.
''Oh for Heavens sake?''Gasped violet as the magnificent region was flooded with glows of campfire lights.''''Where are we now please?''
...he general himself had left his tent in front of where the party had been standing and with outstretched arms came running toward violet and her sisters, talking a perfect ...iagara of strange language.
''Have you forgotten your own langg language so soon''...umbled the old soldier reprocahfully as first violet and then her sisters flung their arms around the general. ...he general seeing the old soldier for the first time fairly fell upon his neck in Angelinian fashion. ...hen he brushed his hand across his forehead.
''...asn't I talking in the Angelinian tongue or language?''...e asked in a very puzzled voice.
''Oh now you certainly ...e are.''Exclaimed ...atherine while her sisters nodded.
...nd sure enough the general was talking plain Angelinian(which I don't mind telling the readers is plain Latin).
...he other soldiers who had accompanied them had been watching this little reui reui reunion with hardly repressed emotion. ...dvancing hastily one by one they dropped on one knee.
''My good sword and heart are ever at thy service sir.''Each soldier exclaimed feebly.
''Who are these now persons.''...ulped the general staring in undisguised
...tonishment at the kneeling figure of the last soldier.
''they are Abbisannians and our guardians and they have taken such good care of us.''Explained violet eagerly.
''...plendid fellows indeed for God and Country.''...issed the old soldier in the ...enerals other ear''Even if they do sometimes talk odds and ends.''
''...y friend of violet and her sisters and of Angelinia's cause are my friends also''Said the general shaking hands with the soldiers warmly.''...ut I want to know how you all got here and what you little girls were doing far from the christian lines for these two weeks.''
''first please tell us where we all are.''Begged the little ...irl Jennie while her sisters looked pleadingly at him. for the scenery and the generals strange uniform filled them with alarm.
''...ou are unknown to the ...landelinians. in general Manleys lines.''Said the general slowly.''...nd I am posing as general ...ikmell--that is they think I am the general---or his good for nothing spirit whatever that be---and to morrow''
...he general glared around wildly''I'll be facing the firing squad unless I make my escape to night or later.''...is voice broke and ended in a bad barely controlled sob.
''I doubt thatindeed.''...ra drawled the Abbisannian general sleepily.
''...ace the firing squad!''...asped Hettie.''...hy no one could dare shoot any one w o is believed to be a general.''
''...e are no longer in the christian lines my dears. ...landelinian laws are different.''
...he general shook his head sadly.Then fixing the group with a most puzzled astare he exclaimed;
''...ut how did yo you all get here.''
''...ut by accident.''Said the old soldier in a hollow voice.
''...es ''Said violet.''Well we have been hunting for you all over from Calverinia to Phalantonburg to here and at last we came tothese two dividing roads and being confused by the many strange lights we saw ru ran into the encampment unexpe unexpectedly. ...e were so frightened we were right then wishing we were all within the christian lines again just like that and---and the next minute----''
''...e ran into the encampment and saw light after light, and light after light.''
''well here you ...e are within Manleys lines and placing yourselves in great peril.''...inished the general hastily''...nd the war seems to show signs of going on forever.''
''...ow tell us please every single thing that has happened to you.''Demanded Daisy eagerly.
...ome of the ...landelinians who were at the generals tent at the time had recognized violet and her sisters and though rebels were not of the bad sort and approached with an arm fuoo full of large soft cushions. ...he ...ivian ...irls were invited inside the big tent and the cushions were set in a circle on the floor with one for the general himself in the centre and with a warning finger on his l their lips they placed themselves in a standing position behind the general
''...he men are perfectly right.''Exclaimed the general''We must be as quiet as possible for still a great danger hangs over me and you little girls took chances to...o coming here.''
...ithout more ado he told them of his amazing plans to enter the rebel lines, of how he accomplished it, of his ...ef adventures within the rebel lines when he was mistaken for ...ikmell of the loyalty of some officers and generals, and disloyalyty and t re...chery of others, and of Manleys suspicions who would make attempts to turn around and have him exposed not as Bikmell but but as a spy and impostor and have him facing a firing squad.All that I have written here about him in the recent ...ges he told violet and her sisters up to the very point where some of the treacherious rebels had bound him and a boyscout to a pole not many days before and tied up another besides. he lad had managed to free himself and set free the general and the others and they were about th plan to make their escape when violet and her sisters and the others had made their sudden unexpected appearance. Me Abbieannina soldiers and the old and young one who had first accompained the little Angelinian Princesses listened politely at first but were cut by their exciting adventures of the days before they came across violet and her sisters fo'l fell asleep in the middle of the story.nothing however could have exceeded the dismay of violet and her sisters to learn that the jolly general ñisk chopper of the Angelinian Ninth corps whom she had discovered h themselves had discovered had in reality spied on the enemy and faced danger now of the most terrible description.

''Oh this spi spoils everything''wailed the little girls miserably.The thought of the christian army without the general so well beloved by all was unthinkable.

''It sp spoils everything for us and our friends. We were going to do all we could to bring you back. Weren't we.'''she added to the old soldier.

he old soldier nodded.

''I was going to escort you back on a splendid horse''He mumbled in a shocked voice or of sorrow''but now that you face peril of the firing squad and as there seems to be no hope of escaping the detection that will lead you before it''the general looked mis the old soldier looked with a face of sorrow and misery at violet and her sisters.

The others looked fierce and rattled their sabres in a threatening manner, but they could not think of anything that would help any of them out of their troubles and difficulties.

''To morrow there won't be any more general Nisk chopper in the christian lines.''wailed the little girls''Oh dear, oh dear. why did you be so foolish as to take this risk when you know it would end this way!''nd the little girls began to cry as if their little hearts would break.

''Stop, stop.''egged the general, while the kind glandelinians awkwardly patted the little girls to cheer them up''I'd rather face a mille million guns than allow myself to face the firing squad any day.I don't carg a ñisk you for the rebel general Manley here and neither doe those friendly glandelinians siding with me either and as for the rest who suspect me they are all unnatural villians who make my life mis miserable by telling me all sorts of lies about myself.''

''just like a song or poem I and my sisters once read in a school book.'' said Angeline as she and her sisters brightened up!

''You are very wicked Papa john, his young children said/
And your face has become very white indeed very white,
And yet you incessantly curse and swear when on your last stand!
Do you think papa dear at your old age perditional punishment would readily serve you ri h right.''''

''That's it, that is it exactly.''Exclaimed the general as The little girls finally finished repeating the verse.''you are a treacherious christian dog , a impostor ''That is all I hear . I could almost stand on my head in dismay and fear. nd dear little Princess of Princesses of Angelinia I can't seem to get use to being so long in the rebel encampments either.''Added the general in a very melancholy voice.''It is-almost turning my hair gray.''He lowered his head and showed them his hair.''hy those villan villains even don't believe there is such a place as Angelinia Agatha in Calverinia.It is not on the map your emsellency. It is not on the map.''He mumbled imitating the tones of the glandelinian officers so cleverly that violet and her sisters almost laughed in spite of themselves.

''That is what comes of pride and recklessness.''he general held out his hands most expressively.''ost people who dare to go out spying when it it too dangerous now to attempt it are in for a full and complete failure and I have ad mine already.''

''But what do you want to do?''Asked the old soldier gravely.''succeed in what you wished to do or— go back—to the christian lines without the information!''

''I don't care what I do now.''In his great excitement the general had lost his grammer completely.''I want to go back to the christian lines but I never will unless I can succeed in finding out something of Manleys plans about his intentions concerning what he will do at Cedarnine.''

''But then which w would you choose , the attempt or the firing squads!''Asked the old soldier who was still a bi bright smile.

''Why choose the best course of course.''Said the general with a bi bright smile. ''I'l choose the spying and dare the firing squad at the same time.I depent upon your help the all of you and we cannaccomplish it most successfully.''

The sight of his old friends had quiet restored his cheerfulness.''I have been here long enough attempting things alone and to know that I am a better spy with many helping me than attempting something that is impossible alone.''

''Why how very simple it certainly is.'' ighed Jeice very contentedly.''General ivian our papa was all wrong.We lost the battle of Phalantonburg anyway.And it is not what you were attempting to do that scared us —it was the peril you faced.''

''By the name of Jupiter the little maid of Angelinia is perfectly right.''Said the old soldier slapping his hands together in delight.''Let your fool of a general John Manley but try any of his foolishness. Out on him and his firing squads.We'll ourselves find out anything that is required. put what say you glandelinians!''

One of the friendly landelinians although he understood no word of the conversation had been watching the discussion with great interest. He had been trying to attrack the generals attention for some time, but the old soldier was the only one who had noticed him.

''what is it yin ilver.''Asked the general dropping easily back into the zimmermannian language.

''Honored general the midnight approaches and with it the procession, nd the grand e general in chief Manley---and your peril. Be careful and do what you can to defeat them and savevyour friends here.''he soldier paused significantly.

The general shuddered.

''Let's get out of the rebel lines while we have the chance.''Said the old soldier uneasily.

he general was feeling in the pocket of his old inside unfirom which he always had worn under his rebel unfirom of disguise.

''Here''He smidgiving a small piece of paper to the rebel soldier.''It is some letter to one of the generals.''

''It is a war a warning to one of my friends.''He explained to Violet and her sisters''and will enable him to come here and defend me from Manley if possible.''

The soldier went off to do his bidding

Soon he returned le followed by a tall stought haughty but kind looking rebel general.It was to their surprised the original general Leonia Waldemia ickwell who had come in time and was bound to prevent the general from facing the firing squad and who thought it a good joke on him that some one had the looks good and perfect enough to be able to impersonate him. He remembered violet and her sisters and though he looked at them seriously and with a slight scowl he nevertheless bowed''Which was the way glandelinians salute) and said;

''Greetings honorable Ouites of Angelinia''you little girls ''He said seriously had no right to come and butt in on this. If I can save you and your friends now I will have to use my force. put take my warning and don't do it again.''

''I never could have stood my ground here to day without his help.'' ñisk chopper looked fondly at his Imperial glandelinian general and friend. ''Queer indeed.''Said the general pointing to violet and her sisters and looking at them with his fierce but kindly looking faces as if he had thoughts that could eat them.''hey will risk anything to behold their cause and I warned them on es before for ''god's sake keep away from the glandelinian encampments.''

''I think they should be praised instead of scolded.''Rumbled general ñisk chopper beaming on the brave little girls.''ise violet and your dear little sisters and greet the original general Waldemia M ickwell.''

''Midnight willsoon come and then we will all have our horrible time of it.'' wailed violet dismally.

''We were going to plan to escape in boats across a river.''Exclaimed general ñisk chopper''but—it was not now necessary for him to finish. Any number of boats boats even large enough to hold a man singly or one which could hold them all at once ould not be launched secretly here.

''Oh dear'' g sighed Jennie after she and her sisters had bowed to the good rebel general''If I had only know you were going to do this general ñisk we would not have let you go.''

''You certainly did verywell to risk your lives coming for me at that dear little Princesses of Angelinia.''Said the ogy''when I think of what I was going to do.''—

''hat were you going to do Nisk dear?''Asked violet curiously.

''I was going to shoot Manley and make his whole army leaderless f''Faltered the general looking terribly ashamed.

''Shoot, assassinate Manley!''gasped Violet and her sisters in als alarm and surprise.''hy what good would that have done us and the cause?''

''Wait ''Interrupted the spy.''I have thought of something. Why not edge out our way in from tree to tree. It is a long long way to go but at the end lies the Potomine river nd and we could get across. ickwell would secretly give us help.''

''Grammercy indeed it is a pretty plan.''Exclaimed thecold soldier, peering forward into the darkness.

''Would not that be social escapade.''Chuckled the rebel general as Violet and her sisters recovered their spirits with a bound. The others said nothing but heaved a mighty sigh which no one heard for they were all starting for the trees. It was a good way to go though to the river but the trees were handy things to hide behind incase the rebels would catch on and pursue.

''heres a big tree right in front of us. You go first please.''Said the spy generall helping violet to get across a large ledge of rock. hen she had safely with her sisters gone a few steps, the general and the soldiers followed with the Abbieannians.

''I'll go last.''Said general ñisk chopper bravely and had just set his foot across a little brook or spring wi when a hoarse series of loud yells rang through the air. Rebel guards had discovered them moving from tree to tree and had fired and several shots rang out and a bullet hit violet right on the arm and made her a severe wounded and she screamed that she was shot.

It was indeed poor violet who had been wounded badly on the right arm. Waking suddenly to the realisation of the situation if they continued the flight in this manner most of the fugitives had retraced their steps and were back in the tent before any one of the rebels realized it was they who had retreated. But poor violet who was wounded and lying on a or near a tree stump was accidentally deserted.

"Oh where are you , oh where are you." she screamed in a dismal voice. "come back please. come back back please. dont leave me here all alone with t he enemy."

"hush up can't you and be sensible." grumbled the old soldier who also had been left behind. do''pe you want us all to be taken as prisoners suddenly and be thrown into an impregnable prison on our account. We cannot retrace our steps and the others not missing us in time have not brought us with them when they rescued. We can't get back and will have to wait here and fuse it out.I have some bandages with me and in the dark here where no will one will see us.I will dress your wounds.Is it serious."

"it is very uncomfortable." ailed the poor little go girl. she began to sob he heavily. Jessie who had followed the rest had not yet reached the tent and although very near the tent she heard all this very distinctly.

"Oh" she cried remorsefully as she entered the tent. "we can't desert our sister violet like this. I never thought she was not with us when we retraced our steps."

"spoken indeed like the dear little heroine that you are." said the Abbiel'minus officer" he little girl who no doubt is wounded out in the woods never reminded us of it either——there is bravery for you to example by if you don't mention."

"Let us go back at once under any peril for I dil not move a step out of the limes without violet." said the spy general. in his agitation he had made a mo move for the entrance of the tent but tripped on a long lying near the table and lost his balance and fell headlong to the ground, knocking the old soldier down as he sprul sprawled. the others had made hast simultaneously to follow him but suddenly the old soldier appeared carrying violet and then came Jessie and soon all were gathered gravely at the entrance of the tent regarding her dismally.

"I'll have to think of some other plan." said the spy general looking nervously at the dark sj sky overhead and also at violet who was now standing before t them a sad looking child indeed. the little wounded girl had controlled her sobs with difficulty for the wound pained her terribly and pressed as close to her comforting sisters as she could.Fortun ately most of the rebel encamp encampments were still asleep and it was only the pickets who had chased the fugitives back into the limes and fired upon them wounding Violet.

"It would have been a terrible disaster indeed if she had been killed" mused the general and christian spy, thinking also of the long long retreat back to the tent without further consulting.

"Ah I have it at last."

"but asked Angelina anxiously

"I wonder that I was so foolish I did not think of it before. in indeed I believe I am thinking of things better than before. I will collect my friendly landelinians about me and fight my way through to escape and you follow." Exclaimed the christian general, spy triumphantly.I" I and you will fight our way through and we then can find out way to the nearest christian army and rescue especially violet and her sisters can return to general Hanson vivians or general robert vivians lines."

"but if the the friendly landelinians refuse to do it for us!" Put in Catherine in a tremerlous voice. "but if indeed if the general Hamley should appear with his rebel officers to have to investigated before you finished no your plans?"

"I said we can make a dash for it and fight our way out." Said the general more seriously twirling his long sword recklessly and defiantly.

"I,m with you for anything." said the old soldier and othe others."

"All right" said the spy more cheerfully. "and now that verything is settled on the matter and so nicely too we might as well e njoy the little time left in making our preparations. Put out all the camp fires . celebrate l Happy Tappy. violet and her sisters and I and the others who have come with them will sit in council in the tent and the rest of you may come as close to the conversation as possible."

the spy general exclaimed some of his faithful landelinian friends and he and another man pulled and tugged a large table across to the centre of the floor inside the big tricent. he generals horse ambled about inside the tent instead of outside outside and started eating some flowers out of a vase . the old soldier placed himself beside poor violet who was in misery and the rest including her sisters seated themselves all around the gorgeous table. how while they waited for the time to come, violet's sisters told all about the r adventure in the two encampments of the rebels and the general himself once again told the story of his victory over the rebels in trying to rescue his de death as a spy six days before and how he escaped through the help of his friends.

"here is the important papers now you say you have se u secured!" Asked joice at the end of the story.

he spy general smiled shrewdly and feeling in a deep pocket brought out the little roll of paper and also a beautiful locket he had picked up outside the tent

"I wish violet had lost in her flight from the limes and then her sad coming." "you know" he said smiling "so much has hape happened to me I have not thought of them since I with my eyes witnessed the horrors of the battleof Fhalmtenburg." I was saving the papers for you poor violet but now I'll have to let Joice have the honor me you says" Exclaimed joice vivian in delight. "Let me see the papers." the general handed them over to her in an obliging manner manner manner, but the old soldier looki looked around nervously and trembled so v violently that he almox almost fell off his h chair

"I beg of you joice please." he s scrambled to his feet and snatched the papers from her hands in terror. "I beg of you please don't op ex that roll of paper is here. Some one may see us and it would be our end."

"she is used to keeping thing in a cautious manner you need not worry." Said the general spy easily.

"Of course I m am." said joice with the greatest dignity and he handed it back t o her with a trembling hand. "but this roll pf p of paper will be mighty useful to general Hanson or papa if only we can get to them and be able to give it up. We can n k just fool Hamley in any way we wishewish to do so."

Joice pulled a small sg string from a rope she saw hanging near by and winding it around the little roll of paper put in carefully inside her waist . the beautiful lp hot she hung around violets neck.

"Perhaps general Hanson vivian or even papa had a lot of men looking for us and trying to get us back again." Said Jessie after they had sat for a time in silence.

"I doubt it indeed." said violet herself trying to be brave in spite of the pain.

"hey must have been to busy or do not know we are not in the lines."

"Singular little girl violet is." Ejaculated the old soldier. "And violet dear doubting never gets any one anywhere."

"Hush please all of you." Warned the general spy. "I hear many foot-steps."

"come here please." the old soldier called hoarsely to the generals horse who was trying to eat a paper leaf of green shade at the other end of the tent thinking it was real grass. the horse ran awk awka awkwardly to him and was led out side by the soldier

"Whatever happensxnow as we are all in disguise we must stick together and play the trick well." Said the general s pleasingly. "Ah")) violets sisters held fast to each other. the midnight moon had risen at last and all camp fire s were al aglow. here was down the company street a loud strain of many drums and a band was playingthe "cuthermer March, and there was soon a tramp, tramp of many feet and pant, the tent for a distance marched the most splendid company of band players violet and her sisters and those with them had ever seen in their whole life of adventures."

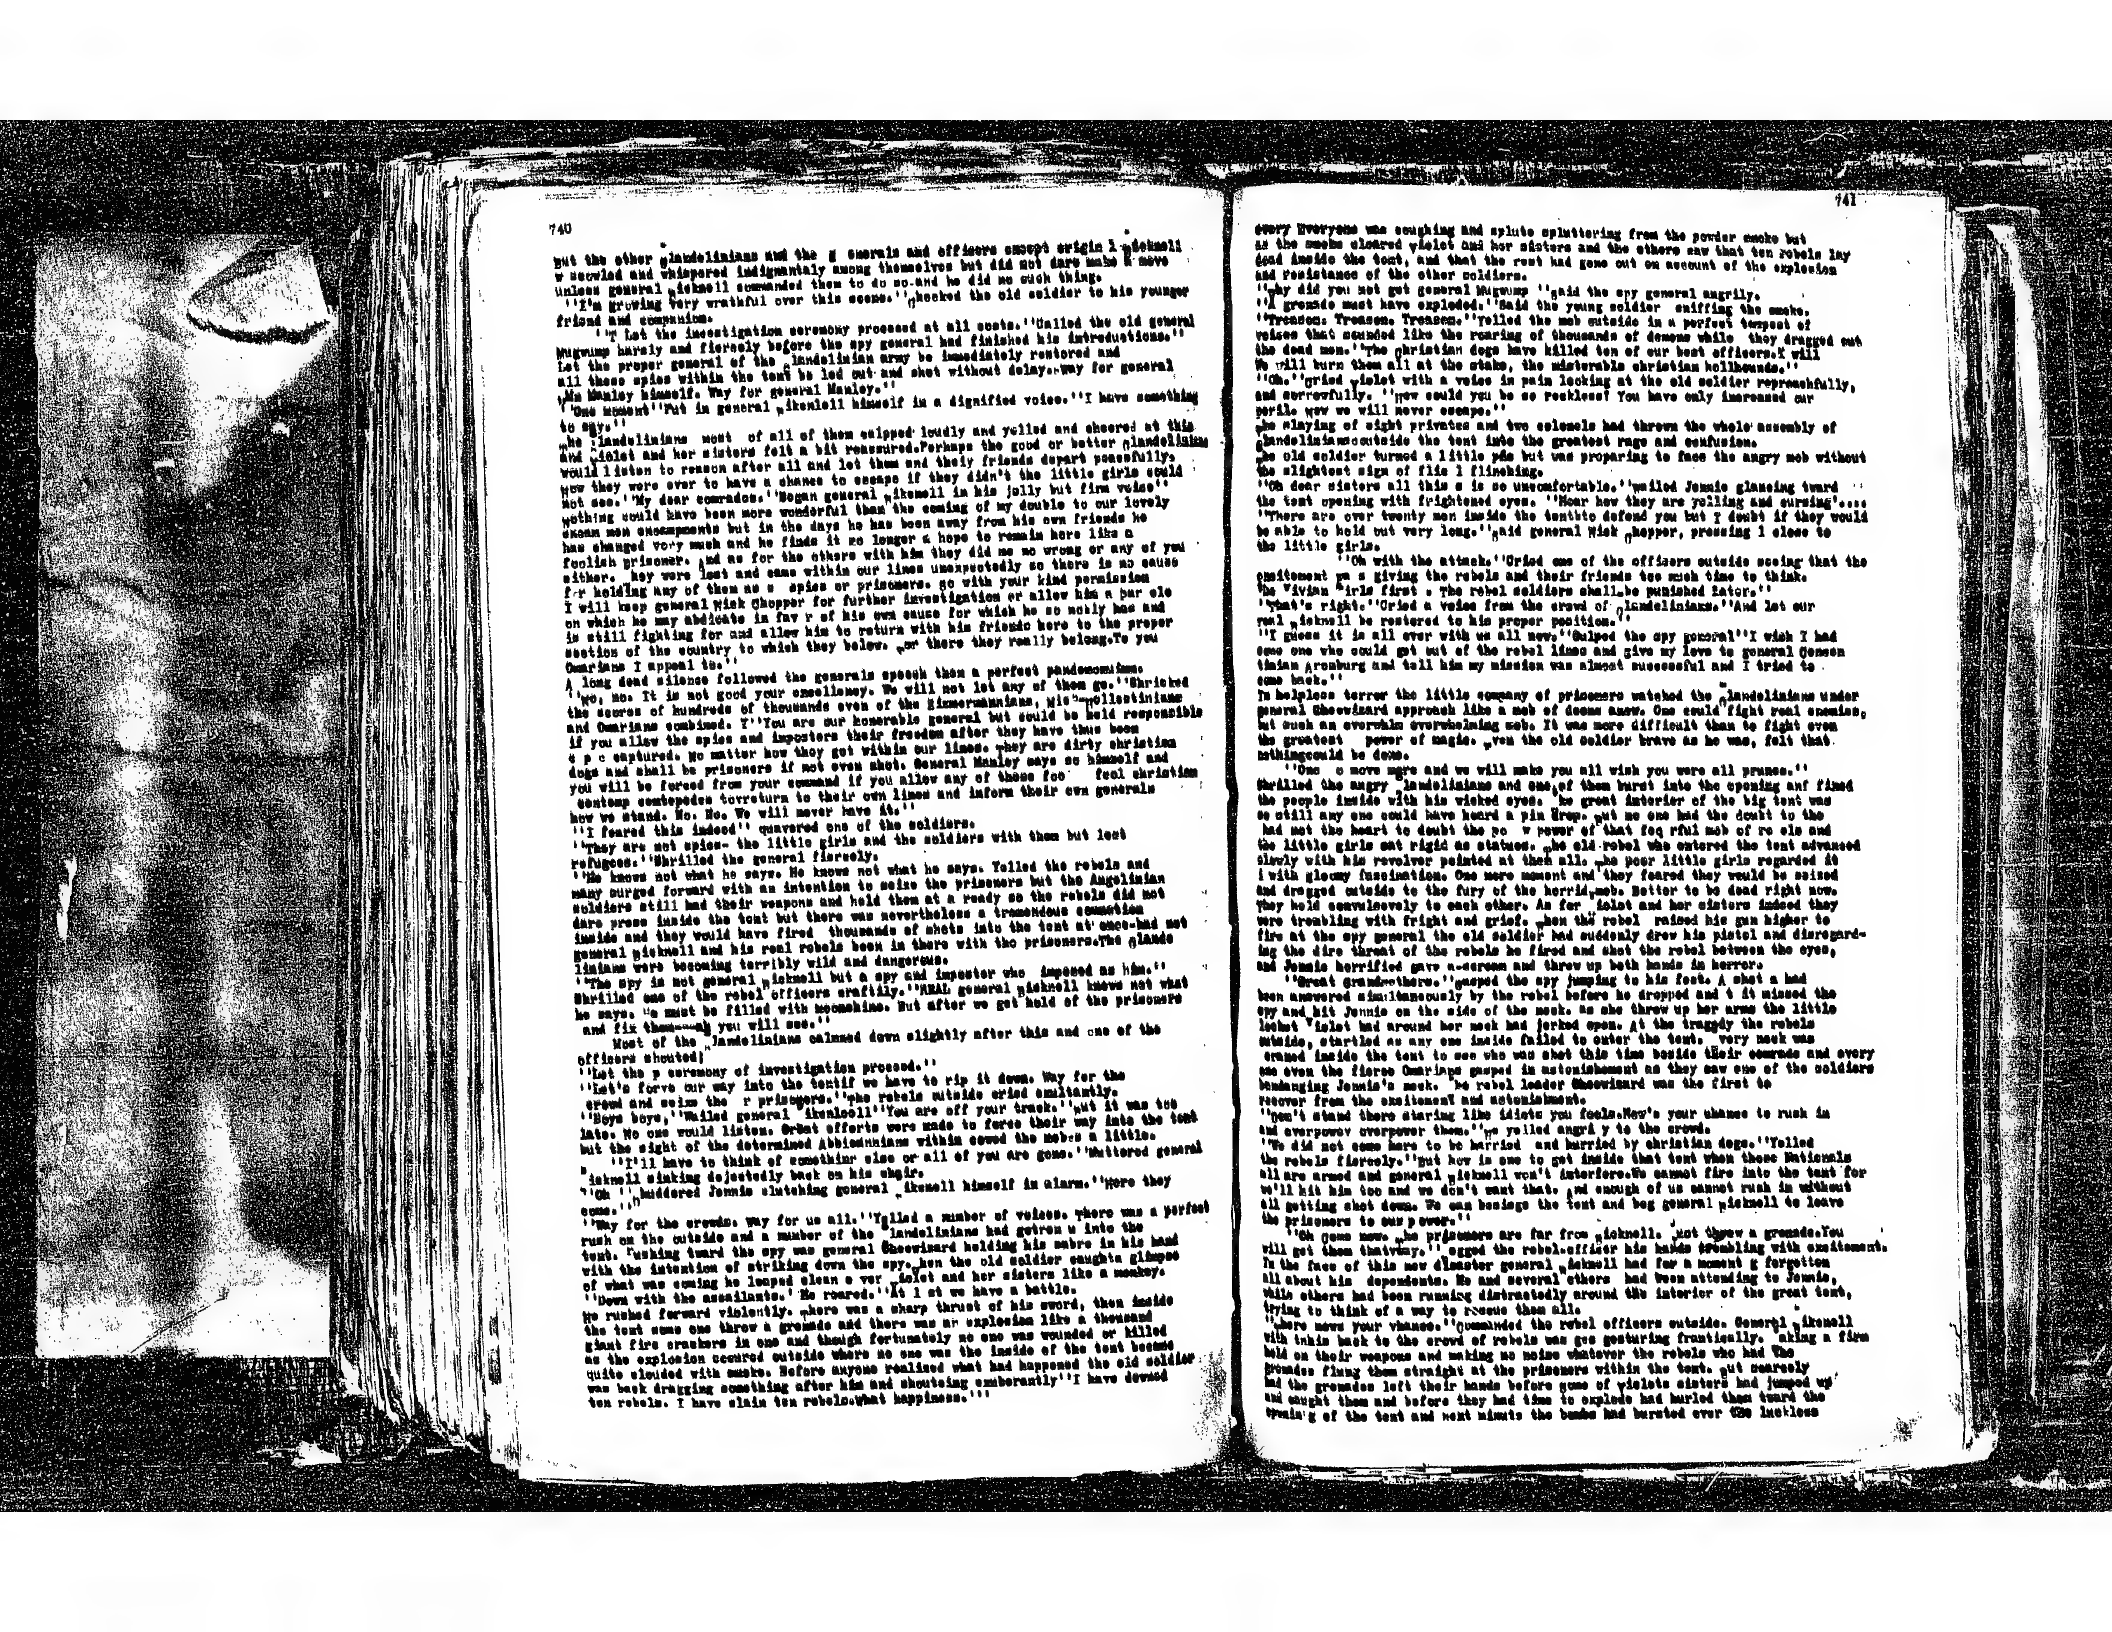
"the whole landelinian army must be advancing to somewhere I suppose" Whistled one of the soldiers lurching to his feet. "ow nice if they would forget us and we could get to our own comrades without difficulty."

"I doubt that that."

the eyes of all the soldiers f lew u open in surprise and stared curiously at the magnificent procession of soldiers following the landelinian band. just as I wrote before come the Band and its drummers and musicians playing their many instruments , trumpets and flutes. the Grand general Francis Hoover and Hurumper followed attired in their most brilliant gran gray uniforms. then came three columns of generals and officers of state glittering with gold or jewelled decorations on the chest of their uniforms and then fifteen colonels and a hundred other officers dressed almost like so many butterflies in their gorgeous colors. Many appeared a group of splendidly uniformed generals on horseback bearing the chief general Blossom Ormagein followed by a whole company of other officers and after them as many of the soli private soldiers as the company streets would or could hold. there was a moment of silence after the band stopped playing. then the whole assemblage contrary to the expectations of violet and her sisters stood attention and saluted with their right hands. the usual salute among the landelinian landelinians was a polite bow and the other kind od of salute astonished violet and her sisters.

"My" Exclaimed Joice impressed in spite of herself and she and her sisters loved the scene. "Are you sure nicholas shopper that you want to give up all of this beautiful spray."!!



"Great general Nicholl behold the officers and generals here arrayed as beautiful as the sun, wise as the stars and radiant as the clouds, the Ceremony of Restoration is about to begin begin." Quavered the general called Hagcamp rising slowly and looking at the real general Nicholls. then he suddenly paused for he was strongly astonished and confused by the strange company in the tent of general Nicholl hopper.

"Prodigious." Hissed one one of the generals striding in. "We left the Impostor tied to a small post. but Impostor and his companions are no prisoners right in this tent. "hey are spies your excellency. and who are these beautiful children dressed as boy Scouts the spy has gathered about him pray? one other than the dangerous vivian girls."

Now though the rebel officer spoke low the little girls could understand all the that was being said. when violet and her sisters heard themselves called Impostors and saw the wicked faces of the landelinians and the other rebels they no longer wondered at the general and spys decision. the general who bowed as the spy bowed calmly.

"First" Said he very cheerfully and boldly "Let me introduce my friends here and there from outside."

Most of the Better landelinians who happened to be Guarisons and Guarrison Cordon who really loved the general bowed politely as he called out the names of violet and her sisters and Jessie introduced the soldiers.

but the other Mandelinians and the G enerals and officers except origin l Nicknell w scowled and whispered indignantly among themselves but did not dare make a move unless general Nicknell commanded them to do so.And he did no such thing.

''I'm growing very wrathful over this scene.''Mocked the old soldier to his younger friend and companion.

''I bet the investigation ceremony proceed at all costs.''Bellowed the old general Mugwump harshly and fiercely before the spy general had finished his introductions.''

Let the proper general of the Mandelinian army be immediately restored and all these spies within the tent be led out and shot without delay..Way for general Ma Manley himself. Way for general Manley.''

''One moment''Put in general Nicknell himself in a dignified voice.''I have something to say.''

The Mandelinians most of all of them gulped loudly and yelled and cheered at this and Violet and her sisters felt a bit reassured.Perhaps the good or better Mandelinians would listen to reason after all and let them and their friends depart peacefully. Now they were over to have a chance to escape if they didn't the little girls could not see.''My dear comrades.''Began general Nicknell in his jolly but firm voice'' nothing would have been more wonderful than the coming of my double to our lovely Arkana men encampments but in the days he has been away from his own friends he has changed very much and he finds it no longer a hope to remain here like a foolish prisoner. And as for the others with him they did no no wrong or any of you either. They were lost and came within our lines unexpectedly so there is no cause for holding any of them as s spies or prisoners. go with your kind permission I will keep general Mick Chopper for further investigation or allow him a par ole on which he may abdicate in fav r of his own cause for which he so manly has and is still fighting for and allow him to return with his friends here to the proper section of the country to which they belong. For there they really belong.To you Comrians I appeal to.''

A long dead silence followed the generals speech then a perfect pandemonium.

''No, no. It is not good your smoothness. We will not let any of them go.''Shrieked the scores of hundreds of thousands even of the Zimmermannians, Mic'Mellestinians and Comrians combined. I''You are our honorable general but could be held responsible if you allow the spies and impostors their freedom after they have thus been c p c captured. No matter how they got within our lines. They are dirty christian dogs and shall be prisoners if not even shot. General Manley says so himself and you will be forced from your command if you allow any of these foo foul christian contemp contepedes torreturn to their own lines and inform their own generals how we stand. No. No. We will never have it.''

''I feared this indeed'' quavered one of the soldiers.

''They are not spies- the little girls and the soldiers with them but lost refugees.''Shrilled the general fiercely.

''He knows not what he says. He knows not what he says. Yelled the rebels and many surged forward with an intention to seize the prisoners but the Angelinian soldiers still had their weapons and held them at a ready so the rebels did not dare press inside the tent but there was nevertheless a tremendous commotion inside and they would have fired thousands of shots into the tent at once-had not general Nicknell and his real rebels been in there with the prisoners.The Mandelinians were becoming terribly wild and dangerous.

''The spy is not general Nicknell but a spy and impostor who imposed as him.'' Shrilled one of the rebel officers craftily.''REAL general Nicknell knows not what he says. He must be filled with moonshine. But after we get hold of the prisoners and fix them--ah you will see.''

Most of the Mandelinians calmed down slightly after this and one of the officers shouted;

''Let the p ceremony of investigation proceed.''

''Let's force our way into the tentif we have to rip it down. Way for the crowd and seize the r prisoners.''The rebels outside cried exultantly.

''Boys boys,''Wailed general Mugwump''You are off your tracks.''But it was too late. No one would listen. Great efforts were made to force their way into the tent but the sight of the determined Abbiesinians within cowed the mobs a little.

''I'll have to think of something else or all of you are gone.''Muttered general Nicknell sinking dejectedly back on his chair.

''Oh !''Muddered Jennie clutching general Nicknell himself in alarm.''Here they come.''

''Way for the crowds. Way for us all.''Yelled a number of voices. There was a perfect rush on the outside and a number of the Mandelinians had gotten u into the tent. Rushing toard the spy was general Chocowizard holding his sabre in his hand with the intention of striking down the spy. When the old soldier caught a glimpse of what was coming he leaped clean o ver Violet and her sisters like a monkey.

''Down with the assailants.' He roared.''It l ot us have a battle.

He rushed forward violently. There was a sharp thrust of his sword, then inside the tent some one threw a grenade and there was an explosion like a thousand giant fire crackers in one and though fortunately no one was wounded or killed as the explosion occured outside where no one was the inside of the tent became quite clouded with smoke. Before anyone realised what had happened the old soldier was back dragging something after him and shouting exuberantly''I have downed ten rebels. I have slain ten rebels.What happiness.''' every Everyone was coughing and splute spluttering from the powder smoke but as the smoke cleared Violet and her sisters and the others saw that ten rebels lay dead inside the tent, and that the rest had gone out on account of the explosion and resistance of the other soldiers.

''Why did you not get general Mugwump ''said the spy general angrily.

''I grenade must have exploded.''Said the young soldier sniffing the smoke.

''Treason. Treason. Treason.''Yelled the mob outside in a perfect tempest of voices that sounded like the roaring of thousands of demons while they dragged out the dead men.''The christian dogs have killed ten of our best officers.I will We will burn them all at the stake, the miserable christian hellhounds.''

''Oh.''Cried Violet with a voice in pain looking at the old soldier reproachfully, and sorrowfully. ''How could you be so reckless? You have only increased our perils now we will never escape.''

The slaying of eight privates and two colonels had thrown the whole assembly of Mandelinians outside the tent into the greatest rage and confusion.

The old soldier turned a little pale but was preparing to face the angry mob without the slightest sign of flin l flinching.

''Oh dear sisters all this s is so uncomfortable.''wailed Jennie glancing toward the tent opening with frightened eyes. ''Hear how they are yelling and cursing'....

''There are over twenty men inside the tenthto defend you but I doubt if they would be able to hold out very long.''Said general Nick Chopper, pressing l closs to the little girls.

''Oh with the attack.''Cried one of the officers outside seeing that the excitement was giving the rebels and their friends too much time to think. The Vivian Girls first . The rebel soldiers shall.be punished later.''

''That's right.''Cried a voice from the crowd of Mandelinians.''And let our real Nicknell be restored to his proper position.''

''I guess it is all over with us all now.''Sulped the spy general''I wish I had some one who could get out of the rebel lines and give my love to general Comsonimian Aronburg and tell him my mission was almost successful and I tried to come back.''

In helpless terror the little company of prisoners watched the Mandelinians under general Chocowizard approach like a mob of demons anow. One could fight real enemies, but such an overwhelm overwhelming mob. It was more difficult than to fight even the greatest power of magic. Even the old soldier brave as he was, felt that nothingcould be done.

''One o move more and we will make you all wish you were all prunes.''

Thrilled the angry Mandelinians and one of them burst into the opening and fixed the people inside with his wicked eyes. The great interior of the big tent was so still any one could have heard a pin drop. But no one had the doubt to the had not the heart to doubt the po w power of that fee rful mob of re els and the little girls sat rigid as statues. The old rebel who entered the tent advanced slowly with his revolver pointed at them all. The poor little girls regarded it i with gloomy fascination. One more moment and they feared they would be seized and dragged outside to the fury of the horrid mob. Better to be dead right now. They held convulsively to each other. As for Violet and her sisters indeed they were trembling with fright and grief. When the rebel raised his gun higher to fire at the spy general the old soldier had suddenly drew his pistol and disregarding the dire threat of the rebels he fired and shot the rebel between the eyes, and Jennie horrified gave a-scream and threw up both hands in horror.

''Great grands-there.''gasped the spy jumping to his feet. A shot a had been answered simultaneously by the rebel before he dropped and t it missed the spy and hit Jennie on the side of the neck. As she threw up her arms the little locket Violet had around her neck had jerked open. At the tragedy the rebels outside, startled as any one inside failed to enter the tent. very much was crowd inside the tent to see who was shot this time beside their comrade and every one even the fierce Comrians gasped in astonishment as they saw one of the soldiers Mandaging Jennie's neck. The rebel leader Chocowizard was the first to recover from the emotional and astonishment.

''Don't stand there staring like idiots you fools.Now's your chance to rush in and overpower overpower them.''He yelled angri y to the crowd.

''We did not come here to be harried and harried by christian dogs.''Yelled the rebels fiercely.''But how is one to get inside that tent when those Nationals all are armed and general Nicknell won't interfere.We cannot fire into the tent for we'll hit him too and we don't want that. And enough of us cannot rush in without all getting shot down. We can besiege the tent and beg general Nicknell to leave the prisoners to our power.''

''Oh guess move. The prisoners are far from Nicknell. Just throw a grenade.You will get them thatway.''urged the rebel officer his hands trembling with excitement. In the face of this new disaster general Nicknell had for a moment g forgotten all about his dependents. He and several others had been attending to Jennie, while others had been running distractedly around the interior of the great tent, trying to think of a way to rescue them all.

''Here move your vicinces.''Commanded the rebel officers outside. General Nicknell with this back to the crowd of rebels was gee gesturing frantically, taking a firm hold on their weapons and making no noise whatever the rebels who had The grenades flung them straight at the prisoners within the tent. But scarcely had the grenades left their hands before some of violets sisters had jumped up and caught them and before they had time to explode had hurled them toard the opening of the tent and next minute the bombs had bursted over the luckless crowds of Scandilinians outside killing and wounding nearly thirty of them. As Jennies would did not prove to be a dangerous one the other little sisters of hers embraced each other in delight. And while the Scandilinians outside were thrown into confusion by the explosions among their own ranks many rushed to the aid of their comrades who were wounded and dragged them to some empty tents.

"Seize the spies and take them to the firing squads." Ordered an officer outside asserting t his authority again. A dozen more tried to enter the tent, and one caught hold of Violet but was cut down by one of the Abbiesanians and all this Iskwell did not interfere in the least. Seeing that all this was of no use as general Iskwell had strode to the entrance of the tent clapping his hands for silence it came.

"You will now have to ar agree with me I'm sure." Said the general in a more sternar voice "that rebellion against me is a serious thing to matter with. I have not interfered with the soldiers who resisted you and now I tell you if you continue so I will take matters in hand myself and shoot all of you down. I can shure every one of you with rebellion against your general. The people here are not spies except the general who you accuse as one and more of you can have the rights to act like this. If you will all return quietly to your tents or companies where you belong I will try peacefully to find a way out of our difficulties or otherwise I will notify the government of your rebellion and you all will be severely punished on the charge of treason yourselves."

The better Scandilinians listented respectfully and after a little agrum arging among themselves back backed away from the tent, but the Simmermanians pouted and scowled fiercely and Iskwell knew these especially had to be watched to tell the truth the Simmermanians were anxious to spread abroad the tale of the mornings happenings and have the prisoners seized by main force but they appeared to be afraid of general Iskwell. The Sa-pollestinians however refused at first to depart and demanded the prisoners to be given up. Superiors or no superiors over them they had come to seize the prisoners and they declared they would not leave till the prisoners had been given over, and one of them was d was dispatched to summon general Mealey himself and his higher generals to come.

"But my dear fellows would you wish to harm little children who are so beautiful as these little girls." caned Iskwell

"All rebels are the All christian dogs are the same to us." Snapped the Simmermani Simmermanians scurly.

"Then why try anything like that t all." said Iskwell drawing both his pistols. "Give back every one of you or I'll fire.

"Now" He added to his prisoners who he befriended when the rebels began to disperse except most of the Sa-pollestinians and Simmermanians who besieged the tent. "They are beisgeing the tent and we will have to talk the matter over".

"Well I never wasso terrible" surprised in my whole life." Gasped Angelina fanning herself wit h her hat while her sisters looked as surprised as she herself.

"or I" Exclaimed the general Isk Chopper. "the Scandelinian leaders will now be during acting general Iskwell himself for assault and battery---but how did itall happen so suddenly?"

"Well" sgan Angelina. "As soon as the excitement reached its height and the rebel entered who shot Jennie I was so scared that I could h hardly breathe. Then after sister Jennie got shot it came to me that if the rebels would be repulsed it would probably come out all right for us after all. I knew no one of us would leave Jennie in such a fix after she got shot so we started---"

"or little girls always do the right thing in the right place my dear."

"It was lucky the soldier hit the rebel wasn't it." Sighed Jennie. "but I'm rather sorry for the poor Scandelinians who got kicked killed."

"I serve them right I'll say." Growl growled the old soldier heartlessly. "They will make good servers servants for the Devil."

"But who is to take the lead in our escapade." Demanded one of the Abbiesanians turning his gaze reluctantly from the little girl who was wounded.

"This will certainly require thought." Said general Isk Chopper pensively. "Let us all do the thinking.

"I doubt that we can ever escape." Said Violet with a moan and trying to ease her wounded arm.

"just leave it to general Isk Chopper when you went through all this for." said one of the soldiers a d the others nodded complacent ly at the old soldier and began plucking sly wisps of strands from a rug in the middle of the tent floor. For nearly a minute there was an absol absolute silence."

Then the old soldier who had been doing some tremendous thinking, with his elbows on his elbows still on his knees knees burst out exultantly!

"You little girls came a long way and went through perilsuntold to find general Isk Chopper. Why not the general here himself. Why not this reckless n spy as we'll call him. He but general Isk Chopper should lead us through the rebel lines successfully."!?!?

"The very person indeed." Cried the Abbiesanin officer clasping his gloved hands and taking off his read hat he set it very impulsively upon the head of the christian general spy.

"He can make a lovely leader in our escapade." Said Catherine. "He is so kind hearted, jol' jolly and brave. And now we can all get back to the christian armies."

They all looked verytriumphantly at the spy general, but some of the rebels who had been faithful to him snatched off the generals hat and burst into emotion. "Can't leave us behind most amiable general." one of them bogged in a disconsolate tone. "Oh how we shall miss you."

"But don't you see." caned Joise Vivian "you are Scandelinians and if you came to the christian lines they might make prisoners of you instead of treating you as friends. I think you are better off here."

"And my dear boys." said general Isk Chopper putting his arm around one of them, "you being a Scandelinian and even as we call you a rebel might not like to be among us christian soldiers any more than I like being in the rebel lines. Then think—if anything me everything goeswell and you survive the war we can sometime sag each other again."

"And you won't forget us!" Begged the rebels beginning to like the idea after all of remaining wewhere they were.

"Never will I forget you." Cried the general with a very impressive wave. "But don't get naughty like the other Scandelinians are."

"And if we are persued and anything goes wrong and you see us you will help us out same we did you." Q e questioned the rebels uncertainly."

"We certainly will." Declared Violet herself as bravelyas she could" nd if you are prisoners and are within our own encampments and you need us and our help we can surely find some way to help you. We always do what we can for friend and foe alike. and you are some of the good Scandelinians we have met with."

"And if you ever require a wish to leave the rebellion and come over to us. We will do us what we can for you for that too." Exclaimed one of the Abbiesanians pressing their hands.

"All right dear nationals. The one of the good rebels slowly picked up the hat and set it sideiwe on the generals head. "We'll do our best and if we find the scheme ain't what we expected we will leave it at any risk."

"I don't doubt it at all." Said Angelina.

"three cheers for the christian spy and general and his friends. Long live the christian cause itself." Hum ghented the old soldier and everyone among the group of christians fell upon their knees before general Isk Chopper.

"You may have general Iskwells wife too." Chuckled the general winking at Iskwell himself." nd my good Scandelinians." He asked sobering suddenly "will you do your best to prevent further massacresof little innocent children if it isyo in your power."

General Iskwell laughed haughtily in answer and suddenly assumed a look of wart importance.

"We can in my se e command massacres the innocent." He said in a dignified tone. "They don't dare as I won't have it."

The spy bowed too confused and excited for speech.

"Now said the spy general;

"We can all return to the christian front with an easy mind."

"I don doubt that." Said violet soberly.

"You need not doubt anything." Announced Catherine with a little pout. "I have thought it all out. In a few short sentences she outlined her plans.

"Brave for the little girl!" Roared the old soldier and now during the lull of the excitement the little party began in real earnest the preparation for the journey b: back to the christian lines. First the kindly Scandelinians brought them provisions wity with a little hay for the horses secured for them all and general Iskwell packed into the generals pockets a few little scows souvenirs for Violet and her sisters. While this was going on general Iskwell had by means of firing two shots ordered the Cmmrians alone as many as possible to assemble in the tent but without arms of any kind, to leave their weapons in the tent.

Presently the Scandelinians began to come trooping in making the great interior of the tabour tent untill it could hold no more. And they were the fierce Cmmrians at that and e e every one of them looked mean, sullen, and were talking excitedly. One scowled pouted and sneered, and others made faces at Violet and her sisters. It was almost the same kind of company that greeted them at ill-hostile, and sullen but without weapons having obeyed general Iskwells command. The general cheerful and witty in his general uniform of the rebellion, Violet and her sisters and their christian escorts and Isk Chopper and the old soldier smiling happily were all blinking with contentment despite the ugly looks of the insurgents. Not one of the Scandelinians had removed their hats and looked dangerous to command them to.

"This man general Isk Chopper" said general Iskwell pleasantly when everything was more quiet and regarding the sule sullen Scandelinians "Is not really a spy as you supposed as he had sliped into your lines and have been thought to be myself and you are at fault instead because you had allowed him no means to explain himself." He waved proudly in the direction of general Isk Chopper who to tell the truth presented a royal appearance t rather than looking like a general. "It is not possible to allow him to remain with us and so I am going to allow him and his party to go free to night in exchange for a number of Scandelinian officers who were set free by the said general Constantinian Aronburg this morning. An exchange of prisoners you all know is all fair. So I am doing no wrong for as no one can prove him a spy he is at right to be at liberty with the rest here. I am to assume command to nightover you having left the other army near Cmmrinja and with other commands we can hope to vanquish all an enemies who fight us. But these people here I am liberating to night. And I wish t you to agree with my plans and allow them all to go in peace and not be persued wither."

One of the officers bowed and the Cmmrians exh exchanged, troubled and st startled glances and even more fierser looks, but as ₍icknell carefully lifted up his hands they bowed all of them.

''₍h ''Said general ₍icknell with a broad wink at general ₍isk ₍hopper' This is delightful.You all agree with me I see. ₍ow then three cheers for your friendly christian visiters.''

The cheers however were given with no free will and were faint indeed but no one dared oppose ₍icknell. Having arr nged affairs now so s atisfactir satisfa etorily the general ₍dressed his friend ₍isk ₍hopper though he was a Matigani and he a rebel and even thevlittle girls with deep emotio . He shook hands with the Abbisan nian soldiers and wished them evety success and happiness. ₍hen showing them the best way to avoid the terrible ₍immermannians and O mari ans and others outside the whole party walked delibe ately to the company street. ₍he fierce Omarians were still a bit dazed by the turn affairs had taken and stared in morose looks and in sullent astonishment as the spy general, and all his followers including ₍iolet and her sisters proceeded down the company street, hey were all mounted on ₍healer Gargyllian horses giving them by general ₍icknells order.

''Goodbye everybody who are our friends or enemies alike.''Called the little girls to the on looking ₍landelinians.

''₍ood bye.''₍ried the spy waving his hat.

Too stupified for speech the assemblage of Omarians gaped with amusement and regret as the party rode gently and slowly out of the lines. Onward and out of sight went the entire party.

T THE FLIGHT OF THE FUGITIVES.

Holding the reins with the left hand Jennie who rode in front of ₍iolet who held on to her urged the horse on with the skill of an expert horseback rider and several minutes after their start the party of christianshad entone entered the deep black recesses of the woods they had just left in entering the foe lines and on the outskirts of which they had been surrounded and captured. Each one of the christian adventurers rode in a perst linebut in a way that none were close together but even with all the care in the whole wide world it was not possible for them to keep out of sight of l lurking enemies in the darkness. ₍he horse Jennie rode sensing danbe a danger of some sort grunted or nighed plaintively from time to time as they continued onward and the little girl heroines could hear one of the soldiers who was accompanying the ₍bbissanians complaining bitterly in the dark about some strange forms they fancied fancied they saw. .It was pitch dark in these woods for there was no moon and the sky was cloudy it also being midnight or an hour past it at least but by keeping straight ahead in the roadw y roadway they all managed to keep going in the center of the passageways without any mishap.

''₍ow long will it take to get out of these gloomy woods.''Jennie called breathlessly to the old soldier who was riding a horse j just in front of her.

''₍ours and hours.''''₍hrased the old soldier holding fast to his gun.''I hope none of the other ₍landelinians who are remaining in these woods hears us or comes unexpectedly upon us and investigates us.''He added nervously, thinking of the fierce and savage fury of the ₍marians.

''₍h what care we.''₍lustered the ₍bbissannian officer.''Have you so soon forgotten my trusty column of armed men.''₍ut his words were completely drowned in the roar of the treetops as it was a very windy night.

''₍ush''₍arned ₍iolet'' Or.we will be pulled in by the rebels in the woods for we a r are dstill within t he ₍landelinian encampments or at leqst in their lines.''

So almost an hour they continued onward in the pitchy darkness withonly an occasional groan as one or another fancied they saw enemies lurking among the trees preparing to shoot them o down in ambush as it seemed. ₍hen ——then before they knew what was happening the horse who was in the lead of the while whole party crashed into something had way across the road and stumbled and fell throwing the rider headlong.

₍he whole party was almost tripped horses and all.

''Oh Oh''₍asped ₍iolet in alarm as her wounded arm recieved a severe blow from a bough of a tree as She and her horse turned a complete somersault''₍un the other way the rest of you or you will all be injured.''

''Get ready your pistols and weapons quick.''₍risked Jennie herself in fear and excitement.

just then ₍iolet herself finding herself not as injured as she feared and that her horse had rose up again grasped the horses rims be fore it bolted and remounted with Jennie who was limping and as all remounted and removed the ped uliar obstruction which had caused the trouble they all con t continued on again and now being u suspicious went on faster and w faster but l the one on the lead kept kept a good lookk out so so they would not be thrown again if you please to excu

''I believe we are leaving the rebel lines faster thw than we came in. We must be near the end of the woods.''₍alled the old soldier hoarsely.''₍nd someone or some persons seem to be coming tward us in our front on horseback. Look out every one if they are Angelinian rebels.''''''

'Must we keep galloping untill we gall p through them or fight!'' ₍ panted Angelina anxiously.

''₍o by all means.''₍ared theAbbissannian officer and setting his feet harder in the stirrups he drew his sword and the Abbissannians did the same, and one who had a long rope formed it in a lasso and was waited for the strange horsemen to come on.

''₍o off to a hiding place little girls and y andmy column will go ahead and cut an opening through them if they are rebels.''''

₍ith great difficulty the little girls themselves managed to urge their horses into a thin thick mass of tree or under thenthem in the darkest darkest spot, while the speed of the horses ridden by the Abbissannians speedily diminished.

Indeed they finally halted altogether at seeing the strangers halt too

. ₍here was a few minutes of silence and the strangers themselves suddenly disappeared. the Abbissannians s spotting something peculiar did not dare go on at all and soon all wheeled about t and traced rer retraced their steps to where the little girls had gone.

''Are you da there Princesses ₍iolet and your sisters.''₍umbled the Abbissannian officer anxiously.A great slod of earth dee dislodged by the horse going against an a embankment with a dash landed onhis head filling his hair and neck coat collar with mud.

''₍h''₍ared the colonel.''who did that ?''

''It is getting lighter the moon is out.''₍creamed Catherine, and inner excitement urged her horse out of the hiding place followed by her sisters. he Abbissannians having suspected an ambush a little further up the road was about to order them t o follow him when a column of men came rushing up from the opposite direction from where he had seen the strangers disappear and with a roaring yell started pouring a fierce fire upon them which the Abbissannians immediately returned with a will unseating a number of the enemy and dashing through the confused column and out of the woods the whole party of fugitives finally dashed and fairly raced across a little meandow at full speed the rebels being for the moment too confused to persue.

''Welcome to freedom at last.''₍ried the little goils looking happily to ward the direct ion of ₍ederanna ₍un where about a mile or so loomed a long stretch of dark objects which appeared to be tents.

''₍ome christian army, at last.''₍xulted the old soldier, wafing a kiss toward the distant line of tents.

''₍et's get quickly across the meadow before the ₍landelinians catch us and knock us into a cocked hat.''₍asped the Abbissannian officer as he saw a swarm of horse men in grey bursting out of the woods in a perfect column and race for them, for ₍iolet and her sisters in their exsitement at seeing the distant christian encampments had forgotten about t he ₍landelinians they had encountered.

₍ow the little girls seeing the rebels coming toard them ur urged their horses more faster with a shout and the soldiers finally did the same, allowing the terrified wheeler horses to go carefully at first and then faster and faster , and fimally they were going at full speed. A shot was fired by one of the Abbissannians at the nearest rebel on horseback and he and his horse nearing a small ravine dropped and fairly did a hive dive from the top into the ravine like a fancy diver and never moved again. ₍hot after shot was suddenly fired by the others and down from the horse tumbled other ₍landelinians also their horses running on in different directions causing some confusion. ₍ortunately for the fugitives there was a great hay stack not far off and running up to it one of the soldiers knowing whichway the wind was blo blowing threw a couple of lighted matches among the dry hay starting a fire which caused immense columns of stifling white smoke to roll in big clouds for the enemy. ₍he ₍landelinians were in wild so nfusion, cursing, gasping, and shouting, horses reared and plunged, and all started oto move in all directions. A shot was fired by the rebel closest and the horse ₍atherine rode fell both landing in a jumbled heap close to the burning hay stack and they got away from it just in time when a big mass of hay burning like a comet fell where they had been thrown a moment ago. As it happened there was no reconning party of christians in sight, they being too far from the encampment to be seen. ₍he horse though wounded was not lame and had jumped up in a trice and while the party prepared for further flight, some of the horses started going toward the burning haystack to such manch the hay but was led away in time.

''I will make a signal to the Angelinians under general Oman properly when we get near enough.''Said the old soldier.''It is his army encampment we are approaching, and it would not do to allow the rebels ₍ome too close before we get tyere or we are done for. ''

''As for me I shall never leave the ₍ristian lines again unless ordered to do so''

''Said general ₍isk ₍hopper looking anxiously in the direction of the confused enemy who were moving to get out of the way of the spreading smoke clouds.

''I hope not.''₍rowled the old soldier, tenterly examining his torn uniform.

''utif you had not do it general hopper' some of us would have had such love y ace adventuresnnor found the bbissannian friends nd the old and young soldier companions.''aid violet.'' nd what a lot qe a all have to tell to general vivian or fa ov our father and umele.Let's go straght t for the shristian lines. he enemy won't persue for a few minutes now.''

''It's quite a joune journey.''Explained the general to the old soldier who was cleaning his revolver by the help of moonlight.

''O go f where the little Princesses of Angelinia goes to.''eplied the old soldier smiling affectionately at the pretty little girls and straightening iolets ragged hair ribbon which he still wore on his right arm.

''on't forget any of us when we reach the shristian lines dear little vivian irls.''heezed the old soldier putting his head on her shoulder.

''You are a very sentimental dumee for an old soldier.' f doubt whether the little girls will take usto general ivian lines at all.''he bbissannian Abbissannian officer looked wistfully at violet and her sisters.

''go on don't take it so hard.''Cried Violet and her sisters.''youcall are like each of some ones family.''

''It will be very comfortable to go on now.''sighed the general.

''We all shristians are a ju jolly big family of good''shristian dogs.''Said the younger soldier smiling brightly'' nd the shristian ensampments just now are to us the friendliest places in the whole worlds ..''

''''''''ight you are.''''''Said the old soldier''ut let's get started.''He stretched hisotired arms and began limping stifly ward his horse and all remoun n remounted..

''Wait''cried violet.''My wab bandageois undone. on't forget to fix it please.''

''I wish I sould fix it for you.''Groaned Jennie feeling the wound covered bangade around her own little neek.The bandage however was renewe over and the old soldier with folded arms was gazing a bit regretfully towardthe still confused landelinians in the distance the light of the burning haystack lighting the country for miles.

''Thisches been one good brave quest.''he sighed''but now I take it our adventure is over at last.''''''b sently the old soldier felt in his pocket, and drawing ow out his second revolver looked to it to see if it was loaded.
hen taking a small, piece of cracker out of his inside pocket he pop popped it into his mouth. ust before reaching the haystack he had a full handfull of them in his pocket but the others had been lost during the frantic flight.

''hall we use the horses to their utmost against seven lise little Princesses.''He asked, still staring pensively at the haystack.''''hall we please do-----''??? e got no further nor did any of the little girls answer his question. Instead they gave a very loud scream and one of them clutched the generals arm. he others still dismounted though taken by surprise jumped on their horses and one of the soldiers gave a bellow of excitement. From around the opposite end of the burning haystack a solemn small column of rebels had fairly sprung at it seemed and while the round eyed astonishment it rushed tward them swiftly and then could have fought with the little party of christians had they not all wheeled their own horses and them raced straight across the meadow shooting down a number of the Omarians one still remaining in his stirrip stirrup as his horse dashed on kniaking and struggling to get loose. In another seco d he and his horse was out of sight but the rest of the landelinians seperating fat far apart man to man raced.after the fugitives.

''ome back, come back you dirty christian dogs.''Screamed some of the rebels brandishing their sabres furiously. hey were the same rebels which had been stopped by the smoke of the hay stack but who had gotten around by a ruse and sur prised the little party of fugitives.

''I doubt whether we will ever get away from those rebels.''Groaned the old soldier craning his neck for as he looked forward.

''o something. please do something.''egged violet who was bodd bobbing up and down in her saddle as if she was sitting on an earthquaking hi'll from the speed her horse was goi ng. Six of the Abbissannians seperated from the column and racing in another direct ion opened a genera fire upon the persuers shooting down every one they aimed at and caused a momentary confusion at last.

''I'll ride back to t he lines and warn the general that fugitives are escaping and we will train a number of cannon on the meadow.''said one of the persueing officers.

''No , no don't do that.'' oarse roared the superior starting forward again.''o you want us also blown to pieces.''

Onward raced the fugitives and the persuers.

''Oh can't you think of something please.''Cried Angelina herself.''and hurry or we will be all killed. hey are going to hurl lances atus.'' he old soldier put both hands to his head and stared around very wildly. hen with a triumphant wave of his big round purple hat(get your cat, you hat) declared himself to ast.

''he best thing to be done is to seperate.''He cried. ''Quick violet and your sisters. Race off to the left. I and ten soldiers willfollow.The others go to the right.''

ra drawing both his pos pistols the soldier got ready and violet anf her sisters just had time to make the flying fa dash for the other road, and the Abbissannians go on t e the right before the rebels recovering from the confusion was almost upon them, but in a trice both parties had almost disappeared behind a mass of trees and left the astonished landelinians gaping.

''Jennie, jennie.''''wailed violet as her arm pained her again,, as she and her sisters almost crowded togrether in the race for freedom''We are having a pack of trouble with the landelinians. My knees fell all a tremble.''

'' ow don't you littlevgoils worry.''Advised the oldsoldier in a voice of resignation.
''I'm frightened myself and so are the others, but that's because it is all the excitement and gan danger of it all. Queer things happen when we encounter the landelinians,, but if we are careful they will usually turn out all right. hy we are just having a swift ride across the country------that-s alo--h just having a swift ride across the country --that's all.''''''

''I doubt that.''sniffed violet faintly.''We were riding all the time since the beginning.'''

''But think of How od and His blessed mother will intercede for us in time--you just leave all to them and they will take care of us all.''Said the other sou s soldier.....

ut it was no use. s the landelinians had come after them and seemed to catch up with them also having wheeler Gargoylian horses they began to feel dismal.

''I don't want all this excitement unless we are looking for it and expecting it.''obbed Jennie almost broken heartedly.

''Well don't t drown your dress with tears in such a time as this.''Begged the old soldier. ''Say what's that firing I wonder.''?''?''?''?''?

''hat indeed? In the distance a noise of heaving firing was heard and bullets suddenly whistled like a cyclone about the fugitives and before the nine soldiers and violet and her sisters had even time to catch their breath they were borne ahead at full speed by their horses faster a dand faster tward the direction of the christian lines, the horses having taken terror at the sudden firing.

violet and her sisterslinging fast to the rig rins reins with one hand and to the horses manes with another had followed the nine Abbissannians and the old soldier almost to a breakneck speed. At first it looked as if they would never be able to outdistance the landelinians, and it also seemed to be an even tie as it seemed as if the Abbissan landelinians would never catch up with the futitives fugitives so so swiftly were the two foe columns going, but it really was now not long before the fugitives began to gain on their enemies and in several minutes more they were a good many a hundred feet ahead of the wi wildly raging rebel horses.
he noise of the horses hoofs was tremendous.

''Be careful now.''gasped the old soldier stretching his head out to violet she was nearly unseated by the bobbing up and down she was doing on the saddle.
''Can't we all stop the reckless landelinians by giving them a volley!''

''Let us draw our swords and-fightthem.''Commanded the officer in lead of the small party of Abbissannians''and we will cut our way to freedom.''

Violet with diffiouly managed to keep her seat, while the landelinians had slowed down, and the Abbissannians had drawn their sabres. But violet and her looked looked thrmed.

''is dangerous to fight them now.''Gasped Jolee.''It's safer to race u on Will we come near the christian camp to be helped.''

''But what shall we do then!'' cried violet in deep distress''the persuers are Omarians. Maybe if we falut a white handkerchief we can keep the rebels from firing on us for they may yet.'' he old soldier jamming his hat down so it would not blow off,nodded approvingly and one of them drew a white handkerchief and handed it to the old soldier.

when the soldier flaunted it to their delight the rebels suddenly slowed down and the Abbissannians did s also both columns however going equal speeds as neither had halted. It was not an act of surrender on the part of the fugitives. It as a ruse to prevent the rebels from opening fire t such short range which would surely be fatal.

just then however the little white handkerchief which had been floating merrily about though held in his hand slipped from beneath his fingers and fell straight down to the road. t violet and her sisters never missed it and quite unconscious of such acalamity anxiously ta ked over their predicament with the old soldier. They both decided that the best plan was to keep headed only for the christian lines which was much nearer now, and when within sight were to fire three shots or yell for aid and have the christians come to release them from their horrible time.

''I'm sorry we got you little girls tangled up in all this row''said the old soldier after they had went onward for some time in silence''but this makes us understand the nature of the rebels doesn't it?''He winked broadly at one of the soldiers.

''o it does.''Said the Abbissannian soldier jovially.''I'm an Abbissannian you know. Yet think we should not have gone down the meadow in the first place.''

''got gone across the meadow.''questioned violet.''hat meadow? I did not how we were goin across one.'' he Abbissannian soldier carefully explained how the whole column h had gone across the meadow and how the rebels had persued them all the way across.

''so that's is what started all this trouble.''Exclaimed Angelina in surprise beyond describing.

''Alas yes''.Admitted the old soldier.''I never felt so excited in my whole life.''He finished solemnly''a adventurious country this war stricken Calverinia.''

''Ishould say it certainly is''Chuckled another of the Abbisanniams.''But is it not almost time we were reaching the outskirts of the christian lines violet?''

''I think we are going in the right direction.''Answered the little girl''but we can still continue onward to be sure.''

''Not so fast. Not so fast.''Warned the old soldier.''You know how Angelinian sentries are when they hear fast approaching horses. They will fire without warning.'' and he looked nervously in the direction of the christian camps they had last seen but now which was not within view.

suddenly they came around a turn in the road.

''There's the christian encampment.''Cried the Abbisanniams all at once.

''And there's a bunch of soldiers coming toward us on horseback from the camp.''

Screamed Hettie Vivian peering forward delightedly.''And they are all Abbisanniams too.''

She pointed her finger in the direction she indicated when a sharp blow from an unseen bough of a tree hanging too low almost jerked her off her seat. They were going faster and faster than even they knew of so to be carefully they all went to the middle of the road and soon came within sight of the first picket line of the christians.

''Come on along and meet the main army of us christian dogs.''Roared the old soldier defiantly at the distant enemy who was still following as Violet's bandage again was coming loose but she suddenly clutched him in alarm and looked at him reproachfully.

''Don't yelll that please.''He gasped.''They have stopped racing after us so swiftly but if you shout that and they hear you they will all shoot us to death.''

Violet and her sisters looked at each other in dismay. Surely enough the rebels had heard the defiant shout and were coming swifter than ever were their horses hoofs roaring like thunder along the ground and it was now all they could do to hold their own with the persuers for the stubbornrebels was trying to catch up I close enough to open fire. Violet and her sisters kept shouting so that when they drew near the picket line the christian guards would not fire at the first approaching party. They had raced quite a distance and despite all the noise and clamor , the shouting of the children, and the roar of the gal galloping horses of both sides, the Angelinians did not seem to hear anything, and as it was now growing daylight Violet and her sisters could see that the encampment was all astir but most of the guards did not see or hear their approach yet, nor had any of the others seen their singular arrival.

''Hello.'' called the old soldier.

''Help help''''Screamed Violet and her sisters as the rebels appeared within a hundred feet of them and prepared for firing. But yet all the guards were so attentive among their own work that they still did not hear either the cries of the little girls, the shout of the soldiers or the noise of the approaching horses. So the Abbisanniams in desperation drew their pistols and fired almost point blank at the nearest rebels. First one then another was shot from their horses and although the soldiers with tears in their eyes begged the little girls to go on and leave them to fightthe persuers alone they would not do so but all their might but did not draw their own guns as they loathed to sh oot unless they had to. Just as it looked as if the whole party would be overtaken and surrounded by the persuing Glandelinians one of the guards happened to be looking the right way and saw the party of fugitives coming and fired three shots into the air.

''Look look''Cried an officer tugging his superiord sleeve.''Why it's the Vivian girls.''

''Yes it is the Vivian girls and a party of soldiers with them.''Gasped general Consentinian Arenburg for it was he himself rubbing his eyes.''It's Violet and her sisters and————''

''Help help''Screamed the little girls again waving their arms wildly. Without waiting another second all the complete celebrities of that part of the christian camp came running toard the adventurers with guns at the ready.

''Somebody take hold of the horses of the fugitives and dismount them immediately.''Cuffed an officer running up out of breath.

The Angelinians seeing that help was needed at once supre suppressed their curiousity and rushed fow forward some taking the horses by the reins and helping the little girls to dismount while their escorts and the rescuers got in the road way and waited for the Glandelinians to come.

''I'm glad to see you have returned.''Said Colonel Yak Sisk solemly ve clasping Violet and her sisters each in turn in a fond embrace. The other soldiers led off the horses toard the encampment and Violet and her sisters sank down exhausted on the grass .

''General Canna himself pressed forward.

''What does it a' all mean little girls. Here in the world did you come from in this fas i fashion.''Asked the general staring in blank amazement at the strange spectacle before him.

''And who are those persons coming down the road yonnder.''Asked another officer indicating another road pushing forward importantly.

''They don't look evil to me.''Sigled one of the soldiers.

''They ain't the they are the other party of my friends who seperated to divide the persuers.''Said Violet almost indignantly for the others were too shaken about to answer.''They are Abbisanniams''

''Ah I see''Grasped the officer.''A case of when little girls are persued by Abbisanniams by mistake.''

''So you are wrong' Said Jemmie.''We were persued by rebels. I wonder why they don't come.''

''I guess they realized how near to the christian lines they were and so walked si miesly back the other way.''Laughed one of the soldiers.

And who would you believe it from somewhere there burst a perfect shower of blossoms of all colors which came tumbling down over everyone. Before they had recovered from their surprise a new columns of christians came up headed by a handsome looking general. It was general Hanson Vivian himself.

''Oh ''Cried the little girls as he hugged them each impulsively''We are so glad it is you we are with.''

''Are my nieces all right.''Asked the general anxiously noticing that two of them were in bandages.

''Good as ever despite some little wounds.''Announced Violet bravely and indeed all traces of fear and excitement had disappeared from the fugitives.

''Violet.''Cried general Cannonia himself.''What does it all mean!''

''We rely that we went to look for general Yak Hopper and bring him back again and that Violet and her sisters has succeeded in rescuing him and even us.''Said the old soldier coolly calmly.''

''And he is a good brave spy man--so there.''Cries Cried Angelina proudly.''Meet him as he is for he has great information concerning general Manleys movements.''

Then as all of them stood gaping at the spy general;

''Oh Uncle''Said Violet''We have so much to tell.''

''Begin. Begin.''Cries the general''For everything is so mighty mysterious.''First a strange object and two strange , lights last night shot through our encampments with a dull booming and stop just abo above my own headquarters and there they remained all night although I had tried every means to break them lights. Then two little noises of mine and yout your two columns of escorting soldiers drop in with a strange company.''

''Oh s we don't know anything about those lights.''Gasped Jemmie as the general finished speaking.''My Rosemary Beads.'' She felt hurriedly in her pocket. ''They're gone.''

''It must have slipped out of one yo of your pockets down the road during our exciting race and now we you will never see them again.''I'm afraid'' said the old soldier in an an agitated voice.

All All of this seemed like greek to the others but nevertheless when Jemmie begged general Hanson to secure for her another pair of Rosemary Beads he did it without question. No sooner had this been performed when there was a loud crash and everybody started on a run for the direction of the sound general Hanson ahead of all the rest. As they went on Jemmie suddenly found t found the Rosemary Beads lying in the grass and picked them with with a cry of delight. Three rebels had been captured belonging to a party of the former persuers and in trying to escape they had fallen into a huge cluster of rose bushes and though badly scratched and frightened were really unhurt. They were disarmed in a jiffy.

''I doubt that I'll ever like any of the christian dogs.''Answered t one of the three rebels, l lurching forward with his two comrades.

''You christian dogs might have been more careful.''Growled another of the prisoners glowering at Violet and her sisters.

Indeed the whole camp was so overjoyed to see to see Violet and her sisters again that the scene could not be describe. And now that their adventures were really over for a while at least that explanations were to be made by t he little girls. sitting on the top step of general Hanson Vivians headquarters, while with all of the officers around them and crowding below Violet and her sisters told the wonderful story of their experience and of Yak Hoppers attempt to spy on Manley. When their breath gave out the old soldier or other friends tookup the tale himself and as they all realized how nearly they had lost their little girl friends and their jolly old old comrade so many of the soldiers shed real tears. Indeed we glad he was to see his own comrades that general Yak Hopper hugged one man after another.

''Never leave us again please.''begged Violet and her sisters, and the general crossing his heart promished that he never would.

And what a woodme they gave all of the returned friends. Altogether it was too delightful to relate here. Only general Hanson Vivian seemed disturbed. During the strange recital from Yak Hopper of Manleys intention near Cedarnino General Hanson had grown quieter and quieter and finally with an embrassed laugh had hurried inside the building accompanied with a number of generals. He went directly to his own room and seating himself at a de desk opened a large book -some other than a big Geography book. Leafing over one page after another he came to a point which rec'd or which showed him exactly how Manleys position would be situated. Then general Hanson Vivian wrote;

''HIS GENERALSHIP MANLEY WILL TO MORROW MORNING ATTACK MY LINES AT SIX SHARP. MUST PREVENT THIS BY ATTACKING MYSELF.''

Then flipping over several pages he wrote carefully at the end his plans and then held a council with his generals and prepared for action for the following morning.

Meanwhile outside Violet and her sisters were distributing little gifts they secured from the rebel lines. There were silver medals on gold chains for every officer they knew and liked and silver s i slipper for Gertrude Angelina and Jennie Turner and other articles for every one else about. Violet presented Gertrude and Jennie Turner also with a pretty book in latin. Next they were all curious too see general Nick Chopper and while they were all crowded i around him general Hanson was busy with his plans.

"how us your excellency where Manley is situated by the map." begged one of the generals.

Immediately the general po pointed. The general had removed his hat and was standing by his table, to the great awe and delight of the whole assembly of generals, and a host of boyscouts were pushing in at the doorway.

"How does'nt that look as if dreadful carnage is coming to morrow?" Asked one of the boys in alarm. "I knew general Manley was there."

"I wish we could hear what general Hanson is saying." said the boy. "Oh do look at general Omm."

The general mentioned was standing on general Hanson s right side scowling horribly.

"I think we can hear if we listen carefully." muttered one of the boys. Listening carefully they heard general Omm declaring that the whole christian line must move forward on the morrow and strike Manleybefore he himself has a chance to strike the christian troops.

The boys drew away in excitement and so did the others. Indeed there was so much to ask and wonder about that it seemed as if the generals would never finish the debatement.

"Let's have a party---an old fashi fashioned party." Proposed Gertrude Angelina when the excitement over thecreturn of Violet and her sisters had died down a bit, and an old fashioned military childs party it was with places for every friend of Violet and her sisters and a special pa table for an genera who had the time to attend . And there were songs that evening, speeches and cheers for everyone, not forgetting old general Nick Chopper himself. At the cheering he arose with an embrassed jerk. "I

"In my left hended pocket" He said gruffly but kindly "There is a quanity of beautifully stained silk silken handkerchiefs and jus ju jewels that general Ingnell had given me before we left I doubted whether they were were good enough for the rebels but I would like Gertrude Angelina and Violet and her sisters to pick out among them which they choose to have."

"Hear, hear" cried one of the officers pounding on the table with his closed hand.

Then everything grew quiet as Gertrude Angelina and Jennie Turner told how the with the help of boyscouts had went out on a good scouting tour of their own during a battle between general Hoppers Munchkinians at Cederaine three two weeks before and the Angelinians under general Turner? Then they finished each having taken turns, the spy general sprang up impulsively!

"I pray you lovely ladies of Angelinia please never trouble your heads about spying on the enemy again. From now on I will see to it you will have lots of boyscouts to do the scouting for you and Violet and her sisters will be your good assistances and guardians every day necessary."

At this the applause was certainly tremendous.

"To

"Ye nine children of Angelinia,
Intensely full of courage and great vim;
Will command boyscout d companies for us/
And the boys heroism will take care of them."

haunted the old soldier who was becoming more excited every minute.

"Well" Said Gertrude Angelina with a smile when everybody had fasted and talked to their hearts content "In everybody happy now!"

"I am" cries the old soldier. "per here safely among my friends again I'm perfectlly comfortable."

"We are also" cried Violet putting her arm around Gertrude who sat next to her. "or we have found our old friend an and made many new ones."

"I'm also happy" ofi cried the little girl Jennie Turner "Because there is no wrong to our good cause and I am still my own girlish self."

"As for me" said general Nick Chopper "I am happy for I have served the vivian girls, gal ans gallantly, gone on a great qu quest with them, and help them get away from persecu s and put many a Munchkinian to the place he belongs." Angelinia and her holy cause forever."

Violet and her sisters were anxious to get home back to general Hansons army and they promished Penrod and Gerald Starring that they would soon return some time again as they did not wish to stay in the army much longer as they wished to go back to their fathers or uncles army before they withdrew themselves to Angelinia Agathia or Dorothy Gale. The next evening after the trial or courtsmarshall of the spy the little girls begged general Evans to allow one of them to telegraph to their fathers headquarters or at least get in communication with him if possible. The general reluctantly but readily granted their wish. He took the children into his telegraph room and said;

"Telegraph as much as you wish my little dears and you may find out what you wish."

Soon Violet who telegraphed and who recieved an answer found that general Hansons army was still entrenched at Vivian Hicksy but Hanson and general Robert Vivian were already at Angelinia Agatha and they also learned that many of the other great generals like Concentinian Aronburg and others had gone with them and that many of the generals were dressed in mourning because so many fell in the battles of Jennie Vivian.

"Really" Said one of the little girls anxiously. "We must get back to Angelinia Agatha as soon as possible to rejoin our own friends and relations."

The two boys also wanted to accompany thelittle girls to Angelinia agatha and although he or his friend did not find anything necessary to do just then the news of general Hansons intentions made him and hid g his friend long to get to Angelinia Agatha too.

General "General Evans army is a fine division of troops and I like all the soldiers and generals in it." But t old Violet and her sisters. "But the fact is Penrod and I don't seem to fit in Evans army as he has no boyscouts and so my friend has been n begging me to go home ever since. So if you little girls can fix a way so we can accompany you to Angelinia Agathia We will be much obliged to you."

"We can do it easily." Replied Angeline. "To morrow morning we are headed for The town of Omm first and then we will all go to Angelinia Agatha."

That last evening indeed was so del g delightful that the two boys or the little girls could never forget it as long as they may live through the war. They were all together in the prerr pretty room of the great general and the general did many things to amuse them, the Vivian girls told many stories of their recent experiences since their services in the army, their times at Norma Catherine, and in Andrean, their spying excursions and other things and then sang some songs in pretty voices indeed and everybody laughed and had a good time. then one of the generals finally danced ax a jig to amuse the whole company after which general Evans himself related some of his adventures with the enemy during the battle of Jennie vivian at the part where it extended to Home run and Eve Creek and where the most frightful onslaught of the enemy had been repulsed with finaly annihilation. The orderlies served delicious refreshments to those who wished to eat anything and when the bed time of violet and her sisters and the boys arived the company of generals and friends seperated after exchanging many friendly sentiments. Next morning they all assembled for the finalyparting and many of the officers and army courtiers came to look upon the last impressive army ceremonies. Violet and her sisters on their beautifulc p captut captured Gargoylian horses with the tw two boys accompany ing them on their own bade all their friends a fond goodbye.

"You must again sometime." Said the general and the little girls promished they would if they found it ever possible to do so as they could not tell what would turn up at this time of the war when it was growing so very fierce. But general Hanson and his brother need us girls and the boys to help them through the boyscouts and other work." Violet added "So I can't be very long away from them."

Violet and her sisters wore their own normal cartridge belts and were armed with their own guns and when violet and her sisters had kissed the general and his officers farewell and had made their wish the little girls startred off under an escort of horses and disappeared with the boys down the snow crusted road in no time.

"Where are we headed for now!" Asked Per Penrod rather bewildered by the suddeness of it.

"Off to Omm town" Returned Violet with a smile.

"I and my friend are surely much obliged for your kindness little girls" said the boy "and am very grateful to you for the time you saved my life and helping us home again to Hansons lines after all the good times we have had despite the grim business of war. I think this is the loveliest country of the world but not being with our our boyscout companies we felt we ought to be where we belong and that's with general Hansons command. So we bid good bye to general Evans at last."

Suddenly he gave a s start and rubbed his eyes. At his horse and he himself and the little girls were all galloping along a well known road. Just ahead of them were their escort of soldiers and a friend that knew the boys so long had come up to greet them the general having come with uplifted arms and wide open mouth staring in amazement.

"Good gracious. Its Penrod and Gerald." He exclaimed "Where in the world Have you been my lads ad little girls."!"

"Why in general Evans lines." Answered Violetwith a laugh.

"It was general Roswell Buster Johnston."

CHAPTER [illegible] FIFTY THREE.

THE BLOODY BATTLE ALONG THE NORMA RUN RIVER.
THE LIVELIEST TIME THE VIVIAN GIRLS E E EVER HAD.
SATSON TO THE RESCUE AND THE DREADFUL CARNAGE ALONG HIS LINES.
THE GLANDELINIANS PLACED BETWEEN TWO FIRES

The blatt is of Jennie Turner caused the glandelinians under general John Manley to abandon the invasion of Calverinia in that section and vinicity of Jennie Turner and the Calverininns breathed relief. During the excitement caused by the sanguinary battle of Jennie Turner general Shoemannia had become seperated from general John Manleys command and being unable to meet general Kindernine who followed him in any more actual conflicts for a while, had slipped away and retreated northward tward Vivian Wickey. General Kindernine following slowly in a driving wind and snow storm and on the nineteenth of Feburary halted his force near the stream known as Norma Run where general John Manley had been concentrated and where he had reinforced General Shoemannias army and ordered him to halt and reform his troops and prepare to resist the christians before they progressed too far northward. General Kindernine was disgusted for Shoemannia had gotten entirely away after threatening to make a stand and was moving northward for Marcocollio which was near the western Section of Mc-Hollester Run which runs through Vivian Wickey. Even while he was halting general Kindernine had recieved reports that general Satens glandelinians had arived at Joan and Pollyanna with large forces of cavarly, having advanced from the Northwest from Vivian Wickey with also a new and strong support, and general Kindernine hearing this strange news was startled for he realized that Saten was making a movement between him, Shoemannia and Manley. Satens glandelinians had already captured a long line of stockades and was indeed forcing himself between Kindernine and Shoemannia, and moving another army on tward Angeline Richee which was situated about thirty eight miles east of the Western Calverinian coast. It was also reported that the glandelinians were active in and around the city of Norma Angelinia which they had seized without a batte battle the foe force here having recieved heavy reinforcements under general Rheumatism who had advanced by pontoon bridges across the big Mc-Hollester Run, and d and concentrated along a portion of the Angeline Run near where it flows into the Mc-Hollester Run, capturing the town of Junction Mortinnia s after a severe bombardment, and also capturing three fortifications on the east side of the river, after a severe and very decisive battle lasting four days. This was afterwards called the "Third battle of Angelins Run". It had been the most desperate struggle ever fought on those grounds, and over seven hundred thousand was the combined losses on both sides.

General Kindernine was worried over the movements of general Saten and hearing that general Johnston Mc-Hollester had come up to support general Saten general Kindernine sent out three hundred scouts to keep a sharp lookout for the main advance of the foe. As a fact the advance guard of the foe was much nearer than expected, and the little group of scouts not being in great enough numbers to battle with them successfully out in the open made a retreat and reported to general Kindernine of the enemys advance. Immediately he prepared for action and on the following morning general Darger met the advance of Phelans glandelinians and recoiled to a better position. In the meantime general Slater failed to check the onrush of the glandelinian columns under general Ignorance and though his line gave fierce resistance he was forced to give the order for a withdrawel. General Saten however did not wish general Ignorance, to make a movement too far into general Kindernines positions and sent him an order to hold the position he had captured. This order went into effect on the twenty eight of Feburary. While this was going on the Angelinian forces under general Bob, Estrabrook Fai Failens greatheart , Child Mercy and Meldon stood their ground against the wicked Glandelinians under general Ignorance with the utmost success, and soon the foe alarmed by heavy concentrations resumed the attack on the next day with merciless fury, and now the battle of Pollyanna was on in ornest.

Although suffering fearfully from the effects of the heavy Glandelinian attack the christian line maintained its position unbroken, inflicting such heavy losses that the wicked glandelinians were appalled. and compelled to withdraw, though the most erious glandelinian cavarly forces under general Child Murderer continued their attack storming Fai Failens lines. Simultaneously an irrestible cavarly charge was made against another point of the christian line followed by heavy infantry attacks, and now the conflict raged with appalling fury. General Kindernines large divisions under general Clintin after a horrible struggle was pressed back by the foe cavarly which rode among the Angelinians, while soon an infantry force coming to the rescue with the sixth corps and iron brigades were met and repulsed. In the hand to hand fight that followed, the fury of the glandelinians was something awful and general Clinton deeming such a furious assault of the enemy as resistless ore ordered a withdrawel. Tremendous and incessant fighting raged with unabated fury along general Caldwi Caldwells lines and in creased every minutes with redoubled fury as reinforcements steadily arived on both sides.

Glandelinian forces in unknown numbers made a fierce attack crushing a part of Caldwells left grand division, and the foe despite their own fearful losses pressed on with terrific fury just as the roar of one hundred and sixty cannon broke loose, the shells blowing scores of men to pieces and mangling hundreds for a short space of time. But Nevert Heless the attack was not slackened slackened and the carnage became prolonged. Clouds of skirmishers had first swept against the christian lines then the main lines had come on with irrestible fury. Whole monsterous glandelinin Glandelinian columns charged with great energy and by the fury of the onslaught large brigades of Angelinians were hurled back despite their overwhelming numbers and rolled on but general Mc-Hollesters line behind opened a fire that tore the left grand division of the assailants to pieces, and their main columns coming on afterwards were also badly shattered after the terrific collision, and as reinforcements came to the relief of the christians the assailants withdrew at every point. General Goblin was killed and his cavarly division of three hundred thousand men badly crippled. General Daneil Daniel fell riddled by canister at the height of the great struggle and genera General Mc-Hollester Cantler fell to rise no more. General Donald Hanson had his head crushed by a solid shot, and the main leader had a broken arm and leg and a bandage around his head. Kindernine had also been badly wounded and general Bernard Berligan was mortally wounded. All these generals were glandelinians.

This time so far not a single christian officer of any rank had fallen.. The sights of the results was too horrible to witness in detail. General Saten an hour after believing that his right wing was free from any danger massed his reliable batteries of cannon upon Caldwells strong line which was almost shattered en. General Pugnose led the assault covered by these guns his main divisions advancing under a galling fire that fairly bled his columns and even carried all before it. Pugnose soon realised he could not advance in the face of such a fire, and halted untill he could be reinforced. At the same time general Ignorance gathering of his forces once more made a second vigorious assault, and then general Pugnose going on again with fresh numbers met the same continuous storm of fire from the christian lines. First the battalions though torn and shattered essayed desperately to cross the works but an inferno of musketry and cannon opened upon them point blank and then though one was repulsed, the infantry, and cavarly tried it but in vain.

They only met a complete and bloody repusle. General Goodhears divisions recieved part of this same impatious charge but the prompt support of general Lovechild Silverhair saved this part of the line from being rolled up, and though a part of the line had been crushed and broken the rest held, and general Strangleschilds division who had forced their way clean through the christian line was soon badly cut up and routed.

Despite the disaster to the enemy elsewhere, general Ignoramade columns still continued the terrific onslaught all along the line a most cruel sanguinary conflict raging. In the meantime general Killchild was approaching upon the other parts of the christian line the works soon swarming with the purple coats and now as both sides opened a simultaneous fire the scene became exceedingly terrible. The furious glandelinians being at times even more desperate and reckless than usual kept up the assault being fully determined to silence the guns and carry the works. The glandelinians were just as determined to repulse the assailants w which was now going to be a difficult task indeed. On came the enemy s drawing nearer and nearer. The glandelinians made a most terrific charge in double line and which the christian fire could not check and soon these graycoats were swarming over and among the works and up among the guns a desperate hand to hand fight ragibr. The glandelinians however were overwhelmed and cut down like hail falls and the survivers again retreated. Though driven back as they were the glandelinians only rallied and prepared to renew the assault.....

When the enemy came on anew they essayed once more to carry the works and despite their terrible losses the glandelinians charged again and again only to have their columns cut and mangled every time they were repulsed. Finally the assailants finally becoming exhausted withdrew. Toward nev after some change in positions the Christians recieved the first general attack of the battle and within an hour the fighting along the christian line was so heavy and terrible that the enemy were compelled to halt though they did not fall back. Then within another hour general satens batteries were in full action, while now he hastened some of his main divisions to the scene of the bloody bloody action .General Passage's glandelinians encountered a murderous fire from a park of pickson guns which dropped them mangled and bleeding in droves, and the survivors though in masbers of five million were compelled to withdraw to save themselves from annihilation.

Meanwhile the seventh corps came up and the conflict grew more bloody still. General Saten left wing under general Francis Hatchild fell heavily upon Bensons right. Here the battle was extremelyterrific. Tens of thousands fell in every onslaught and charge were made within an hour . general Richee Jicksons glandelinians were the first to reach the christian works and before the deadly fire they fairly went to pieces and richee with a score of other generals fell mortally wounded.

For two hours by new divisions under general Turner the fierce attack was continued. and on the christian works resembled one of the bloody angles at Salverine. Even about fifteen minutes after the c attack commenced general Gaten threw heavier forces against general Kindernines main center which resulted in a far more cruel sanguinary struggle which raged c beyond the terribleat description. One division after another was thrown upon the christian center, but the Angelinians held against the fiercest assaults, and one division after another of the Glandelinians was cut to pieces and hurled back. Heavy forces under general Pemberton federal were thrown also against Kindernines right center with awful vehemence but after marvelious and sanguinary fighting the Glandelinians were thrown back, regiments left where there had been a whole divisions.

seeing that he could not make any impression against any portion of Kindernines army Gaten again withdrew, and there was another lull for about half an hour. After the half an hour was up general Beldones christian line became fiercely engaged with No-good and Killchilds turnsrannians, and here the battle became a roaring merciless deathstuggel deathstruggle .No-Good and Killchild himself was thrown back his whole line line with the greatest vigor, but killchild himself was thrown back his whole line decimated.

At the other point more infantry for the christians arived under general Gallis and they with general Fred Hances divisions held No-goods columns at bay untill the main body of their troops came up to hel in the fierce fighting and then the foe being overwhelmed by christian artillery and numbers also were compels compelled to retreat. A glandelinian general angry because of the stern resistance of the Angelininns resumed the attack in spite of odds his forces das ing with him to a short distance of the works , but he was killed and his whole command shot down. General Kindernine hearing how the battle was turning out sent forces to aid in repelling the foe, while general Henry picknellian arriving on the scene also dividedone half of his forces, sending one half along the road and the other through a partly open wood, where they could strike the enemys flank and thrown the foe into confusion should he attack again. Their coming would not be noticed and they could strike the enemy and surprise the glandelinians on account of some hills which would hide them till the last mov moment, so that while nob was repelling the assailants, and taking all their attention so the others could approach. The other christian forces moved on cautiously but with the greatest excitement, and so sudden was the attack upon the attackers the Angelinians having some on in whirlwind fashion, that the glandelinians were taken by surprise, and for a time there was the greatest confusion. The glandelinians presently rallied howeverand were about to crush the flanking forces with their storming counter attack, when general Hance with his division created a diversion and caused more confusion the enemy evidently thinking that the e tire christian army was i upon them.

The rearguard dashed ahead in the wildest dismay, and nob had an opo opportunity, to repulse his assailents and then hurry on after the nemy with a shout. A part of the main body now came to the aid of the rear guard and general Bob's christians realised that they would have to retreat very shortly or be overwhelmed by mere force of numberss. They held a position in the road w where it was difficult for the enemy to get a at them. But soon large bodies of the enemy came rushing on and drove Bob's divisions out of their position. The left section of the glandelinian wave was far in advance durin this tremendous onset and fell upon the two flanking columns simultaneously, driving them back and causing the Angelinians to become panic stricken. Never was an assault delivered with more grander enthusiasm. On Cantons plains not far from general Kindernines position the routed christians made a z stand but were soon driven again into the same hopeless confusion.

The Free Mason line pressed forward their formation being broken to avoid the ghastly heaps while many of the wounded Glandelinians yelled once again like they did at Salverine!

"Look at the fancy dressed soldiers going in to get hell....."

The main leader urging on his men stepped on something soft and yel yelilding. He had stepped on the fingers of a sergeant who rosed to a sitting position and cursed him. The leader stared at the man in horror for he had his face shot and torn away on one side and his words came in a mumbling. Each times the mouth opened le little jets of blood spurted from the holes in the cheek. The charging glandelinians had to step and sometimes leap over large b piles of bodies clad in gray. Mulitudes and mulitudes of men and horses, split and broken trees wheeless wagons, and smashed weapons all lay together in one chaotic mass where everything was e hediously veiled in blood. The advancing force of glandelinians, noticed from the long stretch of purple coats little puffs of smoke which increased untill the whole scene was ov enveloed in a great sheet pierced by countless vivid flashes. Thousands of men were dropping here and there, and more dreadful was the falling men as the unhalting line in gray wont stp stumbling steadily but persistently forward in the face of the storming fire. Many times the fluttering, tottered flags would droop and fall but immediately they were up again..... several several more times they fa fall and rise again . Then with the e charging columns they vanished into the clouds of smoke. A few minutes later little knots of men reappeared at intervals. These increased untill all those who remained of the divisions were in sight, running, some still firing as they slowly fell back, and bands of grimy bleeding swearing men passed by.

and down they went mangled and bleeding. A score of hundreds of shells even burst among the glandelinian cannon dismounting the guns and kil ing their crews to a man. Another force charged forward, the Angelinian guns found the range and thousands of the survivors were benumbed by the terrific uproar. A division of artillery under general Angelo had half of its guns smashed and dismounted, most of the horses were down, either lying quietly, or kicking and snorthing with pain. Fully three quarters of the men were strew n among the carrga carriages in bloody writhing heaps. The survivors so blackened with powder that they looked like negros negroes were steadily loading and firing the remaining cannon, each gun spitting forth its missile, recoiled, was pushed forward, swabbed and again fired. The din was terrific and came in earsplitting detonations. As scores of the guns were exploded simultaneously there soon was not a gun remaining. A shell burst some fifteen yards to Shoemanns left destroying the entire squad of a corporal. Now large platoons of purple clad figures broke from the underbrush and came rushing forward to make a counter attack.

"Hold your fire boys.." poared Shoemann. "Wait untill they are on you. Then give them Hell....."

Shoemanns whole line awaited the approach of the Angelinians. On they came over the sunlight blood bapa bespatt sred fields which seperated the two patches of woodland that sheltered the forces of the purple and gray. Grape, canister and shells from the Glandelinian batteries was ploughing a way through the charging columns, and when within two hundred feet of Shoemanns line they met an annihilating fire at point blank in their very faces. The columns inpurple mangled to shreds, faltered, broke into large knotts, formed resolutely, charged, broke again and fled. Thousands crazed ran on and nto the very line of the graycoats only to be shot down as if in execution. One with bloodshot eyes and p ll pallid face seemed to single out general Shoemann, lunging at him with his bayonet. Shoemann struck blindly back with his sabre, and felled the fellow who lay i as if quite conscious his lips set in a snarl. At this moment Shoemann felt something warm tric kling down his waist. So he himself was wounded. Paying no attention to his hurt he ordered an advance. Then from the opposite woods as his men moved on, shell fire broke afresh untill the region where Shoemanns force advanced became a snarhie. Shoemann fuming over the delay of the relief which had been promished saw a shell burst near general Pictorial and he saw him fall. The shock of another shell dashed him to the ground, but he arose quickly nursing the bayonet wound upon his own arm which had begun to pain him. At that moment another explosion actually threw him some distance into a bush. Confused he scrambled out, screaming, and raging with anger and rage. A wild desire, a wild unseeing desire seized him, and drove him headlong through the trees yelling to his divisions to follow and silence those infernal batteries, but a score of the graycoats had an idea of putting as much distance between them and these shattering smashing shells as possible and they fled. As the main portion of Shoeman s line broke into the open a storm of shells and canister greeted them. General Oreslo was at the head of Shoemanns shattered column who reached the christian lines, and as he rushed across the meadows it seemed as if he was threading upon fleshy forrowed ground, one moment his foot was on level ground, the next upon a mound of human flesh. Tripping he fell heavily uponthe chest of a man an and a jet of blood spattered his gray uniform. Inspired with the threatening success success he ran alone upon that blood stained field, shouted to the men in the far distance to follow, turned and raged at them far in advance, was among the guns of the Angelinians before his men like a hurricane, men struck at him also calling out oaths as they did so, and as if in a delirium he fought back screaming hoarsely. To hi his blood shot sweat filled eyes they appeared to be demons, monsterous gigantic. They battered him with the butts of guns, and the ramrods of cannon. He shrieked and cursed fighting in his turn, like some cowardly rat cornered and pressed too closely. Animal like he snapped and bit at them for what seemed an endless time. Then there was a rush od bodies seemingly everywhere, a maelstrome of clubbed muskets and bayonets, and terrified the Angelinians fled from this raging demon, and then the main columns of gray came up. Picture this great glandelinian general running alone, wounded, falling arising dauntless, fury stricken, charging among the Angelinians, fighting as if he were thirty men, capturing fourteen guns singled handed before the main columns come up to his help, capturing those fourteen guns against nearly a hundred fierce purple coats who tried to down him in vain.

The christian line unable to stand the shock now recoiled, now broken, all disorginazed by the fire of the enemy which reduced many regiments to fragements fragments. General Thomas Federal threw his heavy forces upon general Kindernines right which also stormed with fire cutting the assailants down in great numbers, the survivors continueing the attack though thirty thousand had fallen in killed and wounded within thirteen minutes.....General picksonia Peerless was repus repulsed but Thomas Federal made some success by cutting his pay through some of Kindernines purple wedges and general Zuglers Angelinians met such a heavy fire from the artillery the glandelinians had captured/ that his troops were obliged to give way having lost more than fourty thousand men.

Efforts of the Angelinians to recover the guns were fruit less and each attack had been met with frightful sa slaughter. Having repulsed about eleven fierce mounted attacks, Federal made a further advance under heavy fire from Mo-Hollesters battalions and despi the severe losses they sustained general gatenics glandelinians made a desperate storming at attack on the small crested position commanding the Table land of Norma Run. The glandelinian efforts at this time to capture these at all costs was hopeless and again tens of thousands were si shot down for every onslaught, and a long line of men two miles long or in extent was blown to pieces by a storming shell fire.... In the meantime other christian commanders heard the sound of the storm of battle and from a knoll saw that nearly all of the christian forces within their view, was falling back, and through thick clouds of drifting smoke they could occasionally see that the line of purple coats which was posted behind a breastworks of st one walls and a fence some four hundred yards before them was already reduced to a few hundred, and were recoiling the enemy pressing on furiously yelling like savages..... ''To their rescue....''Shouted general Greatheart who was one of the officers as he started down.''Forward meb.''''

The fresh Angelinian troops rushed forward in perfect waves and soon reached the line that was in danger charging at the foe again and again. but they themselves could not hold the foe back and were obliged to retrew retreat the enemy persueing.

''We must get away or we''ll get surround by thevfoe and captured.''Said Greathreat and Greatheart. to general Lovechild whose men were loading and firing as they retreated.''If we can retreat tward Norma Run woods we will be all right.''

''It maybe so.''Answered general Lovechild.''Ap part of Kindernines displaced columns are retreating through there.''

This was tried and found to be very effective. The glandelinians not being in heavy enough force to meet tn the other christian divisions which were coming to the aid of those retreating did not follow any further, a d Greathearts divisions got away safly.

CHAPTER [illegible] THE FOE ADVANCE AGAIN.

Though victorious in the days struggle gatens whole army did not really porsue as general Kindernines main army had not been engaged and was too strong and barred the way. This enabled general Kindernine to retreat the last division of christians going back to make a stand to cover his retreat. For a time everything went well the christian columns retreating slowly. An hour passed after the christians had started to retreat, and violet and her sisters who had left general Zimmersanns command under the direction of general Hanson to go to general Kindernine and give him company, had already neared general Kindernines retreating armies, when Violet sweeping the fields it being still daylight, sprang up sudde nly on her horse to the surprise of the guardians nearest to her and clapped the glasses to her eyes. In an instant she removed it, wiped her eyes and the glass, and again looked through it, in the same direction, and held it long and steadily in that direction.

''Goodness Gracious.''She gasped.''I believe it is twenty brigades of Omarian hurdes.''

She resolved to watch those brigades which as they became more plainer to her, proved to be the coming of general Raymond Richardson Federals army. And they were heading ri for general Kindernines retreating columns. Jennie at this momentcame up and said:

''I believe believe those are Raymo nd Richardson Federals savage glandelinians. And they will probably attack Kindernines whole army while they are not prepared for battle, or an assault of any kind.''

She looked wistfully at the long gray lines that seemed to stretched away for seventee miles to the right and left. Knowing that poor general Kindernine was in danger of being overwhelmed Violet and her sisters ordered their command of boyscouts to recoil slowly. Many concealed themselves in underbrush having the n intentions to open fire upon the enemy should they attempt to force their way across the glens. The glandelinians however did not press on but halted, but nevertheless general gindernine realized the danger and during the night made a junction with another christian army and prepared to face the new force of glandelinians. It was about three days after the battle of Pollyanna that on account of suspicious actions of the enemy general Kindernine was forced to form his first columns into a solid line of battle protected by considerable cannon and as they began to advance the troops on the opposite bankx banks of a stream known as Andrean Run which flowed into the Norma Run. The whole line of fourty brigades for there were more then twenty now as they had increased in number during the night were close on to the van guard, who crossed the meadows and started on a run in the direction of the christian lines.

''It won't do to let them run over us men.''Said the christian commanders.''We must meet them with all our strength, and let them know that we are here.''

The first body of glandelinians discovering the Angelinians recoiled in a body running backwards to the right. Just then the other advanced columns started forward on the run, and suddenly the whole front line of christian artillery gave the enemy a heavy storm of grape and canister followed by mor mortar guns and heavy artillery the echoe of the deadly volley reber reverbrating back over the hill and the entire advance guard of the enemy threw up their arms and fell prone upon the ground riddled by bullets. Hundreds of men in the main column of the enemy had also been hit, scores were killed outright, and many mortally wounded. The survivi yelled in terror, rage, and pain.with yells of ran rage, confusion, and fury the nearest columns of the survivors rushed on only to meet annihilation. Another column of thevenemy came up in a compact body, a huge fierce looking colonel leading them, each carrying a bayonet, and armed to the teeth. However it happpe ed that these christian troops could stand no further against the enemy as their ammunition had ran out, and as the christians retreated the glandelinian leader yelling defiance ran tward captian ganders of the christian side with his sabre upraised, but one of the Angelinians struck him through the heart with his bayonet bringing him down dead. The glandelinians were in confusion at the fall of their leader but they quickly rallied and made ready to charge and soon came on again a scors of them making for the christian leaders who were keeping themselves well to the rear of the line not wishing to witness the slaughter. The Angelinians rallied around their leaders, and met the enemy with the bayonet and even with pistols. Down went a lieutenant, while more glandelinians leaped about, screaming with pain each having recieved a shot or two.

The score of glandelinians attacked furiously but a man was brought down as quickly as a bayonet could be used and this kept up untill all but twelve men were down. At this moment some more Angelinians rushed to the assistance of their leaders and though they were not with great resistance in less than a minute eleven of the twelve glandelinians were knocked down or killed while five of the Angelinians were only wounded.

THE BATTLE OF ANDREAN RUN.....

Swarming numbers of the enemy swept upon the main columns of the retreating christians the glandelinians rushing on fast and furious/ the Angelinians hammering away with their weapons bringing the foe down in frightful numbers and as Angolinian officer who had some ammunition left leveled his pistol at one of the glandelinian leaders the entire charge entering his head, and blowing off about half of it. The rush of the Glandelinians was something terrific and the christians were being continually continually forced back. The main colwan of the glandelinians had advanced solidly against the ever increasing number of Angelinians who had now assembled three of or fourr four h hundred thousand strong and again they rallied and tried to make a stand, and check the charge of the glandelinians. The solid line of the foe pushed on with a steady tramp which showed plainly what admirable soldiers they were. Nevertheless the Angelinians continued to keep up a fierce resistance for several minutes, but again the enemy charged so gallently that the Angelinians again began to give way. The glandelinians then charged during the worse of the confusion and with unbroken ranks sweeping a good part of the christian forge before them. Firearms seemed useless against such a solid front of bayonets but the glandelinians despite facing superior numbers speedily swept the christian columns with charge after charge untill five hundred more lay outstretched on the snow.

''charge on.''Yelled the Glandelinian leader''

A five hundred thousand bayonets in an unbroken line three miles long was a terrible sight to see and again the Angolinians fell back before the foe. With triumphant yells the glandelinians still pushed on after the retreating christians.

''charge on.''Shouted the leader.

And the five hundred thousand glandelinians now having thirty thousand down charged in three solid lines with their bayonets fixed. Such a bristling wall of bayonets the Angelinians had never seen before but still they remained firm compact lines as they retreated slowly though their losses were becoming terrible.

Immediately in front of the Angelinians under colonel Frander nearly seven hundred Glandelinians were attacking despite the Angelinians being two times the number of the foe, these christians trying to save their leaders we from assassination, charging in a solid square three deep with an empty space between the four lines.

With a bristling wall of bayonets in front of them the glandelinians charged and the poor christians not able to resist the wall of glandelinians that swept upon them were [illegible] inually with such irrestible force were compelled to make a swifty swifter retreat being finally swp swept away like chaff before the wind untill supported by Colonel Bernards rallying christian column who resumed their resistance under cover of a high stone wall.

[illegible] the artillery was in number, his [illegible] ... [illegible] ... the christian officers [illegible]

The enemy in the face of the Angelinians forced a crossing of the Pandora lines but not without serious losses and also made very heroic efforts upon general's Mc-pollesters and Mc-p horionsons large columns pressing forward in the face of a tumultious ring of bayonets for the stone wall, and now the fighting became more desperate. Bayonets and sabres were crossed in mortal combatand it was crash, and a terrible scene for a few moments. The superior numbers of the Angelinians did not prevent the foe from overcoming the Angelinians defending the stone wall who had held this position with great tenacity. They had been able to storm the enemys lines with big rocks, and clods of hard dirt, and those still having ammunition had been able to discharge their muskets ten times into the advancing columns. As the glandelinians swept over the wall to the surprise of all a more overwhelming force of Angelinians suddenly appeared to the right and the bloody fighting for the possession of the stone wall was fought over by the troops charging back and forth presenting a spectatole of horror without a parellel. During all the time the con verging fire of both sides had become so terrific that scores of trees were cut down by the injies alone. Several batteries which attempted to get into action on the christian side were completely dis disabled and thrown into a disordered mass, by the drivers and horses being killed and the hundreds of the bodies of those who had fallen killed or wounded were riddled by scores of bullets. The ground became so thickly covered with the dead and wounded that it was impossible to walk over it without stepping on the bodies and the smoke of musketry was like a pall. Here and more of the Angelinians had appeared commanded by general Quincy Evans and the foe gradually desisted for a while.

About two hours later a very strong force of glandelinians had again crossed the Mc-pollester and Pandora railroad tracks and made a daring onslaught upon the christian again and indeed the sudden onset of the foe was so terrific that one whole brigade fell back slowly untill a christian battery opened upon the charging glandelinians. It was indeed a complete surprise and the line of assailants was broken and scattered, by the concentrated gunfire. within twenty minutes more eight hundred and ninty nine thousand glandelinians fell before the continuous blast of artillery For eighteen minutes the glandelinians continued the attack despite this storm of artillery, but the christian line fairly bristled with bayonets. After this repulse of the foe the Glandelinian cavarly along with fresh infantry was soon ordered to make another charge.

General Baldwinson was the first to cross the works on the extreme left. He was quickly followed on the right by general Grossmann, groseon, Malverline cainties and by Gallionianroian in the center. General Jensin also joined in the charge. The artillery increased its storm of fire but the gray lines dashed forward upon the Angelinian troops who fell back and rallied behind general Jallions battery and general Noligons brigades in the narrow strip of timber. The glandelinians coont inued to advance and took possession of the ground from which the Angelinians had been driven. As the christian line broke and recoiled under the iron storm of the captured guns one battery alone under general Joseph Stanley stood its ground in the deserted fei field. Stanley was so intent onsmashing his foes that he took no heed at all of the facts that the rest of his line had rei retired. The guns by his order were even pushed forward by hand and poured canister again and again into the advancing glandelinians, while the general sat on his horse and urged his men to keep their guns going. The Angelinians stuck valiantly to theguns loading and firing, when the glandelinians were so close that their faces could be seen.

Then as the Free Mas Masonic lines lurched forward with fixed bayonets the brave general indeed saw he was alone in the field. His survivors fired three more charges of canister with great effect, and then the drivers mounted and galloped away untill the cheers of the glandelinians ringing in their ears grew deafening, for though enemies as they were, the glandelinians always prais praised such bravery. The general was the last to leave the field and when he had ridden fifty yards he looked back and saw the glandelinian flags already fastened on the carriage of a demolished gun.

After this battle kindernine withdrew with his forces tward the south and then moved northward untill on March 11th he had consentrated close to the town od Lackawana and here he prepared for another battle. Lackawana is a small villiage located in this story on the banks of the Mc-pollester Run thirty seven miles northeast of Norma Catherine.

The battle of Lackawana.

The fighting along general kindernines right wing during this battle which had reformed was more severe and sanguinary than Andrean Run. But however the glandelinians had driven the Angelinians in front of the lowsf lower line of rifle pits and followed them so closely that the glandelinian and christian troops went over the line of

at the same time. Many of the Angelinians were captured had sent to the rear under the fire of their own friends. Those who were not captured retreated, and were pers ued, the retreating hordes between friends and persuers, thus causing the Angelinians to fire high to avoid killing their own men. On that occasion the foe soldiers nearest the christians were in the saftest position a without waiting for orders or stopping to reform the glandelinians moved on to the second line of works over that and for the crest of low hills. The fire along Evans christian line which extended two miles was terrific, cannon and musket balls filling the air as thick as a flurry of snow. The persuit continued untill the crest was reached, and soon the brave glandelinians were climbi g climbing over the christian barrier at different points, but here was a part of the main christian line and two thirds of the enemys line was withered before the deadly fire that met them, and one of the glandelinian columns was scathed or scattered like autmu leaves in a windstorm.

But heavier columns soon swarmed up and a fiercer attack began. The noise of the firing became deafening and the air was filled with dense volumes of blue smoke, which rose like beautifully t inted clouds. Along parts of kindernines works there was for three hours without pause a deafening roar of musketry and cannon which made the ground tremble, and the hills seemed to delight in rolling back the sound, again and again. A ts At terrific speed general Raymond Richardson federal galloped recklessly forward urging his men on.

The bullets whistled around the daring general and a shell exploded so close to him that a fragment furrowed through the skin of his steed. But the general was unhurt, and he galloped on followed by his survivors, and the Angelinians met the charge of the glandelinians bravely the soldiers fighting with the fuy fury of desperation. On pressed the glandelinians, the gallent men under Federal rushing forward seemingly into the very jaws of death. In the midst of the strife wherever the fight raged the hott est, general Federal could be seen fighting with all the courageous heroism of his nation.

Wit h the greatest fury the Angelinians dashed themselves against the seried columns of the Sia delinians with as little fear as if they were playing battle. The struggle was deadly and a part of Federals left was forced back with heavy losses. The gallent glandelinians had been fighting against many times their number, and though the christian line held like a rock they again regained the attac but were forced back and these repulses instead of discouraging the glandelinians only made them flyin into rage and again resume the attack with redoubled fury. The Angelinians as usual f u fought with savage fury. Through the lines of christians the glandelinians again charged spreading death and destruction . Still the Angelinians fought furiously, hurling the assailants out of their works with a loss that was more fearful, and as all the christians now appeared general Federal wiyhdrew his columns and then reformedhis men, and to again resume the onslaught. On came the glandelinians anew at least one hundred thousand of them making themselves press present before the very christian works. All the christian guns were discharged twwo twice making greater havoc among the attacking glandelinian columns but instead of discouraging them this only caused the glandelinians to become almost wild with rage and they only increased their speed and came charging upn the christian lines once again yelling like demons.

"We had better retreat now" Said one of the christian commanders. "Start with the guns colonel and my infantry will cover your retreat...."

The colonel gave the order and the artillery men leaped onto the back of their horses and started from the position at a swift pace while the infantry line cocked their muskets and waited for the enemy to come within range. Still yelling like demons the glandelinians came on their officers brandishing their sabres, and when they were within musket range the Angelinians took taking careful aim opened a withering fire and all at once a thousand glandelinians went down dead and wounded. The survivors however dashed on with wilder yells firing as they came on and scores of the Angelinians fell all along the line. Again the Angelinians opened fire with crash and roar the shots doing great execution and as each Angelinian picked his man deadly nearly three thousand foes went down. Then the Angelinians wheeled and ran down the slight slopes giving utterance to cries of defiance and waved their hands. The glandelinians reached the top of the crest just as the Angelinians reached the lower hills and the foe opened fire strewing the field with dead and wounded Angelinians.

The whole column retreated but two hours later the foe began to press them closelt closely and as the con endor halted his artillery force which was in the rear and took up a new position on the top of a high rise of ground, the artillery being put into place and loaded with grape and canister. Closer and closer came the Federallians being the advance guard of Federals main command. They formed like some huge monster of the serie serpent family, the marching men moving with that like regularity that seemed like one thing instead of being made up of scores of thousands of individual parts. On came the glandelinians drawing closer and closer, and the officers of the gunners gave the order.

"Be ready to get away with the guns instantly be when the foe get too near." one of them was heard to say to one of the under officers who had charge of the horses attached to the limbers. Then the infantry officers told the men to cover the retreat of the artillery as soon as they withdrew. Shrewd as was general Federa l he did not think that the artillery would bombard his troops again but he was speedily deceived however. The christian officers saw that the time had come for them to begin work so they ordered the artillery men to open fire. first fifty guns boomed loudly, so close together in their seperate reports as to produce a continuous roar and the shells went tearing through the line of grayocats with great effect mangling three hundred men as they burst. Instantly all was confusion among the Glandelinians especially among their first columns, as they had been taken wholly by surprise, but now they recovered swerved their course and charged tward the high rise of ground in strong force dashing forward at the best speed of which they were capable, and all the artillery men worked at their guns like beavers being swift and sure. The guns were quickly recharged and then their gunners taking aim at the advancing force of grayocats again opened up and right through the lines of the advancing force went the shells, grape and canister and on down down among the soldiers of the main line, the missiles doing a double service and many hundreds of the gray coats went down mangled and bleeding, dead and wounded and dying together. But with wild yells of rage the glandelinians dashed on already reaching the range of fifteen yards being determined to capture the daring Angelinians this time or at least inflict some damage damage upon them. The christian officers knowing that one of the batteries was close to the enemy ordered those in charge of them to retreat to better cover and the men obeyed mounting the horses and riding away dragging the artillery after them hile the infantry under generl general Richard lader got ready to receive the enemy being eager and excited, but cool enough so that they would be able to fire with gre great precision.

There their excitement was more like enthusiasm and never interfered with their effectiveness. The glandelinians came closer and close but were soon near enough, to make the deadly work possible on the part of both the infantry and artillery still remaining.

All at once the whole line fired the noise being earsplitting and deafening, the volley of the infantry being more f effective than the artilcery artillery just withdrawn, then the artilery which had remained and hich had been silent, the men having taken careful aim broke loose and at least four hundred glandelinians went down dead and wounded at one discharge.

All of picks infantry men were dr dead shots and would have brought down almost as many men as there were bullets but for the fact that in aiming in many instances two or sometimes five or six Angelinians took aim at the same graybask, and thus the man in question fell pe pierced by more than four or five bullets. If ever there were angry men it wa was then. The glandelinian survivors were wild with rage, and giving utterance to yells of anger and threats regarding what they would do, they came dashing on with renewd energy and speed.

''Kill the vivian girls if they are among the Angelinians.''Cried the glandelinians in a rage.''Yes kill the vivian girls.''

''W ipe them off the face of the earth.''

''give them no quarter.''

''Kill the vivian girls..''

Such were few of the cries given utterance to, but the cries and threats threats could not frighten the little girls had they heard them, and neither they could not be frightened by mere words or actions either. All the cannons were again loaded and discoarged almost simultaneously and again a stream of shells and canister tore through the lines of the foe inflicting more terrible damage scores of ranks being killed of or wounded. The survivors continued to dash on and had gone nearly half way up when the cannons roared again and a shower of grape and canister tore down their ranks again killing and wounding hundreds more. The Angelinians who had charge of battery number two quickly hitched the horses to the pieces and moved away down the slopes as rapidly as possible, while the whole line of infantry blazed away again and again with their withering storm of fire firing volley after volley in quick endless succession. Horrible damage was done by these dest destructive volleys and now another line of the christians being too near the enemy withdrew to better cover many encoushing themselves behind trees, rocks and bullocks and blazing away as fast as they could load and fire bringing the grayocats down as fast as they came within range. Every volley rang out loudly and following them went up screams and moans of pain and agony from the myriads who had fallen wounded. Hundreds were killed outright. On came the Glandelinian survivors their commanders ordering them to charge bayonets. The christians kept up a galling fire continually and the heavy losses demorilised the foe and they paused and stood hesitatingly, and the Angelinian officers seeing a good chance to get in an extra blow cried;

.''Up with your muskets men and charge the Free Masons.''

The Angelinians grabbed their muskets and dashed down the slope twrd the foe setting up a yell that was well caluculated to dis disconcert the foe. Then they were upon the enemy and it became a desperate hand to hand conflict with the advantage however on the side of the Angelinians as they attacked with such fury that the demorilised glandelinians could not stand their ground and the front columns turned and fled at the to of their speed.

''Quick .''Cried the christian officers.''We will take advantage of the lull, and get the guns trained and give the grayocats a reception they are not looking for.''

This was quickly done and the gunners opened fire even before the foe got ready to resume the attack. Fifty shells went tearing right through the glandelinian columns the explosions mangling hundreds. Wild yellswent up. t from the glandelinians and a cavarly force lashed their horses forward at top speed being eager to get at the christians and avenge the death of so many of their comrades. The other guns then let fly and more shells went right n into the midst of the troopers, scores being unhorsed scores more being killed and hundreds wounded, and many horses were brought down also. The officers then ordered the gunners and infantry to retreat which they did.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE BATTLE OF MAXWELL, AND INCIDENTS OF THE WAR WITH KINDERNINES ARMY.....

Not long after the slight action at Lackawana the whole of general Kindernines army had recieved heavy reinforcements and so again he moved forward and concentrated in full force along the banks of Norma pun centering his force near the town of Mildred Maxwell and general Saten seeing this reported the startling occurance to general Federal.

''The christians are getting their forces away from one point as quickly as possible, retreat o from me on purpose not because they are beaten but because they are tricking me and are concentrating their main line on the Norma pun anew and upon Mildred Maxwell. How can we follow up the minis advantages we have gained when the christian dogs are retreating here, and retreating, there and striking petty blows here and there only to trick us!''

This was the question for discussion and after holding a general council it was decided not to make any movements untill the afternoon of March the Fifth. The afternoon of March the third the glandelinian armies started out after the christians supposed to be retreating and general Saten soon dis discovered that general Kindernine had retreated indeed, but in a direction not expected or wanted, and that was tward him, and not wishing a general engagement with so strong a christian army which had taken up position on the heights of Mc-Hollester near Mildred Maxwell which was simply impregnable General Saten decided to withdraw knowing it was folly to attack Kindernine.

''It's all on account of those guttersnipes.''Said general Federal in a maudlin rage.''Those scoundrelly vivian girls are about the most daring and impudent lot that I have ever seen.''

''There can be no doubt regarding that.''Answered general Saten.''They are daring little girls. We must get at them someway and stop the work they are doing or we will be almost ruined.''

That night violet and her sisters were talking to general Jack Evans over the recent battle of Lackawana which had been fought by wireless. While violet and her sisters and sisters were doing sothey were startled by hundreds of dull thunderous reports ji high in the air, and looking up their attention was attracted by an unusual number of flaring lights or streams of lights in the sky which were moving in parobolics from the direction of the enemys lines.

''Hallo Hallos look up there boys/,....''said an officer riding up.....''There is something strange going on up there.What's happened anyhow..?''

The bloody battle of Mildred Maxwell Tok took place on an outpost and general Hallis christian forces marching on to try and capture the fortifications around Fuld Callio was defeated after his huge armies went to the west to battle the foe trying to aim a blow at child slavery and the planes. Calverine although far distant from his present seat of operation in their objective had already been a failure, and Hallis wondered would b he be able where general Francis Vivianin failed to gain the goal and if he gained it will he find his vee victory a barren one within ultimate defeat and ruinous retreat in the ending, digging themselves in after such bloody successes, will they by sheer force be able to keep up their supplies from the rear and by repeated victorious advances approach untill not only Grover Andream at Calverine, Fuld Callio, and Norma Casherine are theirs, and the child slave terror crushed forever, and the glandelinian armies are brought to their knees. It was his defeat at the most thunderous battle of the first year of the war at Mildred Maxwell the sign of a failure of his army it was, it the presentment of a coup as surely which Alexanders general drew Napoleon glandelinian army into a trap and then overwhelmed him with indescribable and bloody disaster.

When general Kinderninus take retreats before general Federal during the battles just past at Porma Cathdrina Also, and Andrean Run once more he left nothing in the territory for Federals troops to live upon, millions of dollars of crops were destroyed, supplies carried off, abandoned towns and villages burned to the ground, scores of other towns laid in ruins and even the city of Andrean Run was in flames. While general Kindernino did not destroy Mc-Hollester, Calverinia, and other cities in his path of mimic retreat which he abandoned to the advancing foe he left no wealth to seize, no advantage which would give general Federal satisfaction when he came up. Federals forces numbered one million six hundred two thousand cavarly and 23,456,000 men having eleven thousand three hundred guns, six hundred thousand and eighteen thousand scige trains which had gone on to Pounsee-Cee-woolia. The provisions had their works cut p outs. not only did they sup ply men and munitions, but aided in supplying food and transporting it. Federal had arivod at Mc-Hollester, and on the third day after the battle of Andrean Run pushed across the creek. His immense army was divided in three groups, he commanding first, Saten second, and Ignorance the third.

His forces were stretched in a line from Mc-Hollester Run to Yanne n,on along the river to the town of Calverinia Vincent and down blanket Knell(galverinia).

Opposed to this large Frse Mason Army were Angolinians and Abyssinkilians, IO,000,000 being north of Pounsee-Cee-woolian and under general Picknell johnston, wit while I3,600,000 were concentrating under other various commanders, while back of the viniety of the town of Calverinia was assembled a third army 40,000,000 strong. Federal was advancing against a hercules.

Picknell left 30,000,000 of his men with the latt er to oppose Federals glandelininns. The intention of the Angelinian comm commander was to fall back to the Bondinnian intrenchments and there give battle, a second army in the meanwhile attacking the flank and there was hopes that another Abyssinkilian army coming from the southeast might also be brought into action...Federal not knowing general Kindernines numerical advantage paplanned to march on Mc-Hollester and on Calverinia with his own command, saten and Thomas Federal with the left wing meanwhile crossing a portion of the Angeline Run with Gammonins and Shoeman s f rc forces working north to seperate general Picknell johnston. The other armies were to follow and complete this breach after which the two christian forces were to be defeated seperately. But the ingeness of the christian army spoiled this plan for general Federal for general Federal unable to give battle fell back as did Saten and the joint retreat across a waste country completely frustrated Federals plans while at the same time it led his persuers further and further into new and dangerous territory where Federals new supply of trains could not follow. Toward the fourteenth of February General Federals glandelininns rallied and resumed the advance once more and recrossed the Angeline Run but found no enemy in front of him.

He proceeded to Pounsee woolian but was forced to evacuate the city some day after before destroying the city leaving nothing worth while for the christians to take, and no chances for battle. The retreat had been made in wretched condition over deep snow covered roads, in the face of hurricane blizzard storms, and endangered by sweeping flocks of furious galverinian rebels, and in terrible snow and hail storms. The whole country had been stripped bare by the retreating glandelininns, forest fire now could not be set, the supplies were weeks behind the arm army, and there was neither food fodder or shelter. More than twenty thousand horses had already died, three hundredcannon had to be left in a deep snow drift and word came that a long train bearing flour and other provisions for the glandelininns had been wrecked by the christians, and the goods carried off by them, and the train finally destroyed.

As they retreated the glandelininns burned mills, grain elevators, and stores of all sorts. The farm fields were devastated, and much of the country laid as bare as a bone for a hundred miles. Indeed the glandelinian army was in such straits that hundreds of them died of starvation, from the cold, many of sickness, and Pillgeria, and scores from sucide. All this before a battle had been fought. Without making any definite campaign the glandelinian forces too utterly overwhelmed continued to av id avoid conflict mostly by strategy and partly by luck. General Federal retreated to the town of Poverty Row scraping the country as he went of all on which the Angelinians could subsist. Picknell who had been seperad could not rejoin general Kindernine, because Shoemanis army stood in his way now waiting to attack the second christian army advancing upon Germania vivian. Picknell struck south but Germania vivian eluded him, greatly to the annoyance of Federal who gave the command to Shoemann. Federal, Gammonin, and Ignorance with gornsee picknell continued t to retre retreat while Kindernine pushed on to attack general Ignorance in front while he intended to smash Shoemann in the flank but again plans went wrong for general Federals main aid not coming up caused the main glandelinian army to fall further back. The glandelininns were suffering worse than if they had been in battle. The cou cold midwit midwinter weather, and the fury of the many wind and blizzard storms of exceedingly forc and dreadfulness, and the lack of food and watr water caused hem to fail by thousands froson and by exhumation. Dysentry and Pilergia killed whole regiments, andhorses dropped dead by the score, and even from rabid animals many soldiers died of hydrophobia.

the Angelinians crossed the Kwalnia run by bridge and pontoon bridges the in that Picknell would join them at Tripontonia and Germania vandonia. Germania ceasing to retreat and general picknell tried to force a fight but in vain. Picknell fraud that Shoemann had reached the Kwalnia ahead of him advanced northeastward. All hope of aid from him gone general Federal too heavily outnumbered for battle retreated in a blinding snowstorm. The failure of picknell to attack before the coup was accomplished enraged him. Even now one third of the glandelinian army was destroyed, and no battle had been fought. Depleted by I,I30,000 e men his force was far in a hostile and wooded snowbound territory, without supply, and suffering from intense cold, hunger and disease. The main bodies, and the wings were far apart. Determined now to secure a battle in knowing Federals condition Kindernine planned to advance on Tripontonia and then Calverinia. He brought ghoemanns army to a stop by a wild dash of an advance but could not force it to fight though his troops passed the Angeline Run and crossed the old Frontier of Sacramentine. He believed that the success of his campaign depended on which side had the greatest patience and so he continued on ward.

Federal made a great mistake in waiting for the main parts to come up after halting his own command for during that wait the full force of the christian army came up, and assumed a strong position on the Calverine, Bondinia and Pandoria railroad. Then too Federal moved up along the right banks of the Angeline Run where he might have attacked the christians in front and beaten them, but as it was a blizzard again interfered a few days later and again he had to elude the christian commanders, and indeed these latters with their vastly superior forces were showing consumate tactics to inflict losses on the glandelinians which however were as nothing compared to those, which the elements, disease, and lack of provisions were accomplishing. The privations were almost unbearable and there was no doubt that the reports of his staff did as much a to celebrate his indecision at that time.

In the dilemma in which federal found himself he determined to draw the Angelinians on knowing that if he could checked the Angelinians would force a battle at any cost, which would force a way to Calverinia. The day he came in sight of Pounsee-CeeWoolian the christian population had evacuated it all provisions being destroyed and the city in a furnace of flames. The army tried to sussist by foraging the country but this did not sufice to fee feed the troops and little they got on account of the severe hostilitiss that they recieved by even the women and children of the country knes homes , or towns, who flung a overt kind of missile at the glandelinians, and hooted and jeered, and even mobbed the soldiers, howling and crying with fury many saying;

"Go on you dit dirty old child murderers. Assassins.we have nothing for you.."

Even besides all the hostility by the peasentry themselves over thirty thousand foraging troops were captured in one instance, and another going after a mob of children whom they intended to cut to pieces for stoning the soldiers, fell into an ambus ambuscade, and were all slain with every one of their officers.

The garrisons left behind by general Federal were surprised and killed, and all roads held by the glandelinians were lost to them. Even worse threatened for general Kindernine who led the christian advance from Pounsee-woolia assembled no less than IO,000,000 cavarly one mil'lion fresh infantry, six thousand guns, and two million two hundred thousand Abyssinkilians while another force of five million Calverinians under general Joania was advancing from Bondinia, and six hundred and fourty sevthousand was moving from the south all these adding to what general Kindernine had at first.

Federals position was further made precarious by the approach of general Winter, and the return to general Kindernine of two million Abyssinkilian troops which had been helping Godfrey at Mc-Whirther. At Kindernines Elbow was Kindernine whom hadundriven General from Pripontinidia. Retreat northward was out of the question, retreat southward was the only thing, for the mobs of peasantry and even the women and children of all previous hostile towns were becoming more dangerous than the christian armies themselves. This he accepted and the withdrawal began on the eighteenth all the s r surviving Glandelinians about fifteen million marching in the continuous of the most famious retreat of the war and which resulted in terrible fighting soon afterwards, with to the christians curshingly victorious.

General in the lead of the glandelinian army started southward, while Kindernine instaneously sprang to block his way. If nature hindered the retreat northward toward Calverinia she did more to obstruct the retreat southward. All the glandelinians suffered in the first instance was multiplied tenfold now. furious blizzard storms, with horrible dangerous windstorms also of typhoonic variety and hurricanes, tearing trees inside out of the woodlands made progress slower than before and all this was followed by intenser cold waves. Everywhere laid the unburied dead, and as the retreating Glandelinians passed the battlefields of Andrean Run the victims bodies still remained grim and fearful monuments of Kindernines driving campaign/. At Beppo Rickson the rearguard of the glandelinians gained a partial victory over the Angelinians but at the cost of five hundred thousand two hundred in killed and wounded.....

Turning south to avoid the main body of general Kindernines army Federal made-off in the direction of Erminie Creek in full retreat. His idea was to reach Mc-Whirther Run where he expected reinforcements from general victorand also provisions for his army. The provisions brought were exhausted, fuel was scarce, and death from the cold was common. All this time general Kindernine had been hurrying the retreating Glandelinians. By forced marches over shorter routs he was at Pounsee-Cee-woolia, and cut off the rear guard of the enemy killing three thousand and capturing five thousand. With more determination he might have smashed the entire Glandelinian army but another blizzard storm frustrated his own intentions and he was unable to make a general attack. The Glandelinians now thoroughly demorilized broke into rout. All discipline was gone for cast to the winds. With the tempeture at sixty one below zero and in a blinding swirling snowstorm and hail and sleet it became each man for himself. Exhausted scores sank to freeze to death under the snow drifts. On the rear and on the flank pressed the wild and savage Angelinians killing as many as they could. The Angelinians did not stop always to take prisoners. They went on leaving general winter to att end to the fugit ives who had offered to surrender.....

THE BATTLE OF CAIN'S FAIR.

Wen the retreating Glandelinians arived at Gains fair being under great pressure now had to give battle, and stood bravely against scores of desperate and bloody attacks, and while Federal waited for more troops the Angelinians strengthened their position, soon attacked in full force. The whole of Cains Fair which stands near the border of Eastern Calverinia was destroyed by the terrible Glandelinian artillery fire, and general Cannonia, and Helldon were both defeated with dreadful loss by the Angelinians and Calverinians under general Phelania and Augusti o St Clare, and though these Glandelinians retreated it was a barren victory for genera Kindernine, and both sides had lost in those two hours two hundred thousand in killed and wounded. Worse than this for the Glandelinian side an hour later a large force had advanced on the foe line commander by generals Nolan Mc-Hollester and Alisatine Jennings, fri from the south a d though the battle was resumed again with redoubled fury with mutual losses on both sides dreadful Federal badly smitten was to forced despite the reinforcements arriving to his aid to order these commanders to withdraw from that portion of Mc-Hollester Run the town of Bandertine being blown up at his command without regard for hundreds of thousands of helplessesick women and children there.

Stragglers left behind were set upon by the enraged peasantry and women and children, and even slaughtered for revenge of the ruthless destruction of the thousands of sick and injured in the town. The ground in the whole region wasreddened by some of the best blood on both sides, seven hundred thousand having fallen during the sectio second part of the battle .More than once during the first day of the battle the fear of the Glandelinians they had of fierce Kindernine caused the foe to lose a chance of annihilating an Angelinianarmy corps, although they outnumbered the corps on that occasion ten to one.

In such straits general Germainia vivian was left behind and during his own part of the battle which he resumed himself lost 121,100 men out of his 2,125,000. The retreating division under Mc-Hollester and Jennings still numbered heavily however, reinforcements having made him almost equal to general Kindernines force of christians Germainia s army had to abandon most of its artillery as they could not carry it away in the heat of the contest. When the battle had again been resumed general Teshney with a force from Pounsee-Cee-woolia had marched so rap idly that he had reached the Mc-Hollester Run where the Glandelinians had expected to cross and that generals Schroder Shroeder and johnston had defeated both general Mc-Hollester and Cannonia.

Persued by a portion of Kindernines Concentinians and harried on the flanks by Danson, Federals position had been most precarious and he was forced to ode order three million eight hundred thousand Turmerannians to hold off panson and take the Rickson and Dillingham bridges, and Costellio to repell Kindernine along the banks of the river. Then in the heat of the fifth part of the conflict, the Angelinians burned the bridges, and only the military genius of the Glandelinian generals extracted their armies from the destructive chif infilade, commanding a situation where they could have destroyed the entire ac army under general Picknell, each Glandelinian commander being forced to resist hedious onslaughts, and were finally outwitted and outgeneraled and beaten anew by the Angelinian forces. By a ruse in the afternoon general Shoemann had decieved the Angelinian generals, and built a hundred pn pontoon bridges under the very noses of the christians, but one at a time they had been destroyed.

Mc-Whirther Run on bridges

Mc-Hollester Run on bridges

Smoke fairly blinded many thousands the ,landelinians battering away mightily, hurling onslaught after onslaught on the christian lines, mowing heavy forces at every point only to be decimated, then suddenly shifting the attacks to another point of the main christian line but they were unable to move the christians back anw anywhere, and one hundred thousand perished at one point. Horrible sce e scenes had been left on this battle field. It was littered for miles with bodies after the first great action, the scattered debris of a great fight, equipment and stores. ,orpses were strown in confusion, half opened bodies, dismembered heads, arms, and legs, piles of mangled flesh, and intestines, and windrows of dead and dying.. There were rifles, bayonets, ammunition belts, coats, cartridges, soldiers packs, blankets and other things which had been frantically thrown away in s some fierce charge.

The battle h having raged between the territoy of Mc-,ollester, Mc-Whirther, and Mc-Whirther Run, and Angeline Run was generally called ''The battle of the three rivers, '' or Mc-Whirther Run as the grw greatest crisis occured along their block blood covered banks.

The next day a low and distant muttering of a can o cannonading gave general ,ibbernines army warning that the ,landelinians had again made a stand. A few volleys of shells burst in loud heavy detonations high above, and then swift with an intolerable rear the blaze of musketry discharges flared in front of the gray lines before the very eyes of the christians.

1481.

''On for Shoemanns center.''Ordered general Hindernine.''We as fast as you can.''

''We must strike Shoemann a blow before the storm of battle breaks un in full away.''

On and on pressed the christian lines as fast as they could Shoemanns whole line becoming ablaze and so intense was the blaze of musketry that the flashes brought vividly into view the sharp outlines of the gray columns even the sharp outlines of its most distant in windngs, and the Angelinians fell more rapidly than usually. The first line that came in contact with the foe seemed to writhe and twist, and then to melt away, he whole main column of Angelinians however came nearer and nearer and soon poured over Shoemanns lines of works driving the foe back. There was a lull for an hour then the foe came back at the christians and strove with the fury of desperation, to recover their lost positions but their waves of assault a one after another were reduced to shattered remnants before they reached the line of captured works. The next column in gray catching up with the receding mangled division came forward in a straight line and struck in heavy force against the christians. The shock was terrific the whole line becoming a dismal reminder of what had been. For miles all along the line the ground was smashed as thick as swarming magots with human bodies clothed in gray.

An hour despite the recent horrible slaughter the foe rested and then came on again in fresh divisions but were repulsed. Another column charged fifteen minutes later and this time swept clean over the trec trenches, another followed closely in behind storming the christian line with blind fury but amid the dreadful slaughter though they carried the whole position and drove the christians back pell mell for two miles they could not retain the position for the christians crashed back upon li them like a tidal wave driven by a storm and though fighting hand to hand with the wild Concentinians they could not force back this purple wave and even those of the foe who had not retreated were shot down or forced to surrender.

Tward Noon Shoemannia hurled his main force to the assault aided by strong ,urmerannian and ,obbinite forces.

''would it not be danger for general Hindernines sadly depleted troops to make a further stand against those ,landelinian forces!''Asked one of Kindernines aiding generals.

''I know that general Federal is in strong force and can may advance his whole army before any one of us expect it and overwhem ,indernine.''Said ,indernine.''But god is with him in all perils and I'll do my best to support him at all occasions.''

''I certainly will be an attack.''Said general August as the christian forces under general Stant came up. The heavy firing had in the meantime continued, the roar of musketry and the booming of cannon resounding far and wide, and now ,indernine realised that ,indernines whole line was all ablaze and moved forward his own commands to stop the foe. In the meantime ,violet came rushing up to general ,indernine and said;

''Oh general, there is an awful big force of Omarian Kurds advancing from the left over the river stern to overlap general ,indernines right wing.It looks to me as if he will be lost.''

''Send order to his generals to stand their ground at all costs and I will support them heavily.''Said Kindernine to one of his officers.''I'll see that those Omarians are crushed.''Then turning to ,iolet and her sisters he said kind of sternly;

''I'm advising that you little girls had better withdraw to keep out of this earthly inferno or you will meet annihilation otherwise....''

''I'll not do so.''Said ,violet saluting.''I'll keep out of the battle, but I will not withdraw unless commanded to by higher aurthority.''

General Kindernine did not say anything further but the look he gave them gave the impression that he knew more about the threatening danger than they did themselves and the little girls decided after all to take his advise and not be fools. Shoemann now swept to the attack again and the battle was fearful.. Also the fire along the christian line was doubly terrific and soon enough ,landelinians to fill eighty acres were strewn anew on the ground dead and wounded. For four hours the battle now raged with demanting fury and some christian divisions being unable to withdraw, had held their ground untill almost annihilated. Shoemann attacked in full force the whole onslaught lasting the full four hours without pause, and though one of his main lines of assaults had been reduced to a remnant Shoemann hurled the survivors anew against the christian line with all his might.

A large fragment of general Jennings division had given way before the force of the enemys attack and long streams of graycoatspoured over the trenches hurling back Jennings main line,mowing down thousands with murderous ferocity carrying all before them. Poor ,iolet and her sisters who were going slowly to the rear as advised by general ,indernine did not know of the disaster untill they saw the withdrawel of the few score of thousands of men, and then they were horrified.

''Goodness Gracious.''Screamed Jennie.''A stream of graycoats are rushing over the entire line of works. Run, run, all you boys who can, or you will be caught in the mass of Free Masons.''

The boyscouts did their best to run Jennie slipping on ice and sprawling in the snow several times with the stream of graycoats was rushing on with the speed and fury of a stampede of steers. Another part of Jennings divisions only having a few thousand left had given way also, the little girls themselves being in awful peril indeed.

On and on came the awful swarm of graycoats gaining on the imperiled ones every minute, reducing the men to only a few hundred. Sudde nly as Jennie tripped and fe ll a shell exploded close to her, the concussion rolling her tward a large steep ravine into which she fell and lay there in a pool of blood. Violet as she fell by slipping on ice screamed as she saw the ,landelinians rush among a thousand Angelinians enveloping them out of sight. One of the ,landelinians an officer recklessly snatch ing up ,violet intending to cut the inside of her throat open did not have the chance for she shot him in the heart and killedhim. Angeline also saw many thousands of retreating Angelinians being overtaken by the awful army of Condemnians, and every one on both sides almost fell in the awful de death struggle that ensued. Several of the Angelinians who survived managed to rescue poor Jennie and Angeline both of whose feet and hands were badly scratched and torn. Jennie was the only one seriously hurt her other sisters having escaped. On this moment a wave of dashing Concentinian cavarly came up to the rescue riding down the hored hordes of ,landelinians, and drove all before them some of them rescuing violet and her sisters, charging through the swarms of graycoats time and again making the scene a wild hell of slaughter, smoke and flame, and a tumult of lances against a tumult of bayonets.

,violet and her sisters finally got away but were persued by a force of men which at first looked like gray coated Concentinians but which proved to be Curdes and the little girls with some real Concentinians managed to board a boat and started down the Mc-,ollester Run river to tell general ,indernine of the threatening catastrophe. No sooner had they started when a hundred boat loaded with Protestinian graycoats charged out to intercept them and the boat being aground in a sandbank was attacked and carried, the little girls and the Concentinians escaping capture by a clever ruse.

The battle along general ,indernines front was horrible and never was such a noise of firing heard before, it being terrifying in comparsion to the mighty roar of hundreds of Niagaras.

Within four hours Shoesman had lost four hundredthousand men in killed and wounded out of his one million nine hundred thousand and was soon compelled to withdraw. General Federal himself directed a terrific assault but his center main line was smashed to pieces by a driving counter charge of christian troops, despite his remarkable st: steam roller drive as it was called. Thus ended the bloody battle of The Three Rivers.

Some days later near the end of Feburary those many battles having raged on the Eighteenth, Twentieth, and Twenty fourth, the little girls learning that a large force of Confederinians was advancing to reinforce Lindermine, and being anxious to know who they were, Violet and her sisters set out to find out. Yet the little girls had to go through the enemys lines to reach the vicinity of the aproaching Confederinians the enemy having remained in their same position and not having moved out excepting changing the formation of their lines. As they got behind a clump of snow covered shurbbery the little girls attention was attracted by an unusual number of grayscoats who were advancing but falling in indescribable numbers at the same time. For about five minutes the approaching Landelinians continued to drop and falter, the survivors moving in the same direction from north to south. Many shells were falling among them leaving trails of smoke Howvr however by this great Landelinian column by and by grew less numerous the survivors retiring in confusion.

THE SECOND BATTLE OF THE THREE RIVERS.

"This is something strange "Said Violet it being the last of Feburary now. While Violet and her sisters were talking and wondering at the meaning of this unusual slaughter among the big coulmn, another column of grayscoats appeared more large than the first, coming on with a rush yelling like demons. Soon the display of shells got quite alarming and the falling of grayscoats fairly paved the ground.

"I wonder what is going on over there."Said Violet to herself, and she had no sooner said these words when from the western section a part of the cloud melted away and they saw a large part of the column go to pieces like a shower of spray and now and then there flared up among their lines something like rockets, only that they were very much too large and the trail of smoke that followed these balls trailed away behind like a horses tail and dropping among the foe with a fearful hiss then giving way to earsplitting detonations. The advancing column of men now reached half way to where the little girls were hiding, and the foremost were heading directly for them, and the little girls who were watching them were getting a little uneasy, for there was no telling where the shells were going to drop next. Inless in less time than it takes to tell it Violet and her sisters soon discovered that an army of Confederians of ermormous size were moving tward general Lindermines front, under a smashing annihilating fire of flu four hundred guns, and the little girls were in danger of being shelled when the foe got even with their hiding place.....

The suspense was awful. The great column, mangle, and torn already, seemed to pause a while in its advance, then pushed on g again, thousands heading; knew for their hiding place, asthe main column came on.

So quickly was the awful danger approaching that it was useless for the poor little girls to run, even in three directions, in an effort to get awat away, from either the onu onrushing foe, or the threatening storm of shells and canister. They could d th nothing else but crouch in the same spot and take their s chances of being sliced open alive by the infuriated grayscoats, or be frightfully mangled by the torrents of shells c and canister. As the little gi girls observed the foe came nearer they heard a strange roaring sound to their backs faint at first, but getting louder and louder, and despite the mornings approach to brightness of the rising sun and blinding snow on the ground, the whole horizon behind them seemed to be bathed in a blinding stream of bluish bluish white flashes such as produced by hundreds of thousands of gas gasus burners, and never did rain fall as thick as the grayscoats dropped before that he hellish storm of christian cannon and musketry. Violet and her sisters Horrified at the sight of the bloody mangled corpses shut their eyes.

Nearer and nearer came the surviving Landelinians and the little girls now held their breath in an agony of suspense. The advancing foe was now quite close, and the hissing and roaring that came from the storm of canister and minnies was enough to frighten the bravest man if he had been in their situation.

"Gracious Goodness they are coming at us."Screamed violet. "Oh Almighty God, save us please..."

Joice could scarcely make out her words above the din of the approaching peril. It was awful to see them crouching there like helpless victims and kis kittens, and feel that there was no chance of escape from the two perils which had suddenly confronted them.

They feared that they were indeed doomed and they turned their heads and muttered [illegible] the once ends Nothing could shut out of their sight the frightful slaughter going on. The air was filled with a deafening din such asthe roar of fourty thousand cannon all at once while near before them the nearest column of grayscoats were going to fragments. Suddenly a long thick line of purple coats appeared, surging through the smoke haze and the Landelinians with a yell that shook the air foe fell upon them, and a terrific battle to hand struggle raged oven in the midst of the vivian girls the impact being indeed terrific. A volley of canister flew among the bushes where the vivian girls were in hiding and seventeen of the Landelinians who had discovered them vivian girls x sprawling in the snow. One of the survivors made a rush for violet who struck at him with a branch, but the grayscoat dodged the blow, and the little girl jumped back to avoid his bayonet thrust, trio tripped and fell with a crash over some twigs buried in the deep snow. In falling violet saw a shining point of something which struck at her piercing her shoulder. Joice saw the assailant and screamed. It was one of the Landelinian gargolian Kurds belonging to general Federals command. She knew the ras cal hardened by hard by gone sorrows and longings, and by the fury of h the war was more deadly in his ways than the worse black Mandra or cobra. Indeed the mostdeadly of the Landelinians were the Gargolian Kurds, whose appiall appalling fury when aroused was more dangerous that the frightfulness of the snake posion. What made them to be still more dreaded was their extroardinary quickness in their movements, for they could dodge a blow from the most expert duelest and could strike back before their opponent had opportunity to recover. The Kurd hearing Joices scream now ran tward her, and Joice picked up a rock which she threw at the wicked Landelinian to pgevent him from springing but though the aim was perfectly true, it did not hurt the Landelinian in the least only having the effect of enraging the man still more and Joice only saved herself from being shot by darting behind a ledge of rocks. Leaving for violet he again made for Joice with a hiss of rage one of his bullets hitting the thin bushes in from front of the rocks rocks as he aimed at her. The Landelinian tried to get at her from the back but oh she seized a long branch and lashed out wildly to right and left but she did no harm to the Landelinian except to arouse him to greater fury.

She continued slashing wildly about expecting every moment to feel a shot, or a blow pr the sabre of the Landelinian buried in her body. Joice was far from any help, and she could hear the rascal striking continually anywhere, and everywhere it seemed to her ,swearing and hissing with rage. Meanwhile the thuds of his blows sounded loud against the hard rock and she was about to scream for help, when she heard a twigg snap.

The infuriated brute striking furiously tward where she was hiding had at last run into a hedge of bushes the force of his impact having sent it crashing down. The noise of that snapping hedge caused Joice to know where the awful brute was and jumping on top of the rock she gave a terrified yell, for she came right down on the other side right on top of the glandelinian who was trying to get up having been prostrated by the impact with the bushes. Leaping aside she made for a line of woods, where violet and her other sisters had gone outdistancing the Landelinians who were cursing and swearing. After a little while the litt le girls despite the tremendous roar of the distant battle he heard a muffled but irregular sound in the direction of a debris chocked vine or ravine close to the banks of the Ne-Whirther gun river. Gradually she understood it was the noise of persuing Landelinians Landelinians. The little girls realised the danger, and reaching the woods kept perfectly quiet crouching behind the many piles of rocks lined up on the outskirts of the dark a d and forlorn woods for hours which formed a very servicesable protection.

"Hurran hurrah they are Angelinians."Shouted violet.

Violet and her sisters gave a start and glanced suspiciously around feeling anxious and feverish. The woods were still very dark and yet it was only eight o-clock in the morning. It seemed to the little girls as if it was only a part of an interrupted dream that she heard a muffled but regular sound in the direction of the overhanging vegetation which boarded the rivers banks.

Gradually she and her sisers understood it was the steady tramp, tramp, tramp, of advancing men and realising the danger every oneof the little girls kept perfectly still crouching behind the many piles of rocks with their soldier companions who had followed followed them, the rocks forming a very good position. All the time as they made their preparations they could now hear the sound of horses hoofs, drawing steadily nearer and nearer. Soon the little girls saw soon one after another four columns of horsemen shoot out from under the overhanging trees, and rush furiously tward the woods. Then allof a sudden the little girls saw more than a dozen other columns coming tward the woods from their right. Quickit the Angelinians with the little girls retreated into the woods leaving more of the men who ever they were shooting at the christians who were the last to retreat. The cavarly forces approached steadily and soon from the foremost horsemen came a shower of all kinds of musket balls.. The enemy yelled like demons, and violet and her sisters recognized them by their familiar yells. They were the Omarian gurdes.

The Christian fugitive soldiers as they retreated from tree to tree showered volley after volley with their rifles and other firearms but did little execution on account of poor light. Meanwhile the cavarly from the opposite shore came at the Angelinians with a rush, the wicked Glandelinians being visible in the constant fl flas flash of their lights while every one could hear the thunderous roar of the horses hoofs on the hardened snow! The Angelinians now able to see better were shooting with better aof accuracy but against such odds they had little chance. So the fifty christian soldiers who were the fugitives with Violet and her sisters seized a gunboat they saw moored and went off in this through the ice covered river full of floating cakes, but despite the ice obsticles the Glandelinians pursued in rowboats the oarsmen sending the big boats along with powerful strokes and it almost resembled Washington crossing the Delaware only instead of the retreat of the Americans it was a pur pursuit of Glandelinians after the christian fugitives. From the bridge protected by the pilot house, Violet and her sisters saw the big boats coming nearer and nearer with anxious eyes. Ringing for full steam ahead the c aptian put her helm hard down in order to force his way through the mass of boats before they could close upon the ships.... The ship was headed for the biggest and nearest of the boats. The Glandelinians on board saw their peril but they had no time at all to escape the blow. The gunboat struck her amidships cutting the craft in two with a rending crash, and leaving several of the Glandelinians clining to the stern and longbows. There they began a fight for life..... ag ainst against the christians who cut them down with fearful swords until the last of the assailants fell back into the i e ice filled water.

Meanwhile close to the tern stern the Glandelinians of two more boats were trying their best to board the ship having got hold of either side of the ships stanchions and were now shooting and stabbing at the gallant se n who repi re lled with rifle shots, bayonets and sabre thrusts. The engineer with a revolver in both hands was fighting like a maddened demon, even the stoker with white hot sliders were poking and stabbing wildly in the writhing mass of grayscoats who were trying to climb and gain a footing on the ships deck. But though they al did their very best the pressure of numbers began to tell, and the Glandelinians would have succeeded in boarding the ship if the engines had not been put full astern. The great big wheel aft started, drawing the water and floating fragments of ice under the stern in foaming waves, and causing such a tremendous suction that the two boats were instantly carried into the vortex and disappeared with their crews under the ships bottom. Most of the Glandelinians were killed or drowned, and the boats shattered to splinters.

Three paddles of the ships wheel were rendered useless but the ship was saved for just at that critical moment the other boats retreated for a safe distance, pushing at full speed for two more oncoming boats the ship sank them both, while the ships crew elated by the success of the tactics and able at last to see properly on account of the sun breaking through the rifts of heavy snow clouds used their guns with admirable accuracy, making such an impression on the Glandelinians that they stopped firing and took to flight. F ve of the ships crew had been killed, and eighteen wounded, while ten of the soldiers were killed and thirty wounded. The enemy lost seven hundred and ninty nine. Reaching the christian lines after this encounter, and disembarking the little girls found that Kinderwine had forced the assails to back and that the battle was over. Two days later while kinderwines army was advancing again violet and her sisters saw in the distance a deep hole like trench of an oblong form about a mile long, ai eighteen feet deep, and fourty broad. The bottom was much broader than the upper part and bristled with black shining pikes three feet long with points as sharp as needles. Knowing the nature of this ten trap, for any living thing falling on them would be killed instantly, the little girls tried to warn general kinderwine, and though kinderwine had discovered it before them other similar pits had been dug by thousands of Glandelinians within a few weeks at this section undalmost three thousand Angelinians had fallen into them before they were warned and perished and halting his army on the sixth of March general kinderwine was compelled to form a battle line at a stream called Takabrody and that late n on the afternoon the foe made a charge which caused one portion of kinderwines left grand division to go to pieces while every now and then a big column of grayscoats larger than its fellow columns would sweep upon kinderwines c hain of cannon, against which no man could possibly stand and entirely melt away under the soothing fire.

Though kinderwine hurled upon the assailants one million three hundred thousand men they had been rede reduced to five hundred thousand, but still the survivors held firm until they saw monsterous columns swarm upon the edge of their artillery position and come welting tward them, the survivors being a line nearly six deep. Many of the Angelinian regiments gave way helpless to withstand the onrush of the foe but the others held, and the surviving Glandelinians gasping, sputtering, half smothered in smoke of muskotry n and cannon struggled onward. The christian fire however continued to grow weaker, and before long half of the Glandelinian force was among the guns and the hand to hand fight was so fierce that kinderwine was horrified at the numbers of men dropping at the remainder who were engulfed by the writhing streams of Glandelinians the situation growing more threatening every moment, the works having and entirely disappeared under the maze of fallen bodies.

The gray tides as they poured over the trenches seemed like great walls of human beings apparently hovering over the tops of the works for a moment and then engulfing the surviving Glandelinians. General Kinderwine was startled over the fury of the assailants, and fearful remnants of torn and bleeding men passed on to the rear.

At last the divisions defending the artillery had only a few hundred men left, the tremendous columns of Glandelinians pouring on having all the guns in their possession, and the christian general Frank possession refusing to surrender was shot down and bayonetted his wounds being serious.

CHAPTER [illegible]

THE BATTLE OF TAKABRODY

An hour after this while Kinderwine was moving up immense bodies to retake the lost works he at the same time sent forward a large force of Concentinian horsemen which dashed up within sight of the captured works, and then as the signal given given they rushed forward in a thunderous yelling wave of fierce savages in purple and scon four hundred saddles were being emptied at every step.

To his surprise Federal saw that they were a part of Haynes advancing Concentinians and now ordered his men to reform ranks, the Glandelinians doing as they were told while the Glandelinian gunners opened fire anew with the captured guns. At the same time another very large force of Concentinians and Abyssinkilians could be seen approaching at a tearing gallop through the timber and they were firing thousands of volleys, as they came on many unmounted horsemen leaping into their saddles, and riding on though scores of horses and men fell dead per second, saddles all along the line being emptied rapidly.

Despite the rate the Glandelinians were shooting the christian cavarly went down the Glandelinians were greatly outnumbered, but nevertenevertheless theymade a defense, which was like a stone wall to the mre force of christians, outnumbering the foe as they did. Even yet despite their superior numbers and being on the swiftest horses, and being covered by a heavy christian artillery fire from Baldwinsons batteries they could not force the contending gray columns back, the Glandelinians desperately contesting every foot of the ground the being merely the cake of a larger force trying to shove the smaller force back in the face of a withering fire. General Ambrose Fuller learning of the situation at once ordered general Chesterlollias Condemnecians to advance and check the impetious counter attack of the Concentinians and Abyssinkilians.

This movement was obeyed by Bellis goes divisions who made a dash with five hundred thousand cavarly men across a creek called St Joans, but in the bloody melee with the fierce Abyssinkilians at close quarters his five hundred thousand were struck by Haynes main body, and reduced to three hundred thousand, and then further cut to pieces, and rolled forward by the christian cavarly, Chesterlollias force having at the same time come in contact with a great force of Dondobian horsemen all wearing yellow hoods and regalins, and in the frightful struggle were crushed to pieces, and Chesterlollis killed.

Federal seeing that his cavarly force was almost annihilated by the Abyssinkilian troopers, and that nothing could be done as a heavy concentration of infantry was now massed upon the captured works, and the Glandelinians holding them thrown out and rolled up, Federal withdrew them, and the Concentinians reforming their ranks, resumed their charge at a headlong gallop, while at the same time the Glandelinian forces coming up to the rescue started to recoil but the next instant the Concentinians were upon the Glandelinians like winged wi fiends, the Glandelinians using their bayonets with thrilling effect but the christians rode down everything before them sending the surviving Landelinians flying, while the other Concentinian columns bore down upon the left of the retiring line causing a tremendous frasco and sending them also fleeing tward the main lines.

There was after this another lul , and then which was considered as the artillery duel of hells fury brought on the full sway of the battle, and general [illegible] Mc-Hollesters Concentinians made four frantic attempts to cart carry general Federals main lines of batteries which was held by the Glandelinians to a man. General Mc-Hollester may have as well attempted to commit murder to his own men and suicide as well in trying to carry these batteries. Violet and her s s sisters in the meantime fleeing with colonel Jenain reported to general Kinderwine of some threatening danger but already the mighty command commander had heard the mighty roar of the battle and was hastening heavy forces to the aid of the Concentinians.....

While general Kinderwine had been making a furious stand Mc-Hollesters Concentinians had reached the main road to the right of the shell swept region, and the columns of purple coats in crossing the s little stream had put the telephone system out of commission and destroyed the wires. Indeed fresh columns of Federals army was now advancing advancing to the attack, the battle threatening to become general again.....

Seeing this general Picknell threw his entire force forward at an angle movement and finally checked the Christians who rolled up their right and left, but was wounded himself. Shoemann main line was shattered and his right wing annihilated. General Purgatorians army was routed but other columns held as firmly as a wall of rock the terrific slaughter being at it's height at this point.

All along the line the roar of muskatry and cannon never ceased, charge following charge in ends endless succession. Regiments of Angolinians were mowed down but thousands threw themselves forward with crash and roar until they were forced to withdraw before more force of numbers. In the Treelan and Parobeak Groves the Glandelinians pressed foward again the Angolinians along this point giving way and here hundreds of thousands were mangled. Indeed the very columns under general Adele-De-Garbe himself were pressing forward and whole brigades of christians troops gave way anew abandoning the bloody fields to the enemy. It was indeed the scene of one of the most bloodiest contested battles seemingly in this part of the Calvordian country, where over a million had fallen singly on both sides alone. However despite the outcome of the first day of the battle as it seemed general Pindernine was bound to win at any cost and so during the night preparations were made to repell further attacks, the breaks in the line was restored and the works thrown up anew.

On the morrow general Mc-Whirther himself stood against four frantic attacks made by Mc-Hollesters Glandelinians the Angelinians again holding their ground desperately and if Mc-Hollester was not trying to commit suicide indeed it seemed so so frantic was his efforts. First Crews columns a part of Mc-Hollesters divisions hurled themselves against Mc-Whirthers lines but were reduced to fragments and rolled back in wild confusion. There was then a lull in which some more changes were made in the christian position then general Baylons columns of Condonnincians made a desperate assault but three quarters of their number was annihilated. Next general Mc-Hollesters divisions under general Crawford went forward twice but his immense line met with frightful desdination and then making a third assault were crushed to pieces, and hurled back again with their bleeding and dying lying in vertible ridges.

Seeing that his efforts were unavailing Federal decided to withdraw his forces but general Picknell Johnston threw his entire army across the Mc-Hollester Run Plains, and for four hours in a general death struggle strove with might and main to keep Mc-Hollesters Glandelinians under general Ambrose Fuller from reaching the main point of Takabrody's ford but after tedious fighting his left was turned and crushed, and his army had to withdraw withdraw. An hour later the enemy came on again yelling like 6 demons.

While this was going on the Mc-Hollester Plains were hotly contested for by overwhelming numbers of Christians but nevertheless the christian army was crushed to fragments and driven back in the worse panic ever seen in actual warfare. General Danson who had recieved reinforcements could not hold his position either and his own army was threatened with annihilation. But soon with the arival of general Barnhardt the enemy was held at bay. Then Danson and Barnhardt making a gallent charge forced the enemy back striking poor Shoemann a cruel blow and driving back his force and throwing the Glandelinians into fearful confusion. However toward the afternoon Picknell threw his army in Dansons way and after more sanguinary fighting smote him crushingly, annihilating Barnhardts left and right wings, and threatened general Danson's entire army back with the wounding of general Roswell Buster Johnston.

General Miller Gallagher and general Hoyne came to Dansons aid as the carnage redoubled in itsherror and the whole foe line was torn to pieces. The Glandelinians pressed on in their attack storming the christian line with their fire. Hoyne was killed before a red hot fusilade eruption of cannon and musketry and his forces cut to pieces and driven back. General Costello and Frances Ogletorp advanced at Kindernines order with their commands and tried to make a stand but within two hours their divisions were crushed to fragments, and the survivors were compelled to withdraw covered by general Picknell Saunderscorps.

General Mony Senguines division were hurled forward into the Mc-Hollester plens, but was trapped and forced to withdraw, and Danson , and Barnhardt with Peterson being again threatened with disaster withdrew their new forces, general Barnhardt having been severely wounded. The division under Mc-Whirther and Senguine had been almost annihilated, and the two generals wounded. Danson had also suffered a severe punishment but recieving heavy reinforcements managed to cause the enemy to withdraw but not all along the line, for at many other points they could not be checked under any conditions and the second day of the battle seemed to be lost.

General Vivians Glandelinians making a desperate assault upon Pindernine whose troops was stretched along the banks of the stream suffered a severe punishment that was amazing but he held amid a seething hellstorm of guny gunfire on three sides, and finally made an advance, while again general Cannonias Glandelinians struck Dansons lines like an avalanch checking the Angelinians but not hurling them back. Adele-De-garbes divisions having their position on the Mc-Hollester plains, could not hold against the sweeping assaults of the christians who captured the angle of works amid hellish slaughter, while Cannonia being charged by the Consentin a Consentinians was rolled up with losses that was unestimated.

Shoemannsdivisions having been reinforced, tward evening resumed his attack on Dansons shattered line with all his vehemence, decaminating his whole line after two hours desperate fighting and driving him a back, and pressing his divisoj division hard. Danson in order to check Shoemann extended his lines along the creek but this attempt was unsuccessful and only realted in frightful slaughter. Nile the rest were retreating part of Dansons line continued to make a desperate stand, but soon the whole plains were abandoned to the enemy. Adele-De-garbe in the meantime had tried to check the titan counter attack of his christian foes but met a humilating defeat. However Shoemanns main division aided by Picknell was thrown upon the christian line confronting them and Adele-De-garbes troops having a chance to recover rallied and then the christian line was forced back for several miles, and after the conflict ceased a sea of dead and wounded was rapidly exposed for miles...

The christian general Meldonia Picknell was now arriving with five million fresh troops, and after more murderous fighting to help in support general Pindernine against his own assailants, a part of his command which had come up right in the nick of time managed to check Shoemann. The other Picknell who commanded the Glandelinians who was assailtung the right grand division of Hindernines troops continued their own attack for a time, and then they were also about to recoil before overwhelming numbers. Just as this was occuring genera, general Pyrobars Condennecians rolled upon general Dansons new line of battle which had been formed about five o-clock that afternoon. The christian general Picknell held against the Glandelinians under the other Picknell, Picknell, contending against Picknell, untill general Jennings and Ironburgs armies were torn to pieces by an annihilating artillery fire. Then they gave way their Glandelinians leaving in all haste. Hortens and Chs Chambersburgs Glandelinians stationed across Poudine Woolcains plains also could not hold out against Danson Kempts a division of Abyssinkilians who who just came up, and being shattered, was also compelled to withdraw. General Chambersburg was killi killed, and general Horten mortally wounded. General Bruces Glandelinians then made a charge but were caught in bad ground and then had to give way before the irrestible pressure of the counter charge made by the Angelinians under generals Hennington and Shenanara. But at Sparring plains the Glandelinianscstill held firm-and the latter christin christian general was killed by a storm of canister. Convention, Costellio, with Canlets brigades of Cymarian Gurdes were simultaneously attacked by Logans Abyssinkilians but these were held at bay, but nevorheles the Glandelinians could not drive him back. The Glandelinians then came up under general Fritritze Patrick and Cantoonia Evans, and these Glandelinians were also soon forced to retreat, the Angelinians capturing a great toll of prisoners. Picknell now threw forward his whole force and tried to roll up Dansons assaulting lines. Dansons main line halted, and the left fell back, but Danson recieved a wholesale of fresh troops, and Picknells line was staggered as facts came inthat general Danson was advancing his main force to the rescue..

Picknell being dangerously wounded, Convention took his place, only to be also severely wounded as Picknells left was swept back. From Mc-Hollesters plains, to Mc-Whirthers plains poured a sea of writhing purple coats which made now four desperate assaults to no avail, the Glandelinians holding their ground amid dreadful slaughter.....

Chamberburgs plains, and Mc-Whirthers plains became regular charnel hells, the one million seven hundred th ousand Angelinians assaulting the Free Masonic lines being reduced to nine hundred thousand and were driven back. Mc-Hollesters plains was still in the grasp of the Angelinians, the plains being cannonaded with terrific fury by the Glandelinian batteries. Danson failed to force Bicknells lines and incurred a terrific counter onslaught from Allenburgers Glandelinians. Danson stood firm however for a time, but Bicknell recovering from the blow he recieved (Not the one who was wounded but another Icknell) struck Allenburgers Glandelinians carrying all before him. At this moment General Sprueders forces went to the aid of the christian attackers and the Glandelinians again withdrew to remain on the defensive. Sprueder now made a terrific assault, and after more frightful slaughter, the Angelinians extending across Mc-Hollesters plains were checked but the main line did not recoil recoil, untill general Sprueder was killed, and his right wing almost crushed to fragments. Then the Glandelinians carried all before them untill checked by general Farnams chain of volleying cannons.

General Henry Bernard took sprueders place, but was severely wounded by a shot from a Glandelinian sharpshooter in rallying the division. Bernard wounded as he was retained his command and made another assault with tremendous fury but only crushed his division against a solid wall of Glandelinians, and wasrepulsed and persued all the way through the Mc-Whirther and Allenton glens, which after rallying his troops he strove with the fury of desperation to hold . Seven million Glandelinians made a terrific assault and after a four hours actual massacre was repulsed with only four million two hundred thousand men left. Yet though they succeeded in holding the glens the Angelinians had failed to turn either flank of the assailants, and the greatest artillery fire ever seen in actual wars warfare had been opened on those glens th d' x during the assaults, then after a lull came a tremendous counter charge made by eight million Angelinians led by general Americo Camillia and scores of other great Angelinian generals. For two more hours the slaughter was stupendous his assault being repulsed with the loss of 3,900,000 men the Glandelinians holding their portion of Mc-Whirther Run amid all this fiery storm of battle.

The second day of the battle ended as a Glandelinian success. On the third day general Rudolph Henneys line which had concentrated on the banks of the Takabrody creek to make their christian position more far advanced was attacked fiercely by the Glandelinians, and though the line of christians was crushed, and their leader had fallen they held firmly. General Iron with his entire command at the very outset had been captured, and general Caseys division on the right also still holding was suffering terribly. General Meredthes division had been the next one assaulted a little later and was driven from the works almost annihilated. Then an assault was made upon general Meldons position and it was also carried.

General Mc-Pherson was sent up to stop the advance of the successful Glandelinians and when the battle was resumed a general massacre of graycoats ensued. General Brandons division a part of general Dansons main division which for the last two days had been held in reserve was struck by general Ronald Hansons Glandelinian troops but general Liebermanns Angelinians came to Brandons aid, and the assailants were compelled to withdraw, but they soon resumed the attack with redoubled fury. Heavy masses had alread stormed the overwhelming right wing of Dansons force which soon gave way, and now the whole line of works seemed in danger of being carried. Simultaneously general Andernines min right was attacked by general Annerversitys Glandelinians. One of the first fiercest parts of the third day of the battle now raged along Dansons whole new line which though overlap ping the assailting foes was badly torn over three million having already fallen. Danson however knew what was coming and had hurled forward division after divisions as fast as men could march or run and his line managed to hold though the storming attack of the enemy si still continued.....

In the meantime general Ottomann Hanish a new Glandelinian commander had captured a line of christian works stationed on warren un but now general Bernard Doubleday coming up the Aronburg and Costellio crossroads with their divisions forced Ottomanns Glandelinians back from warren Run. At many point again now the Glandelinians were wavering, though another division under general Heller Johnston had tried to make a stand again on the Takabrody banks. The tide of battle rolled on now with the most fearful velocity tward the Mc-Hollester and Mc-Whirther plains once more, and dashed upon the Mc-Hollester Run regions. The Glandelinians along these three points extending for four teen miles suffering awful losses gave way, but each division inturn, the whole right wing of the Glandelinians was first driven, then the center gave way, but the left held untill its complete annihilation.

After this there was a two hours lull then general Southerlands Angelinians rushed forward to support the other line which had stopped to rest and now the whole again rushed forward and poured against the main line of Glandelinian works and stormed them as no demon army could have done.

Million Casye illios Glandelinian force was driven back but general Welsons Angelinians who captured Glelos woods failed to hold the position and so was swept back clear to their own position which was stationed on Norios plain. Pearys divido division of Angelinians at another section of this tremendous line of assault had encountered a murderous fire and failed to contain the advance, while general Wrights divisions had forced to had been forced to turn tail and run, a portion of Bernards batteries being silenced by Costellioes Glandelinian battbatterly no. six.

At another section of this great wave of attack general Barneys infantry captured Mc-Whirthers glens by overlapping the Glandelinians but through some mistakes that secured the infantry infantry line was crushed, and general Wrights survivors routed with the loss of seven hundred thousand prisoners. So the great assault made by the christians met a great repulse. In the meantime general Danson had also repulsed his own assailants and now silence reigned along his lines. Still the Angelinians had regained Mc-Hollesters plains, and though three of general Pucktails brigades from the right of his line had penetrated a portion of Federals army, they had been repulsed only for lack of support. Leo Costellioes artillery had also opened a warfare of titans, while for three hours his infantry strove with hel loose fury to recover the works in the Mc-Hollester Plains, and managed to force the christian right wing, but it took three hours to force the main line.

When this occurgd Pemberton opened upon the whole line of his angles with his artillery, while Anders army advanced to retake the plains once more but was fiercely repelled by general Conchues divisions which had come up in the night. Pemberton went down mortally wounded, and general Doubleden was killed. The assault however was continued and extended also across the Mc-Whirther-plains. Conchues at this moment advanced a new and fresh force tward general Lee Costellioes hard pressed center to reinforce him, and though Mc-Hollesters divisions collided with his it was literally dominated the scene being like a warfare of hell. Mc-Hollester was killed his line was torn and scores of thousands taken prisoners.

The Angelinians however once more got possession of the plains but the death of general Mc-Hollester caused them to be disheartened, and their disconcertment and demorilization caused the advan e of general Pembertons division to be checked, and when he made an attack to cover the retreat of Mc-Hollesters force his own line of battle was cut to pieces within another four hours time. However reinforcements being thrown in the assault was resumed with great persistency and then Federals main batteries started their hell of damanation, followed by one of the most tremendous counter charges ever seen, and led by general Ambrose Fuller himself. After twenty minutes of frightful massacre Ambrose Fuller was driven back, and general Crew and Love who had adv advanced to cover general Pal Fallens right was attacked by Harold and Reynold Sanders but held to the last through their entire divisions were cut up and a portion of their right wing destroyed.

The Ans Angelinians withdrew from Grows front but n was not followed very far, while at other points tward evening the Glandelinians had made great successes, untill Perkins and Mc-Whirther arived with more Concentinians, crushing Ambroses surviving line to fragments, and driving the rest intohopeless co nfusion.

Danson now made an irrestible charge for the Mc-Whirther plains once more and carried the line of trenches there, but could not force Federals Federals main extreme line which held like a rock and general Andernine realizing it and seeing the trap into which Danson had fallen hurled one of his main divisions upon Gdele-pe-Garbos line which also held amid the dreadful carnage untill the arrival of Fela Fonlan. Nevertal Nevertholess both sides being exhausted and as night drew on they drew off.

Early the next morning on the fourth day one of the Angelinian commanders made a southern movement and under a heavy fire struck Meldons Glandelinian troops and pushed him backwards, but phalon arriving with a body of Condencinans cut the christians off from communication with the main body and also annihilated Evans big force, the other divisions gradually retiring, the Glandelinians persuing closely, crossing the river and forcing the Angelinians at Mc-Hollester Plains to capitulate, Hers Abyssinkilians being surrounded and forced to surrender.

General Palso at thesame time managed to cut off Dansons command from its communic tions with general Andernine, but their terrific onslaught upon the left was attacked with unbearable loss es, and with the death of general Halsoe. General Bernal himself seeing that he was gaining the adva ta advantage now made a severe offensive movement across the Mc-Whirther plains striking with terrible coherence on the two solid christian lines stationed there. Part of the main attacking column encountering a storming fire recoiled in a Confusion confusion of confusion, but the main portions undaunted advanced onward, pushing general Evans c Concentinian forces back, while another part of his division was reaching the northern extremity of the Mc-Whirthian pl i plain where it met frightful decimation.

The glandelinians under general Shoemann and Pandro also drove back the Angelinians intrenched on the Schloeder farm while a force of eight million men supported by eight thousand cannon attacked general Kilohinee whole command, nother being hurled upon the Angelinians under eneral Seraphin. General Cassilio had been killed, Bernards infantry was being hard pressed and Kilohinee whole command despite heavy reinforcements was cut to pieces and the survivors forced to surrender, while poor Shoemann was again engaging Dansons divisions. The heavy christian forces though so badly harassed seemed indeed about to gain the advantage at another point, but despite the arival of fresh Angelinian and Abyssinkidian troops the wicked glandelinians finally turned the point at this section regaining all the ground they had lost in the battles of the first three days.
